aus Politik und Wirtschaft

GEGRÜNDET AM 1. JANUAR 1951 VON ARTUR MISSBACH

ANSCHRIFT DER REDAKTION: 3091 ALTENBÜCKEN ÜBER VERDEN · FERNRUF: HOYA (04251) 3433

Nr. 2028 — 6. Juli 1976 — 26. Jahrgang

❶ Werten Sie das Resultat der Ostberliner Kommunisten-Konferenz nicht falsch. Es hat kein neues, drittes Schisma gegeben (1948 Exkommunizierung Titos, 1960 Bruch mit China); im Gegenteil: der „verlorene Sohn" Tito ist in den Schoß der kommunistischen Bewegung zurückgekehrt. Was das im einzelnen bedeutet, wird man erst nach dem Ableben des jugoslawischen Marschalls erfahren.

Die Kompromisse zwischen „Linientreuen" und „Autonomisten" bleiben für die Öffentlichkeit geheim; was nach außen drang, ist Sand für die Augen des Westens. So beispielsweise der Ersatz des Begriffes „proletarischer Internationalismus" durch die wirksamere Formel „Solidarität".

Für Moskau kommt allerdings das Problem auf, wie die linientreuen nördlichen Parteien vor dem Bazillus der nationalen „Selbständigkeit" der südlichen Gruppe (z.B. Rumänien, Spanien, Italien, Frankreich) geschützt werden können. Doch die verbindende Grundhaltung bleibt:

> „Alle, ob west- oder osteuropäische, „autonomistische" oder moskautreue Parteien bekennen sich nach wir vor zum Klassenkampf und zur Veränderung des Status quo in Europa und in der Welt; in ihrer Stellung gegen den „Kapitalismus" und die westlichen Bündnisse weichen sie weniger voneinander ab, als Worte glauben machen können. Die Verschiedenheiten und Gegensätze zwischen den kommunistischen Parteien, die in Ostberlin offen zutage getreten sind, haben die kommunistische Gefahr für Europa keineswegs vermindert. Der eigentliche Zweck dieser Konferenz war ja nicht, alle europäischen Parteien dem Diktat Moskaus zu unterwerfen, sondern die strategische und propagandistische Vorbereitung einer kommunistischen Offensive in Europa und die Ausnutzung der Ergebnisse von Helsinki und der Ost-West-Detente für dieses Ziel. Diese Folge des Kommunistentreffens wird man wahrscheinlich bald auf allen Ebenen zu spüren bekommen. Die neuen oder als neu ausgegebenen Formeln in den Reden und Dokumenten der Ostberliner Tagung ändern nichts an den Tatsachen, daß die Sowjetunion weiter die bedrohliche militärische Macht in Europa bleibt, daß Moskau weiter an der Breschnew-Doktrin festhält und die osteuropäischen Staaten noch enger an sich zu ketten versucht und daß im Westen Europas starke kommunistische Parteien, in den Deckmantel der „Unabhängigkeit" gehüllt, energisch nach der Macht streben."

Giereks Zugeständnisse, Preiserhöhungen zurückzunehmen, wird von der Bevölkerung als sichtbares Eingeständnis einer falschen Politik gewertet. Das ist riskant für ein Staatswesen, das allein auf Autorität der Obrigkeit aufgebaut ist. Warschau mußte sich bereits von Moskau und Ostberlin Rügen erteilen lassen. Der sowjetische Botschafter in Warschau spie vor Gierek aus und tadelte mit überschlagender Stimme sein Versagen. Er sei unfähig zu führen und gegenüber der polnischen Opposition viel zu nachgiebig.

Auf Veranlassung der Sowjets werden gegenwertig „Säuberungen" im polnischen Offizierskorps vorgenommen, wo nationale Bestrebungen an Umfang zunehmen. Eine Reihe führender Divisions-Kommandeure, vor allem bei den Warschauer mechanisierten Truppen und der pommerschen Luftlande-Division wurde abgelöst und in die Provinz versetzt. Auch der stellvertretende Chef des Stabes im Kommando des Warschauer Paktes, Konteradmiral Studzinski, wurde seines Postens enthoben. Kurz darauf verstarb er unter mysteriösen Umständen im Alter von 53 Jahren.

Bundeskanzler Schmidt kommt die neuerliche Aktivität Mitterands außerordentlich ungelegen. Er fürchtet, die Opposition könnte sie als Wahlmunition gegen die SPD benutzen, zumal bekannt ist, daß Willy Brandt ein Nah-Verhältnis zu Mitterand pflegt, um mit Hilfe des französischen Sozialistenchefs, der in Frankreich eine Volksfront von Sozialisten und Kommunisten bilden will, Präsident des Europa-Parlaments zu werden.

Interessant: Fast unbeachtet von der Öffentlichkeit hat sich jetzt SPD-Chef Brandt mit dem wirtschaftspolitischen Experten der Sozialistischen Partei Frankreichs, Rocard, getroffen. Rocard ist mehr Kommunist als Sozialist.

Hintergrund: Die Abrüstungsdemonstration war von einem DKP-bestimmten Komitee organisiert worden. SPD-Prominente, wie der umstrittene Schriftsteller Bernt Engelmann, die Professoren Kade und Klönne, der frühere Staatssekretär Reichwald, zahlreiche Juso-Funktionäre sowie von den Jungdemokraten der Landesvorsitzende von Hessen machten dabei begeistert mit.

Das Rednerpodium zierten DKP-, SPD- und FDP-Funktionäre: DKP-Vorsitzender Mies, die Konvertitin und Tochter des ehemaligen Bundespräsidenten Dr. Uta Ranke-Heinemann und neben dem Ex-Kirchenpräsidenten und Leninpreisträger Martin Niemöller der stellvertretende Fraktionsvorsitzende der FDP in der Hamburger Bürgerschaft Gerhard Weber.

Der linke Politschriftsteller Günter Wallraff heizte die Stimmung an.

Am Kongreß gegen Unterdrückung und Ausbeutung beteiligten sich u.a. erneut SPD-Prominente wie Engelmann und Klönne. SPD-Funktionär Heinz Brandt richtete an die Teilnehmer

„. . . . : einen Appell zum massenhaften zivilen Ungehorsam und Widerstand, ein Appell zur Rot-Arbeit von unten, von der Basis her, in Betrieb, in Uni, Schule, Wohngebiet. Warum so zaghaft, Ihr radikalen Kombattanten in Christo und Marx. Heraus aus den Katakomben ans Tageslicht. Fürchtet Euch nicht!"

⑤ Am harten Kopf-an-Kopf-Rennen von Regierung und Opposition hat sich auch nach der jüngsten Allensbach-Umfrage (Frau Prof. Noelle-Neumann) nichts geändert. Von größtem Interesse ist allerdings die Quote für die sog. „Vierte Partei": 0,5 Prozent. Es ist völlig ausgeschlossen, daß die Aktionsgemeinschaft auch nur in etwa in die Nähe der 5-Prozent-Klausel vorstoßen könnte; andererseits wäre es durchaus möglich, daß sie den Unionsparteien jene entscheidenden Stimmen wegnimmt, die zur absoluten Mehrheit fehlen. Hier das neueste Bild der Allensbacher Befragung:

CDU/CSU = 49,5%
SPD = 40,0%
FDP = 9,0%
Vierte Partei = 0,5%
andere Splitter = 1,0%

Der Wahlslogan „Freiheit statt Sozialismus" findet unter den gewünschten Aspekten zunehmend Anklang. Auf die Frage „Welche Partei sorgt am meisten für Freiheit?" entschieden sich 34% für die Union und nur 24% für die Sozialdemokraten. Aber auch bei der Frage „Welche Partei sorgt für mehr Gerechtigkeit?" liegt die Union jetzt zum erstenmal mit 27:24% vor der SPD.

FOR FREEDOM

The Free Nation

THE FORTNIGHTLY PAPER OF THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR FREEDOM

VOL.2 ISSUE 1 15p 7th JANUARY 1977

The story the Nationals were afraid to touch

KGB AND THE BIG SMEAR JOB

The KGB is involved in some of the current attempts to smear the National Association for Freedom and individuals associated with it, especially the Director, Mr. Robert Moss, and Mr. Brian Crozier, Director of the Institute for the Study of Conflict and a NAFF Council member.

This is the big story some of our national newspapers have been sitting on for weeks, apparently afraid to use it.

The facts, as far as we have been able to piece them together, are printed here for the first time.

They make an astonishing story. For instance:

- There are many clear indications of KGB involvement in the campaign.
- The current aspects of it (see box on this page) are just the tip of the iceberg: the smears started more than 18 months ago.
- The campaign is internationally orchestrated: allegations have appeared in the USA, France, Spain, India, the U.S.S.R. and other countries.
- It has been pressed relentlessly and with no expense barred.
- Most of the smears are based on letters stolen from the homes or offices of people at the receiving end of the campaign.
- The home of one of the smear victims was set on fire.
- The purpose of the present phase of the campaign appears to be to divert attention from the case of the two Americans on whom the Home Secretary has announced that deportation orders are to be served — Mr. Philip Agee and Mr. Mark Hosenball. All the main authors of the smear campaign — at least in Britain are associates (American or British) of Mr. Agee. They are not necessarily aware of the KGB's involvement in the campaign.
- Neither they nor anybody else has produced evidence that the series for which Mr. Robert Moss published his book, Chile's Marxist Experience, was in any way financed by the CIA. The NAFF does not, and has never had, any connection with the CIA. No-one saw fit to point out that many other distinguished authors published books in the same series, including Sir William Hayter, Colin Clark, Professor Max Beloff and Lord Gladwyn.

The KGB connection

First, a reminder. The KGB stands for "Committee of State Security" in Russian. It is the latest of a long string of sinister initials: CHEKA, GPU, OGPU, NKVD, GUGB, NKGB, MVD, MGB, KI and (from 1954) the KGB. With slight variations in functions, the organisation, created by Lenin from the old Tsarist Okhrana, has had invariable main purposes: at home, total repression; abroad, espionage, subversion, assassination and terrorism and, not least, disinformation — the deliberate spreading of false or misleading information. In other words, smear campaigns are a long established KGB speciality.

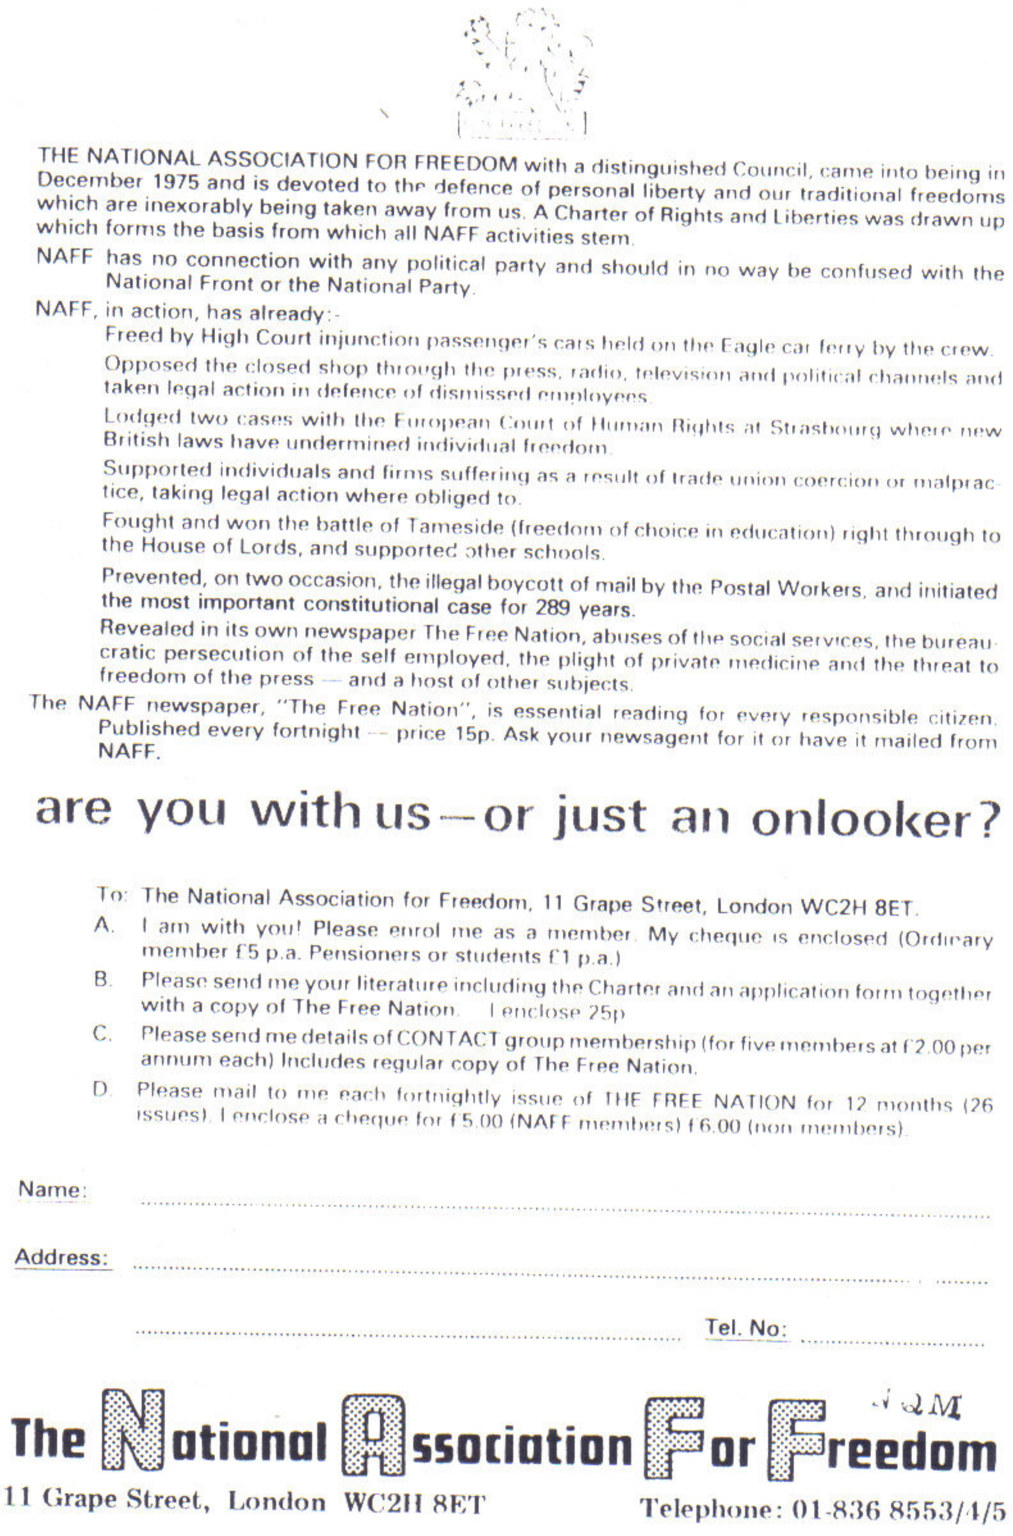
What is the smear? On 20 December last, the Guardian carried a front-page story by Peter Chippindale and Martin Walker, under the headline 'Tory's book funded by CIA'. The story alleged that Robert Moss, the Director of the National Association for Freedom (and who is not, incidentally, a member of the Conservative Party) had written his book, Chile's Marxist Experiment, on commission from Forum World Features, described as "a CIA-funded company".

On an inside page, an article by the same writers and spread over seven columns gave what purported to be a history of FWF, with more digs at Mr. Moss and at the former Chairman of that company, Mr. Crozier (a NAFF Council member) and his successor, Mr. Iain Hamilton. The article (as replete with inaccuracies as with gratuitous innuendoes) went on to say that the Institute for the Study of Conflict had "grown out of Forum", thus smearing the institute as well.

Similar allegations about Mr. Moss and FWF were made in a BBC interview with Martin Walker; and on 22nd December, the Daily Mail published an article by Jane McLoughlin, repeating a number of the Guardian's allegations. In the House of Commons on the 21st, Mr. Dennis Skinner (Lab., Bolsover) "leapt up and spoke of 'revelations in the press that not only have the NAFF got on to the Tory front bench, but that the CIA are helping to run the NAFF". The Guardian's report on 22nd December (from which this quotation is taken) went on to say: "This has not been alleged in any of the Guardian reports and there is no evidence for it." Never mind: Mr. Skinner said it. That is the way a smear spreads.

On Christmas Eve, the Daily Mail carried a retraction of and an apology for some of its allegations against Mr. Moss. Mr. Moss has issued writs for defamation against the BBC, the Guardian and others. Mr. Brian Crozier sent the Guardian photocopies of various letters correcting the record on the history of FWF and establishing that the owners of the company were Mr. John Hay Whitney, succeeded by Mr. Richard Mellon Scaife, together with an article refuting the allegations made in that newspaper.

In the end, the Guardian did publish the material, on 31st December.



THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR FREEDOM with a distinguished Council, came into being in December 1975 and is devoted to the defence of personal liberty and our traditional freedoms which are inexorably being taken away from us. A Charter of Rights and Liberties was drawn up which forms the basis from which all NAFF activities stem.

NAFF has no connection with any political party and should in no way be confused with the National Front or the National Party.

NAFF, in action, has already:-

- Freed by High Court injunction passenger's cars held on the Eagle car ferry by the crew.
- Opposed the closed shop through the press, radio, television and political channels and taken legal action in defence of dismissed employees.
- Lodged two cases with the European Court of Human Rights at Strasbourg where new British laws have undermined individual freedom.
- Supported individuals and firms suffering as a result of trade union coercion or malpractice, taking legal action where obliged to.
- Fought and won the battle of Tameside (freedom of choice in education) right through to the House of Lords, and supported other schools.
- Prevented, on two occasion, the illegal boycott of mail by the Postal Workers, and initiated the most important constitutional case for 289 years.
- Revealed in its own newspaper The Free Nation, abuses of the social services, the bureaucratic persecution of the self employed, the plight of private medicine and the threat to freedom of the press — and a host of other subjects.

The NAFF newspaper, "The Free Nation", is essential reading for every responsible citizen. Published every fortnight — price 15p. Ask your newsagent for it or have it mailed from NAFF.

Brüsewitz-Zentrum

Trägerverein: Christlich Paneuropäisches Studienwerk (CPS) e. V.

Spendenaufruf:

Am 18. August 1976 verbrannte sich Pfarrer Oskar Brüsewitz öffentlich und demonstrativ vor der Michaeliskirche in Zeitz. Dieser Aufschrei im kommunistischen Staatsatheismus der „DDR" blieb nicht ungehört. Knapp ein Jahr nach dem Zeichen von Zeitz gründeten bekennende Persönlichkeiten aus Wissenschaft, Kirche und Politik das „Christlich Paneuropäische Studienwerk" als Trägerverein für ein Menschenrechtszentrum. Dieses Zentrum trägt den Namen von Pastor Oskar Brüsewitz, um bedrängten Menschen in der „DDR" aus christlicher Verantwortung eine moralische, publizistische und geistige Hilfe zu sein.

Ende 1977 hat das Brüsewitz-Zentrum in Bad Oeynhausen seine Tätigkeit aufgenommen. Tagungen und Veranstaltungen werden im Brüsewitz-Zentrum durchgeführt, Schriften werden herausgegeben. Das Zentrum ist ein lebendiges Zeugnis christlicher Verantwortung gegen das Unrecht in der „DDR".

Finanziert wurde diese Tätigkeit bisher aus spontanen Zuwendungen. Damit unsere Arbeit im Jahre 1978 organisatorisch und finanziell stabilisiert werden kann, bitten wir unsere Freunde um ihren Beitrag.

Alle Spenden, an den als gemeinnützig anerkannten Trägerverein des Brüsewitz-Zentrums, sind steuerlich abzugsfähig, dies hat das Finanzamt Minden am 17.1.1978 bestätigt.

Bitte helfen Sie durch eine Spende!

Die Menschenrechte brauchen Ihre Unterstützung!

Wir helfen den Menschen, die religiöser oder politischer Verfolgung ausgeliefert sind. Wir verteidigen die international anerkannten Menschenrechte. Die wichtigsten Grundrechte des Menschen sind: Das Recht auf freie Meinungsäußerung, das Recht, jederzeit sein Land verlassen und zurückkehren zu können, das Recht auf freie Ausübung der Religion und der religiösen Erziehung der Kinder, das Recht, Vereine zu gründen und Informationen zu erhalten und weiterzuverbreiten.

Aus christlicher Verantwortung für die Menschenrechte!

Diese Tätigkeit des Brüsewitz-Zentrums erfolgte sachorientiert an den untenstehenden fünf Punkten, sie ist parteipolitisch nicht gebunden und überkonfessionell.
Grundlage für die Arbeit bildet das Bekenntnis zum christlichen Glauben und den zehn Geboten.
Konkrete Aufgabenstellung:

1. Die Publizierung von Verletzungen der Menschenrechte, insbesondere der der Religionsfreiheit in der „DDR", die Weiterleitung der Informationen an Kirche und Öffentlichkeit.
2. Die Durchführung von Hilfsaktionen — moralischer, juristischer oder materieller Art — für Christen in der „DDR".
3. Aufbau eines Facharchivs, einer Bibliothek und die Herausgabe von Dokumentationen über Christen, Kirche und Staat im Sozialismus der „DDR".
4. Die Durchführung von Begegnungstagungen, Seminaren und einzelnen Bildungsveranstaltungen über Menschenrechte und Religionsfreiheit im Sozialismus.
5. Betreuung von Flüchtlingen und aus der „DDR" ausgewiesenen oder ausgereisten Personen.

ANNEXES

CREATION du COMITE EUROPEEN de LIAISON des ASSOCIATIONS et AMIS de WILTON PARK (CLEW)

Lorsqu'en 1968, un certain nombre de Wiltoniens européens ont créé, avec la participation de Sir Heinz KOEPPLER, alors Recteur de WILTON PARK, notre Société Internationale, le but essentiel était d'avoir le plus grand nombre de bonnes volontés pour développer les relations entre WILTON PARK et un certain nombre de pays européens et, de plus, d'organiser sur le continent des réunions ou colloques d'information en vue de répandre l'esprit et les règles d'or de l'institution britannique dont le succès mondial ne variait pas depuis 22 années consécutives.

Au bout de dix ans d'activités, il est laissé à chacun le soin de juger de la réussite.

Mais il était à penser que notre exemple d'une part et un certain esprit nationaliste en Europe d'autre part, conduiraient les Wiltoniens de plusieurs pays à s'organiser au plan national, de façon structurée.

Dans ce domaine, et tout en rappelant l'existence déjà ancienne de groupes nationaux, notamment en Allemagne fédérale et en Autriche, nous avions assisté, avec beaucoup d'intérêt, à la fondation en 1976 de "l'ASSOCIATION SUISSE des AMIS de WILTON PARK" (1) et en 1977 à celle de "l'ASSOCIAZIONE ITALIANA PER WILTON PARK" (2).

Dès lors, - et plusieurs récentes expériences l'ont confirmé - il devenait important de coordonner les activités des différents groupements nationaux, tant sur le plan du calendrier de leurs activités nationales ou internationales que sur celui des études et des thèmes choisis.

D'aucuns ont jugé que la création d'une fédération wiltonienne européenne, était prématurée. En revanche plusieurs responsables ou éminents "leaders" de Wilton Park ont décidé de ne plus attendre pour créer une sorte de conférence des présidents sous la forme d'un COMITE de LIAISON EUROPEEN.

C'est ainsi qu'en mai 1978, à ROME, dont le nom est particulièrement attaché à l'idée de construction européenne, le COMITE a vu le jour, au domicile et grâce à l'extrême obligeance de S. Exc. l'Ambassadeur ORTONA.

Il nous a semblé que la meilleure façon de vous informer sur le fond de cette création était de reproduire ci-après et in extenso le texte de la convention signée.

— CONVENTION —

Dans la perspective de la création d'une FEDERATION EUROPEENNE des Associations et Amis de WILTON PARK,

Les Soussignés :

- Sir Heinz KOEPPLER, Ancien Recteur de Wilton Park,
- M. René-Louis PICARD, Président de la Société Internationale des Amis de Wilton Park,
- S. Exc. Monsieur l'Ambassadeur Egidio ORTONA, Président de l'Associazione Italiana per Wilton Park e per l'E.D.C.,
- M. Klaus F. BECKMANN, Avocat à la Cour de Dusseldorf (République Fédérale Allemande).
- Maître Jacques JONET, Avocat à la Cour de Bruxelles, Vice-Président de la Société Internationale des Amis de Wilton Park.
- Dr. Georges LADAME, Président de la Société Suisse des Amis de Wilton Park.
- M. Jean J. RICHARD, Vice-Président de la Société Internationale de Wilton Park,
- S. Exc. Don Alfredo SANCHEZ-BELLA, Ambassadeur d'Espagne, Président des Amis espagnols de Wilton Park,

Me Jean VIOLET, Avocat Honoraire à la Cour de Paris décident, par les présentes, la création immédiate du :

COMITE de LIAISON EUROPEEN

des Associations et Amis

de WILTON PARK (Sigle : C.L.E.W.)

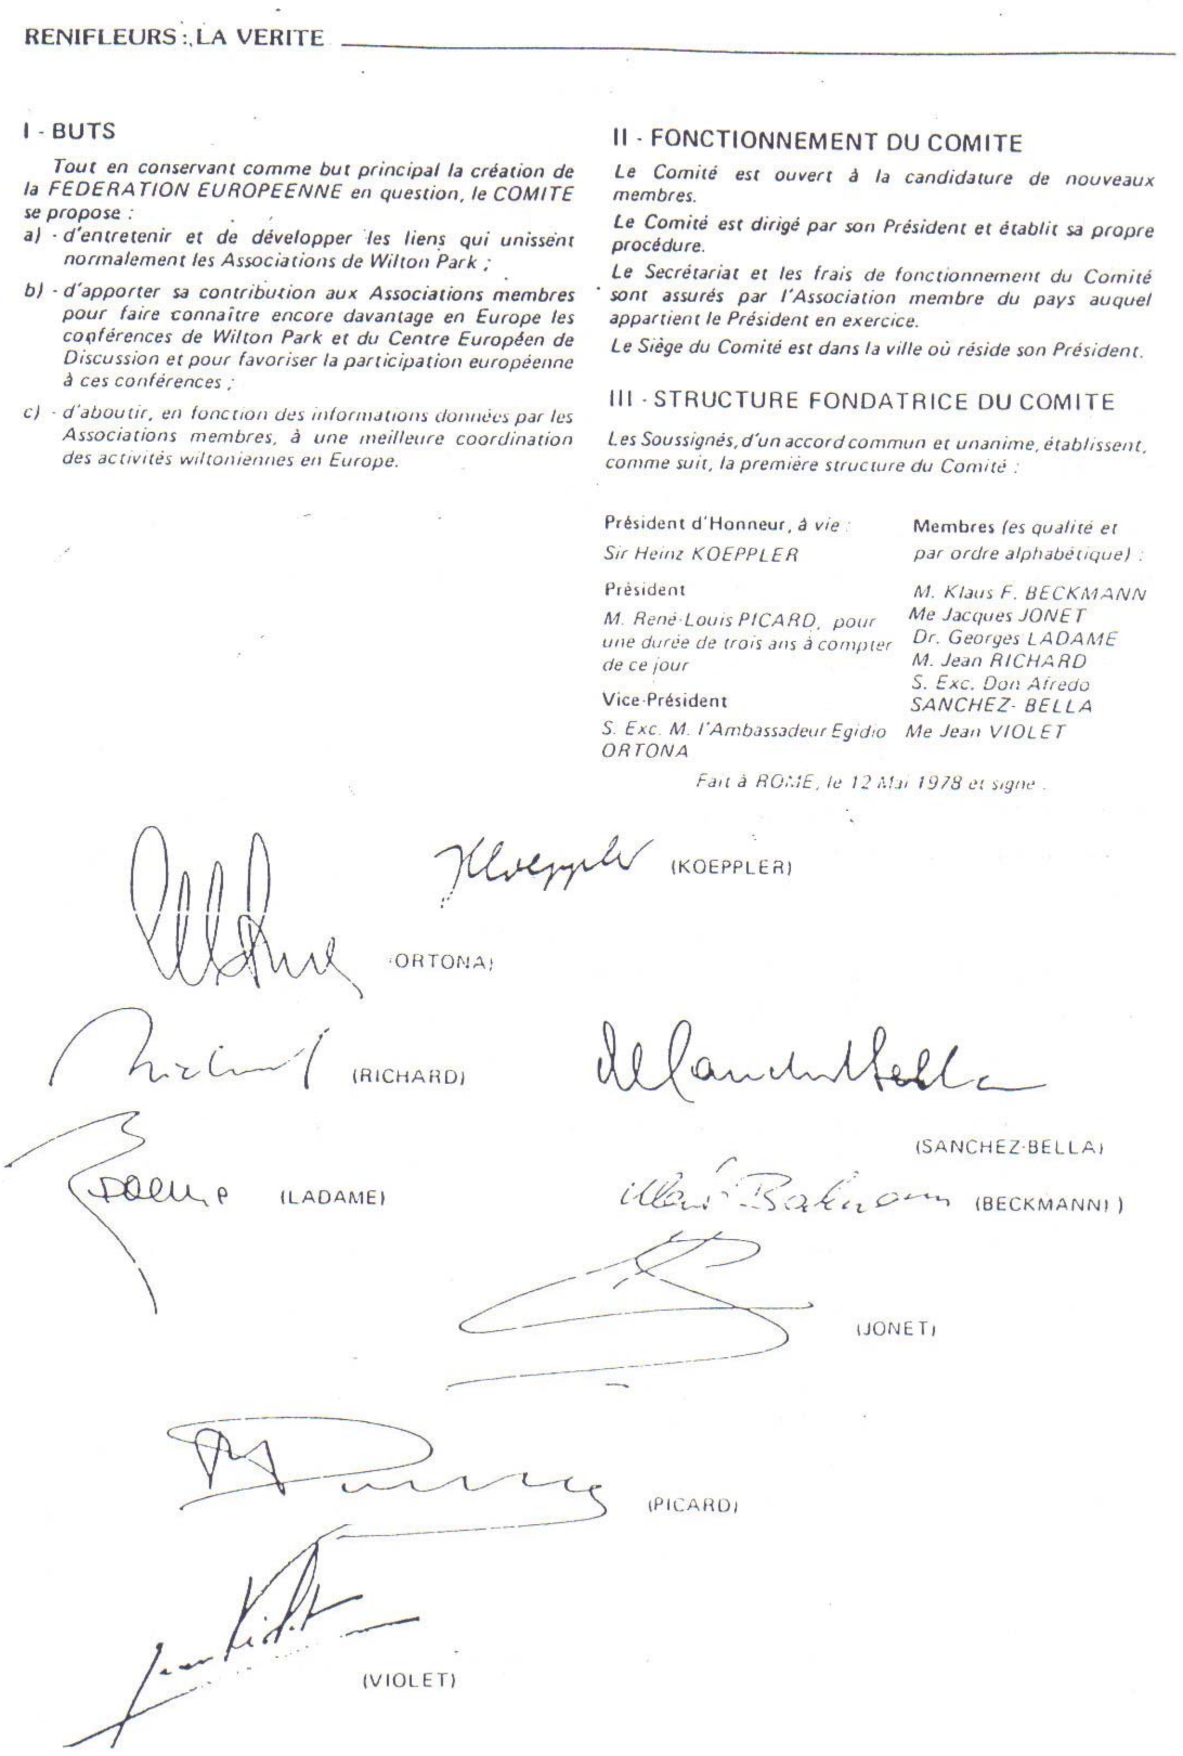
avec les buts et modalités de fonctionnement suivants :

---

(1) - Président : Docteur Georges LADAME

(2) - Président : S.Exc. Monsieur l'Ambassadeur Egidio ORTONA

L'Organisation la plus mystérieuse du "Système Violet" : Les AMIS de WILTON PARK. Parmi ses fondateurs : Jonet, Sanchez Bella et Violet.



RENIFLEURS : LA VERITE

I - BUTS

Tout en conservant comme but principal la création de la FEDERATION EUROPEENNE en question, le COMITE se propose :

a) - d'entretenir et de développer les liens qui unissent normalement les Associations de Wilton Park ;

b) - d'apporter sa contribution aux Associations membres pour faire connaître encore davantage en Europe les conférences de Wilton Park et du Centre Européen de Discussion et pour favoriser la participation européenne à ces conférences ;

c) - d'aboutir, en fonction des informations données par les Associations membres, à une meilleure coordination des activités wiltoniennes en Europe.

II - FONCTIONNEMENT DU COMITE

Le Comité est ouvert à la candidature de nouveaux membres.

Le Comité est dirigé par son Président et établit sa propre procédure.

Le Secrétariat et les frais de fonctionnement du Comité sont assurés par l'Association membre du pays auquel appartient le Président en exercice.

Le Siège du Comité est dans la ville où réside son Président.

III - STRUCTURE FONDATRICE DU COMITE

Les Soussignés, d'un accord commun et unanime, établissent, comme suit, la première structure du Comité :

Président d'Honneur, à vie :
Sir Heinz KOEPPLER

Président
M. René-Louis PICARD, pour une durée de trois ans à compter de ce jour

Vice-Président
S. Exc. M. l'Ambassadeur Egidio ORTONA

Membres (es qualité et par ordre alphabétique) :
M. Klaus F. BECKMANN
Me Jacques JONET
Dr. Georges LADAME
M. Jean RICHARD
S. Exc. Don Afredo SANCHEZ- BELLA
Me Jean VIOLET

Fait à ROME, le 12 Mai 1978 et signé.

++ Von Österreich aus wird ununterbrochen an der Zerstörung der BR Deutschland mitgewirkt. Sammelpunkt dieser Bemühungen ist das von der Wiener Regierung, der SPÖ, den Gewerkschaften und den Linken finanzierte und unterstützte Organ "neues forum", auf welches wir schon wiederholt hingewiesen haben. Daß Herr Dr.Dr. Günther Nenning und sein Kollektiv die "Grünen" in der Bundesrepublik Deutschland nicht übersehen würden, war zu erwarten. In Nr. 297/298 von September/Oktober 1978 schreibt ein Herr Friedrich Geyrhofer u.a.: "In der ökologischen Bewegung der späten siebziger Jahre feiert der außerparlamentarische Radikalismus der späten sechziger Jahre seine Wiedergeburt. Vom Umschwung in China, von der Sympathisantenjagd und Mogadischu betroffen, nützt die Neue Linke ihre Chance zum Gegenangriff. Mit den 3,5 Prozent der Bunten Liste Hamburg ist erstmals die westdeutsche Linke vor die Schwelle des Parlaments gekommen. Die DKP, auf die Atomkraftwerke des Ostblocks Rücksicht nehmend, und der (maoistische) KBW, der sich durch seine hohlen militaristischen Redensarten unmöglich macht, werden von eher "heterodoxen" Gruppen, wie den Spontis, den Basisinitiativen und der ebenfalls maoistischen, doch von Peking unabhängigen KP Nord überflügelt." Bemerkung: Da die Roten in der BR Deutschland die Machtverhältnisse noch nicht so sehen, daß sie ihre Wahrheit zu sagen wagen und sich darüber grün ärgern, sagen es derweil die Roten aus Österreich.

++ Im Weltraum befinden sich zur Zeit 40 atomgetriebene Weltraumsatelliten. Seit 1957 wurden insgesamt 10.600 Satelliten in den Weltraum geschossen. 4.600 davon befinden sich noch im All. Satellitenabstürze auf die Erde bleiben weiterhin eine Gefahrenquelle.

++ In der Spitze des amerikanischen Geheimdienstes CIA, vielleicht sogar in der US-Regierung selbst, soll ein sowjetischer Agent sitzen. Er soll den Sowjets bereits wertvolle Hinweise auf das amerikanische Satellitenüberwachungssystem geliefert haben. Der Rumäne Ion Pacepa habe sich nur deshalb abgesetzt, weil er sich von diesem Agenten enttarnt fühlte. Spielmaterial des US-Geheimdienstes, das in Moskau auftauchte, soll die Existenz dieses Spions bestätigt haben.

THE INSTITUTE FOR EUROPEAN DEFENCE AND STRATEGIC STUDIES

The Institute for European Defence and Strategic Studies was set up in London in 1979 to study political change in Europe and to assess its impact on strategic and defence issues. It is, therefore, particularly concerned with those developments which affect the future of the Western Alliance. It is hoped that the findings of its authors and contributors will be of interest to academics, politicians and others who have an impact on the formulation of policy. It is also hoped that by contributing to the exchange of ideas and information the Institute will increase understanding of the complex issues involved.

Accordingly, the Institute publishes books, monographs and occasional papers, holds conferences and seminars, and contributes to debate through articles in journals and newspapers.

Its activities are supervised by an international board of management and, where appropriate, it seeks the guidance of academics and respected public figures from Europe and the United States.

Le Mouvement d'Action pour l'Union Européenne (M.A.U.E.) s'assigne pour objectif de promouvoir une Europe libre et unie, capable de rassembler toutes les nations qui la composent dans une communauté de destin et d'espérance.

Voulant une Europe qui soit un continent de libertés, le M.A.U.E. entend contribuer à assurer le rayonnement d'un ordre juridique, politique et économique fondé sur le respect de la personne humaine, sur le dynamisme de l'économie sociale de marché, et inspiré par le droit naturel. Le M.A.U.E. est fermement opposé à toute limitation de la liberté individuelle que ne motiverait pas le bien commun. Il est certain que le droit à la vie, le droit des familles et des communautés naturelles priment le droit des Etats.

Le M.A.U.E. condamne donc toute forme de totalitarisme et en particulier toute collaboration avec les formations marxistes qui prônent la primauté de la collectivité sur les personnes et le dogme de la lutte des classes. A cet égard le M.A.U.E. considère que la menace multiforme que représentent le communisme, ses alliés et ses compagnons de route, doit être combattue de façon prioritaire.

Une véritable démocratie ne peut se concevoir sans le respect d'une autorité légitime. Dans cet esprit le M.A.U.E. veut promouvoir la renaissance du sens civique par le développement des responsabilités personnelles des citoyens, à tous les niveaux.

Suite 1.

Le M.A.U.E. veut une Europe fidèle à sa civilisation et à ses traditions historiques, et respectueuse de la diversité de ses peuples et de leurs cultures nationales. Il réaffirme son attachement aux pays d'Europe centrale et orientale qui, en dépit des vicissitudes historiques, font partie intégrante de sa communauté. Il réclame pour eux la libre circulation des hommes et des idées, et le droit à l'autodétermination.

Nos générations, et en particulier la jeunesse, exigent des initiatives au niveau européen, sur le plan social, économique, culturel et scientifique. Les élections européennes de ce 10 juin requièrent une prise de conscience de tous. Sauvegardons et promouvons ensemble les réelles valeurs de notre continent : UNION - LIBERTE - DEMOCRATIE !

C'est dans ce but que nous vous demandons de nous renouveler votre confiance et votre adhésion ou de rejoindre nos rangs !

Pour le Comité exécutif

Vincent van den BOSCH,
Secrétaire général.

Henri WYNANTS,

EUROPE - INFORMATION

Périodique du MOUVEMENT D'ACTION POUR L'UNION EUROPEENNE, affilié sur le plan international à l'Union Paneuropéenne sous la présidence de S.A.I. et R. l'Archiduc Otto de Habsbourg.

MAI 1980

LE BILLET DU PRESIDENT

C'est de tout coeur que je me suis associé à l'hommage rendu à Florimond Damman dans le bulletin Europe-Information d'Octobre dernier.

Je le connaissais bien, puisqu'il y a plus de douze ans déjà dans mon désir de rapprochement des différentes associations, je l'invitais à siéger au Conseil de l'Association Atlantique Belge où il représentait l'A.E.N.A. A l'une de nos Assemblées de l'A.T.A. à Luxembourg, de sa voix de tribun chaleureux, il stigmatisa les dangers de l'impérialisme idéologique soviétique.

Sa succession sera lourde à porter, je le sais, si je l'ai acceptée, c'est à l'appel des jeunes du M.A.U.E., qui représentent l'avenir, la foi et l'espérance. Le rôle de Président, tel que je le conçois, est d'être à l'écoute, prêt au dialogue, disposé à comprendre les points de vue divergents, pour mieux concilier, rapprocher, unifier. Nous sommes créés pour l'action en commun, disait déjà Marc Aurèle.

S.A.I. et R. l'Archiduc Otto de Habsbourg Président d'Honneur du Mouvement Paneuropéen, nous en a tracé la voie : Grande Europe à bâtir, celle de l'Europe Occidentale déjà en construction, et demain celle de l'Europe Centrale et Orientale enfin libérées de leurs chaînes. Le mouvement d'action pour l'Union Européenne est apolitique et Chrétien, il est réceptacle d'accueil pour tous ceux qui croient à la résurgence de notre vieux continent.

Lors de sa dernière réunion en Avril, le M.A.U.E. à l'unanimité des membres du Conseil a adopté les résolutions suivantes :

1) Condamnation de toutes les violations du droit international telles que prises d'otages de diplomates Américains à Téhéran ou dans toute autre partie du monde.
2) Condamnation de l'invasion armée et de l'occupation de l'Afghanistan

La Paix repose hélas aujourd'hui sur un équilibre des forces ainsi que le déclarait tout récemment le Secrétaire Général de l'O.T.A.N. Monsieur Joseph Luns, ce pèlerin infatiguable de notre défense de la Paix. Il est urgent de mettre en pratique notre devise nationale, pour le maintien de nos libertés.

CREATION D'UN GROUPE D'ACTION PARLEMENTAIRE D'INITIATIVE PANEUROPEENNE

En janvier 1980 s'est formé un groupe d'action composé de parlementaires européens de différentes nationalités et de différents partis, mais unis par leurs adhésions aux principes de base de l'Union Paneuropéenne. Ce groupe est présidé par Otto de Habsbourg, membre du Parlement Européen (PPE) et Président International de l'Union Paneuropéenne. Il peut compter dès à présent sur l'appui de plus de 40 parlementaires européens.

Raisons et buts.

Une des grandes lacunes du Parlement est le manque d'information, et ce, à un double niveau :
- manque d'information entre parlementaires
- manque d'information entre les parlementaires et l'opinion publique de leurs pays respectifs.

Le Groupe d'Action va désormais communiquer à ses membres une vaste information notamment relative aux actions communes qu'ils veulent entreprendre. De plus, par des communiqués, le Groupe fera connaître aux travers de ses membres et des médias ses initiatives et actions.

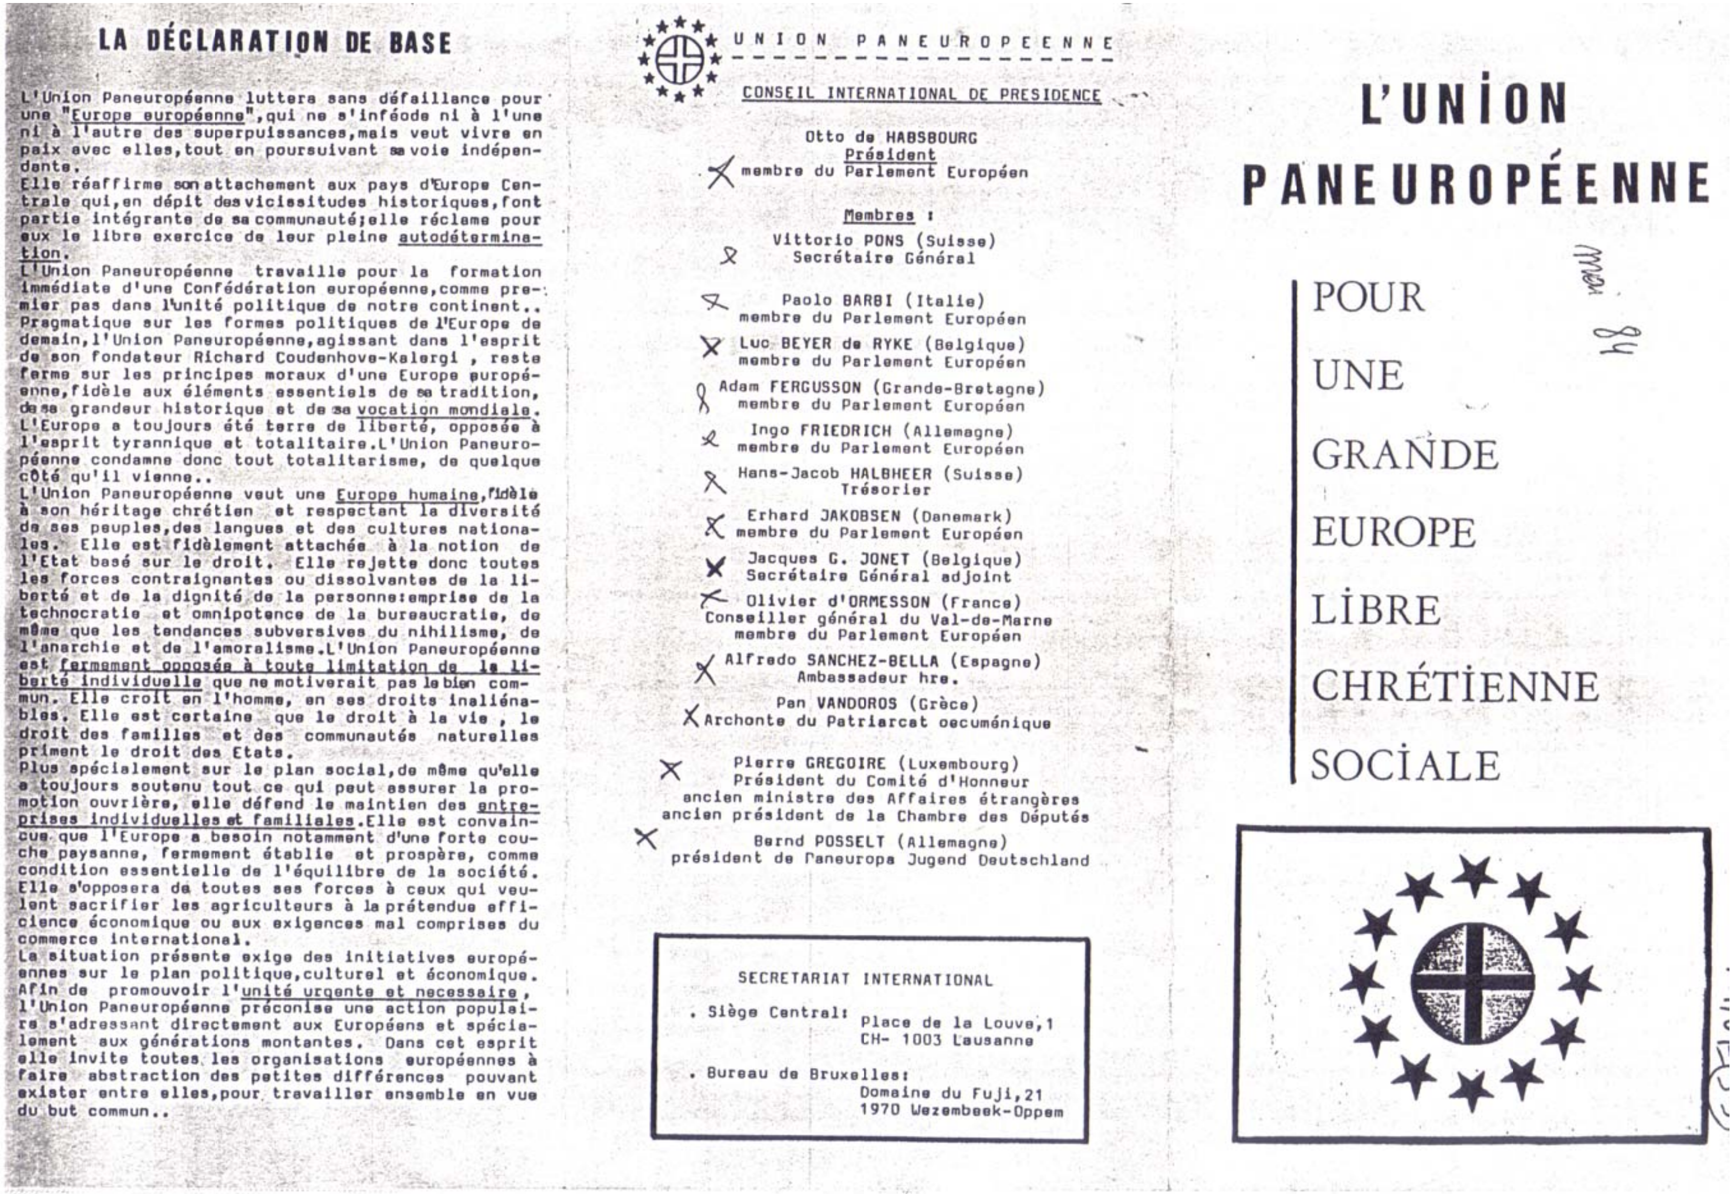
Devant le nombre énorme de sujets à traiter, notamment au cours des séances plénières, il est essentiel que des priorités soient clairement définies afin de ne pas perdre de temps.

C'est pourquoi le Groupe d'Action Paneuropéen a déjà commencé à annoncer ses priorités et à déposer des pétitions signées par ses parlementaires afin que soient mises à l'ordre du jour du Parlement les questions sur lesquelles celui-ci doit prendre position d'urgence.

Principes de base de l'Union Paneuropéenne.

La Charte Paneuropéenne constitue l'instrument de travail sur lequel s'appuient les personnalités de ce Groupe d'Action.

Below : PEU leaflet produced by MAUE for the European Parliament elections, May 1984



LA DÉCLARATION DE BASE

L'Union Paneuropéenne luttera sans défaillance pour une "Europe européenne", qui ne s'inféode ni à l'une ni à l'autre des superpuissances, mais veut vivre en paix avec elles, tout en poursuivant sa voie indépendante.

Elle réaffirme son attachement aux pays d'Europe Centrale qui, en dépit des vicissitudes historiques, font partie intégrante de sa communauté; elle réclame pour eux le libre exercice de leur pleine autodétermination.

L'Union Paneuropéenne travaille pour la formation immédiate d'une Confédération européenne, comme premier pas dans l'unité politique de notre continent.. Pragmatique sur les formes politiques de l'Europe de demain, l'Union Paneuropéenne, agissant dans l'esprit de son fondateur Richard Coudenhove-Kalergi, reste ferme sur les principes moraux d'une Europe européenne, fidèle aux éléments essentiels de sa tradition, de sa grandeur historique et de sa vocation mondiale.

L'Europe a toujours été terre de liberté, opposée à l'esprit tyrannique et totalitaire. L'Union Paneuropéenne condamne donc tout totalitarisme, de quelque côté qu'il vienne..

L'Union Paneuropéenne veut une Europe humaine, fidèle à son héritage chrétien et respectant la diversité de ses peuples, des langues et des cultures nationales. Elle est fidèlement attachée à la notion de l'Etat basé sur le droit. Elle rejette donc toutes les forces contraignantes ou dissolvantes de la liberté et de la dignité de la personne: emprise de la technocratie et omnipotence de la bureaucratie, de même que les tendances subversives du nihilisme, de l'anarchie et de l'amoralisme. L'Union Paneuropéenne est fermement opposée à toute limitation de la liberté individuelle que ne motiverait pas le bien commun. Elle croit en l'homme, en ses droits inaliénables. Elle est certaine que le droit à la vie, le droit des familles et des communautés naturelles priment le droit des Etats.

Plus spécialement sur le plan social, de même qu'elle a toujours soutenu tout ce qui peut assurer la promotion ouvrière, elle défend le maintien des entreprises individuelles et familiales. Elle est convaincue que l'Europe a besoin notamment d'une forte couche paysanne, fermement établie et prospère, comme condition essentielle de l'équilibre de la société. Elle s'opposera de toutes ses forces à ceux qui veulent sacrifier les agriculteurs à la prétendue efficience économique ou aux exigences mal comprises du commerce international.

La situation présente exige des initiatives européennes sur le plan politique, culturel et économique. Afin de promouvoir l'unité urgente et necessaire, l'Union Paneuropéenne préconise une action populaire s'adressant directement aux Européens et spécialement aux générations montantes. Dans cet esprit elle invite toutes les organisations européennes à faire abstraction des petites différences pouvant exister entre elles, pour travailler ensemble en vue du but commun..

L'UNION PANEUROPÉENNE

mai 84

POUR
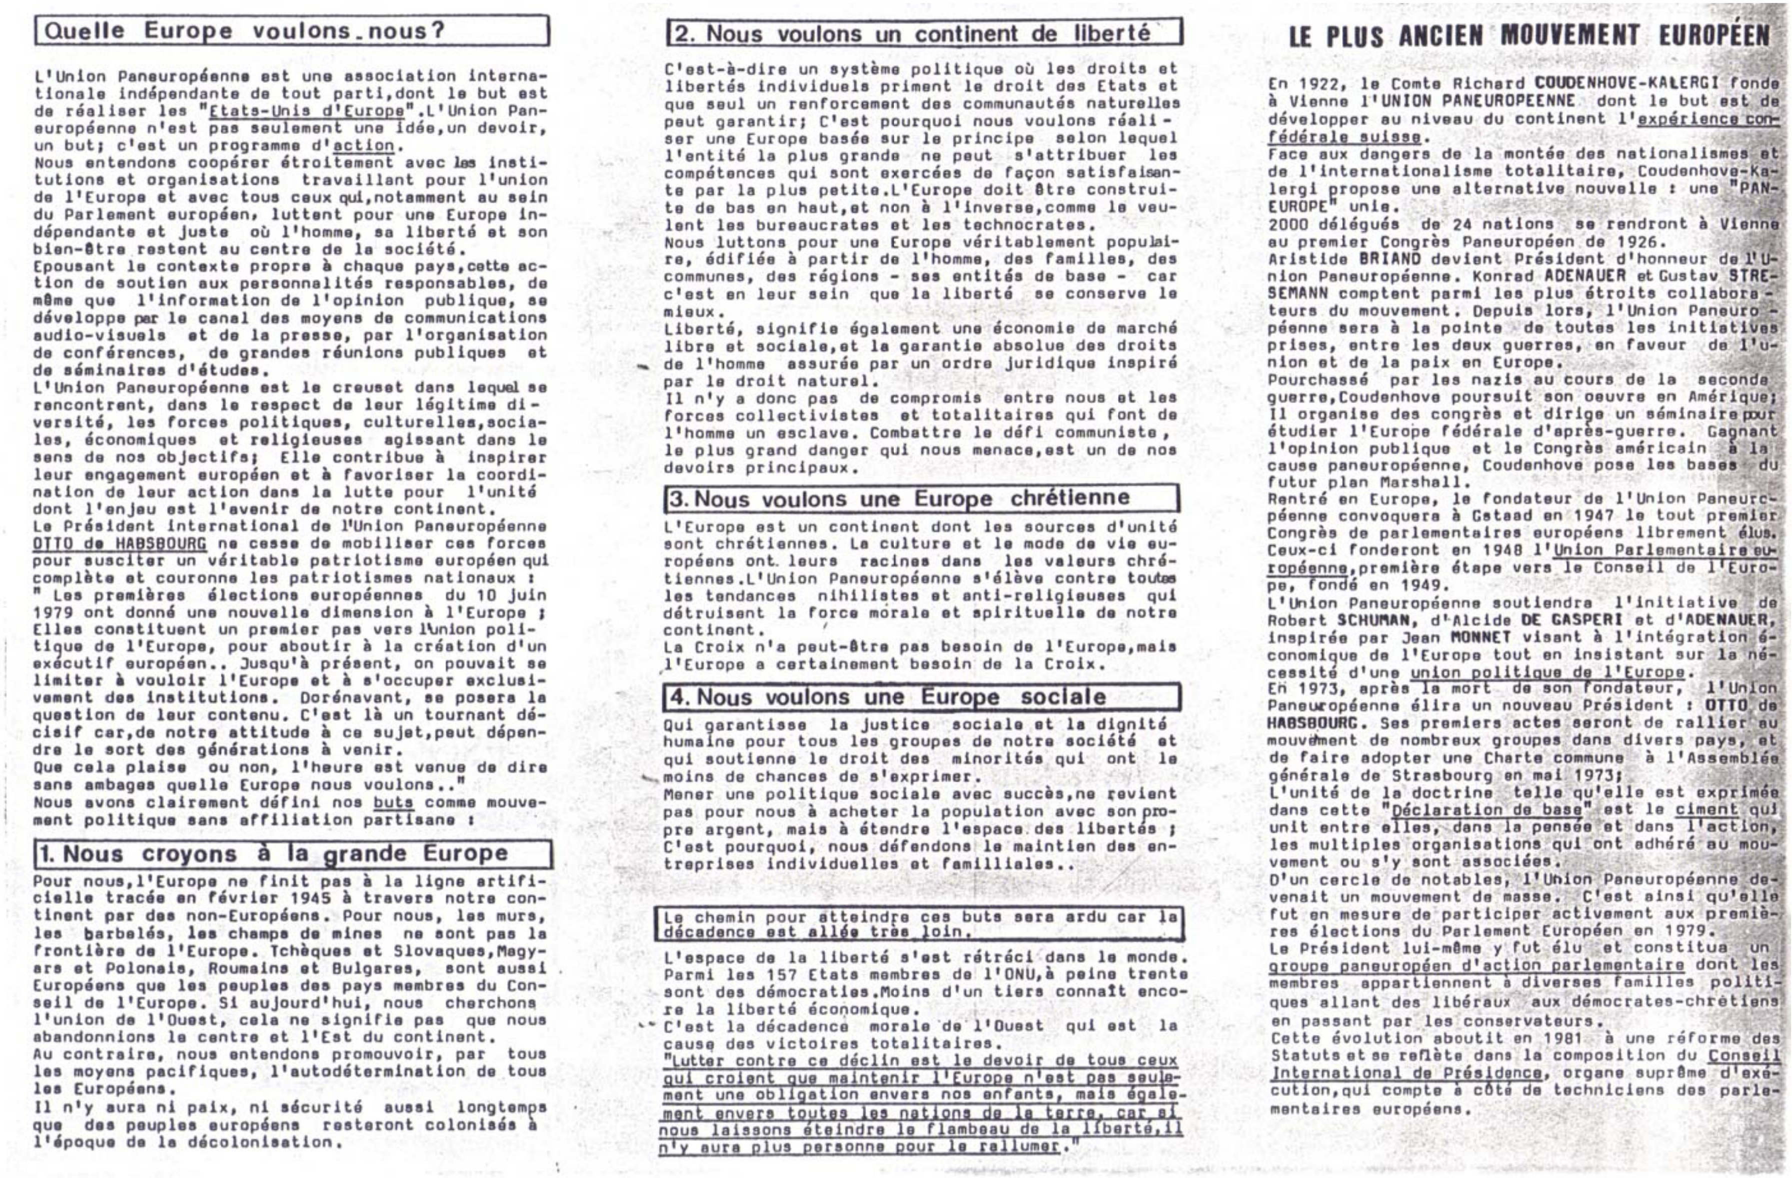
LIBRE
CHRÉTIENNE
SOCIALE



Quelle Europe voulons-nous?

L'Union Paneuropéenne est une association internationale indépendante de tout parti, dont le but est de réaliser les "États-Unis d'Europe". L'Union Paneuropéenne n'est pas seulement une idée, un devoir, un but; c'est un programme d'action.
Nous entendons coopérer étroitement avec les institutions et organisations travaillant pour l'union de l'Europe et avec tous ceux qui, notamment au sein du Parlement européen, luttent pour une Europe indépendante et juste où l'homme, sa liberté et son bien-être restent au centre de la société.
Épousant le contexte propre à chaque pays, cette action de soutien aux personnalités responsables, de même que l'information de l'opinion publique, se développe par le canal des moyens de communications audio-visuels et de la presse, par l'organisation de conférences, de grandes réunions publiques et de séminaires d'études.
L'Union Paneuropéenne est le creuset dans lequel se rencontrent, dans le respect de leur légitime diversité, les forces politiques, culturelles, sociales, économiques et religieuses agissant dans le sens de nos objectifs; Elle contribue à inspirer leur engagement européen et à favoriser la coordination de leur action dans la lutte pour l'unité dont l'enjeu est l'avenir de notre continent.
Le Président international de l'Union Paneuropéenne OTTO de HABSBOURG ne cesse de mobiliser ces forces pour susciter un véritable patriotisme européen qui complète et couronne les patriotismes nationaux :
" Les premières élections européennes du 10 juin 1979 ont donné une nouvelle dimension à l'Europe ; Elles constituent un premier pas vers l'union politique de l'Europe, pour aboutir à la création d'un exécutif européen.. Jusqu'à présent, on pouvait se limiter à vouloir l'Europe et à s'occuper exclusivement des institutions. Dorénavant, se posera la question de leur contenu. C'est là un tournant décisif car, de notre attitude à ce sujet, peut dépendre le sort des générations à venir.
Que cela plaise ou non, l'heure est venue de dire sans ambages quelle Europe nous voulons.."
Nous avons clairement défini nos buts comme mouvement politique sans affiliation partisane :

1. Nous croyons à la grande Europe

Pour nous, l'Europe ne finit pas à la ligne artificielle tracée en février 1945 à travers notre continent par des non-Européens. Pour nous, les murs, les barbelés, les champs de mines ne sont pas la frontière de l'Europe. Tchèques et Slovaques, Magyars et Polonais, Roumains et Bulgares, sont aussi Européens que les peuples des pays membres du Conseil de l'Europe. Si aujourd'hui, nous cherchons l'union de l'Ouest, cela ne signifie pas que nous abandonnions le centre et l'Est du continent.
Au contraire, nous entendons promouvoir, par tous les moyens pacifiques, l'autodétermination de tous les Européens.
Il n'y aura ni paix, ni sécurité aussi longtemps que des peuples européens resteront colonisés à l'époque de la décolonisation.

2. Nous voulons un continent de liberté

C'est-à-dire un système politique où les droits et libertés individuels priment le droit des États et que seul un renforcement des communautés naturelles peut garantir; C'est pourquoi nous voulons réaliser une Europe basée sur le principe selon lequel l'entité la plus grande ne peut s'attribuer les compétences qui sont exercées de façon satisfaisante par la plus petite. L'Europe doit être construite de bas en haut, et non à l'inverse, comme le veulent les bureaucrates et les technocrates.
Nous luttons pour une Europe véritablement populaire, édifiée à partir de l'homme, des familles, des communes, des régions - ses entités de base - car c'est en leur sein que la liberté se conserve le mieux.
Liberté, signifie également une économie de marché libre et sociale, et la garantie absolue des droits de l'homme assurée par un ordre juridique inspiré par le droit naturel.
Il n'y a donc pas de compromis entre nous et les forces collectivistes et totalitaires qui font de l'homme un esclave. Combattre le défi communiste, le plus grand danger qui nous menace, est un de nos devoirs principaux.

3. Nous voulons une Europe chrétienne

L'Europe est un continent dont les sources d'unité sont chrétiennes. La culture et le mode de vie européens ont leurs racines dans les valeurs chrétiennes. L'Union Paneuropéenne s'élève contre toutes les tendances nihilistes et anti-religieuses qui détruisent la force morale et spirituelle de notre continent.
La Croix n'a peut-être pas besoin de l'Europe, mais l'Europe a certainement besoin de la Croix.

4. Nous voulons une Europe sociale

Qui garantisse la justice sociale et la dignité humaine pour tous les groupes de notre société et qui soutienne le droit des minorités qui ont le moins de chances de s'exprimer.
Mener une politique sociale avec succès, ne revient pas pour nous à acheter la population avec son propre argent, mais à étendre l'espace des libertés ; C'est pourquoi, nous défendons le maintien des entreprises individuelles et familiales.

Le chemin pour atteindre ces buts sera ardu car la décadence est allée très loin.

L'espace de la liberté s'est rétréci dans le monde. Parmi les 157 États membres de l'ONU, à peine trente sont des démocraties. Moins d'un tiers connaît encore la liberté économique.
C'est la décadence morale de l'Ouest qui est la cause des victoires totalitaires.
"Lutter contre ce déclin est le devoir de tous ceux qui croient que maintenir l'Europe n'est pas seulement une obligation envers nos enfants, mais également envers toutes les nations de la terre, car si nous laissons éteindre le flambeau de la liberté, il n'y aura plus personne pour le rallumer."

LE PLUS ANCIEN MOUVEMENT EUROPÉEN

En 1922, le Comte Richard COUDENHOVE-KALERGI fonde à Vienne l'UNION PANEUROPEENNE dont le but est de développer au niveau du continent l'expérience confédérale suisse.
Face aux dangers de la montée des nationalismes et de l'internationalisme totalitaire, Coudenhove-Kalergi propose une alternative nouvelle : une "PAN-EUROPE" unie.
2000 délégués de 24 nations se rendront à Vienne au premier Congrès Paneuropéen de 1926.
Aristide BRIAND devient Président d'honneur de l'Union Paneuropéenne. Konrad ADENAUER et Gustav STRESEMANN comptent parmi les plus étroits collaborateurs du mouvement. Depuis lors, l'Union Paneuropéenne sera à la pointe de toutes les initiatives prises, entre les deux guerres, en faveur de l'union et de la paix en Europe.
Pourchassé par les nazis au cours de la seconde guerre, Coudenhove poursuit son oeuvre en Amérique; Il organise des congrès et dirige un séminaire pour étudier l'Europe fédérale d'après-guerre. Gagnant l'opinion publique et le Congrès américain à la cause paneuropéenne, Coudenhove pose les bases du futur plan Marshall.
Rentré en Europe, le fondateur de l'Union Paneuropéenne convoquera à Gstaad en 1947 le tout premier Congrès de parlementaires européens librement élus. Ceux-ci fonderont en 1948 l'Union Parlementaire européenne, première étape vers le Conseil de l'Europe, fondé en 1949.
L'Union Paneuropéenne soutiendra l'initiative de Robert SCHUMAN, d'Alcide DE GASPERI et d'ADENAUER, inspirée par Jean MONNET visant à l'intégration économique de l'Europe tout en insistant sur la nécessité d'une union politique de l'Europe.
En 1973, après la mort de son fondateur, l'Union Paneuropéenne élira un nouveau Président : OTTO de HABSBOURG. Ses premiers actes seront de rallier au mouvement de nombreux groupes dans divers pays, et de faire adopter une Charte commune à l'Assemblée générale de Strasbourg en mai 1973;
L'unité de la doctrine telle qu'elle est exprimée dans cette "Déclaration de base" est le ciment qui unit entre elles, dans la pensée et dans l'action, les multiples organisations qui ont adhéré au mouvement ou s'y sont associées.
D'un cercle de notables, l'Union Paneuropéenne devenait un mouvement de masse. C'est ainsi qu'elle fut en mesure de participer activement aux premières élections du Parlement Européen en 1979.
Le Président lui-même y fut élu et constitua un groupe paneuropéen d'action parlementaire dont les membres appartiennent à diverses familles politiques allant des libéraux aux démocrates-chrétiens en passant par les conservateurs.
Cette évolution aboutit en 1981 à une réforme des Statuts et se reflète dans la composition du Conseil International de Présidence, organe suprême d'exécution, qui compte à côté de techniciens des parlementaires européens.

BUTS COMMUNS DE L'ACTION DES ÉLUS DE L'UNION PANEUROPÉENNE AU PARLEMENT EUROPÉEN

Les députés européens membres de l'Union Paneuropéenne ont rédigé un document de travail sur les buts communs de leur action au Parlement européen.
Le document affirme :

- CITOYENNETÉ COMMUNAUTAIRE

  Nous demandons l'institution d'une citoyenneté européenne pour tous ceux qui sont citoyens des Etats communautaires. Cette citoyenneté devrait résulter d'un passeport européen commun.

- OUVERTURE DES FRONTIÈRES

  Les contrôles douaniers entre tous les Etats communautaires devraient être abolis dès que possible, en particulier pour la circulation des personnes privées. Ceci n'exclu pas que, pour des motifs de sécurité – par exemple la recherche de terroristes – des contrôles exceptionnels puissent avoir lieu aux frontières.

- DROIT DE VOTE

  Une des principales tâches du nouveau Parlement sera d'élaborer un droit de vote européen. Il devra être établi d'après le principe du droit de l'électeur de voter pour le candidat qu'il préfère et devra rapprocher le plus possible le candidat de l'électeur. Il est donc nécessaire d'instaurer des circonscriptions électorales en lieu et place des listes bloquées.

- POLITIQUE ÉTRANGÈRE

  La politique étrangère doit continuer sur la base de la Coopération Politique Européenne – CPE –. Nous prônons la réalisation du Plan Fouchet-Cattani mis à jour dans l'esprit du Plan Tindemans. Le Conseil Européen doit conserver le droit d'établir les grandes lignes de la politique étrangère...

- POLITIQUE DE DÉFENSE

  La politique de défense communautaire doit se concentrer surtout sur la création d'une industrie d'armements européenne autonome afin de rendre l'Europe, dans ce domaine, indépendante des autres grandes puissances. Conformément au Plan Tindemans nous demandons une standardisation des systèmes d'armements européens.

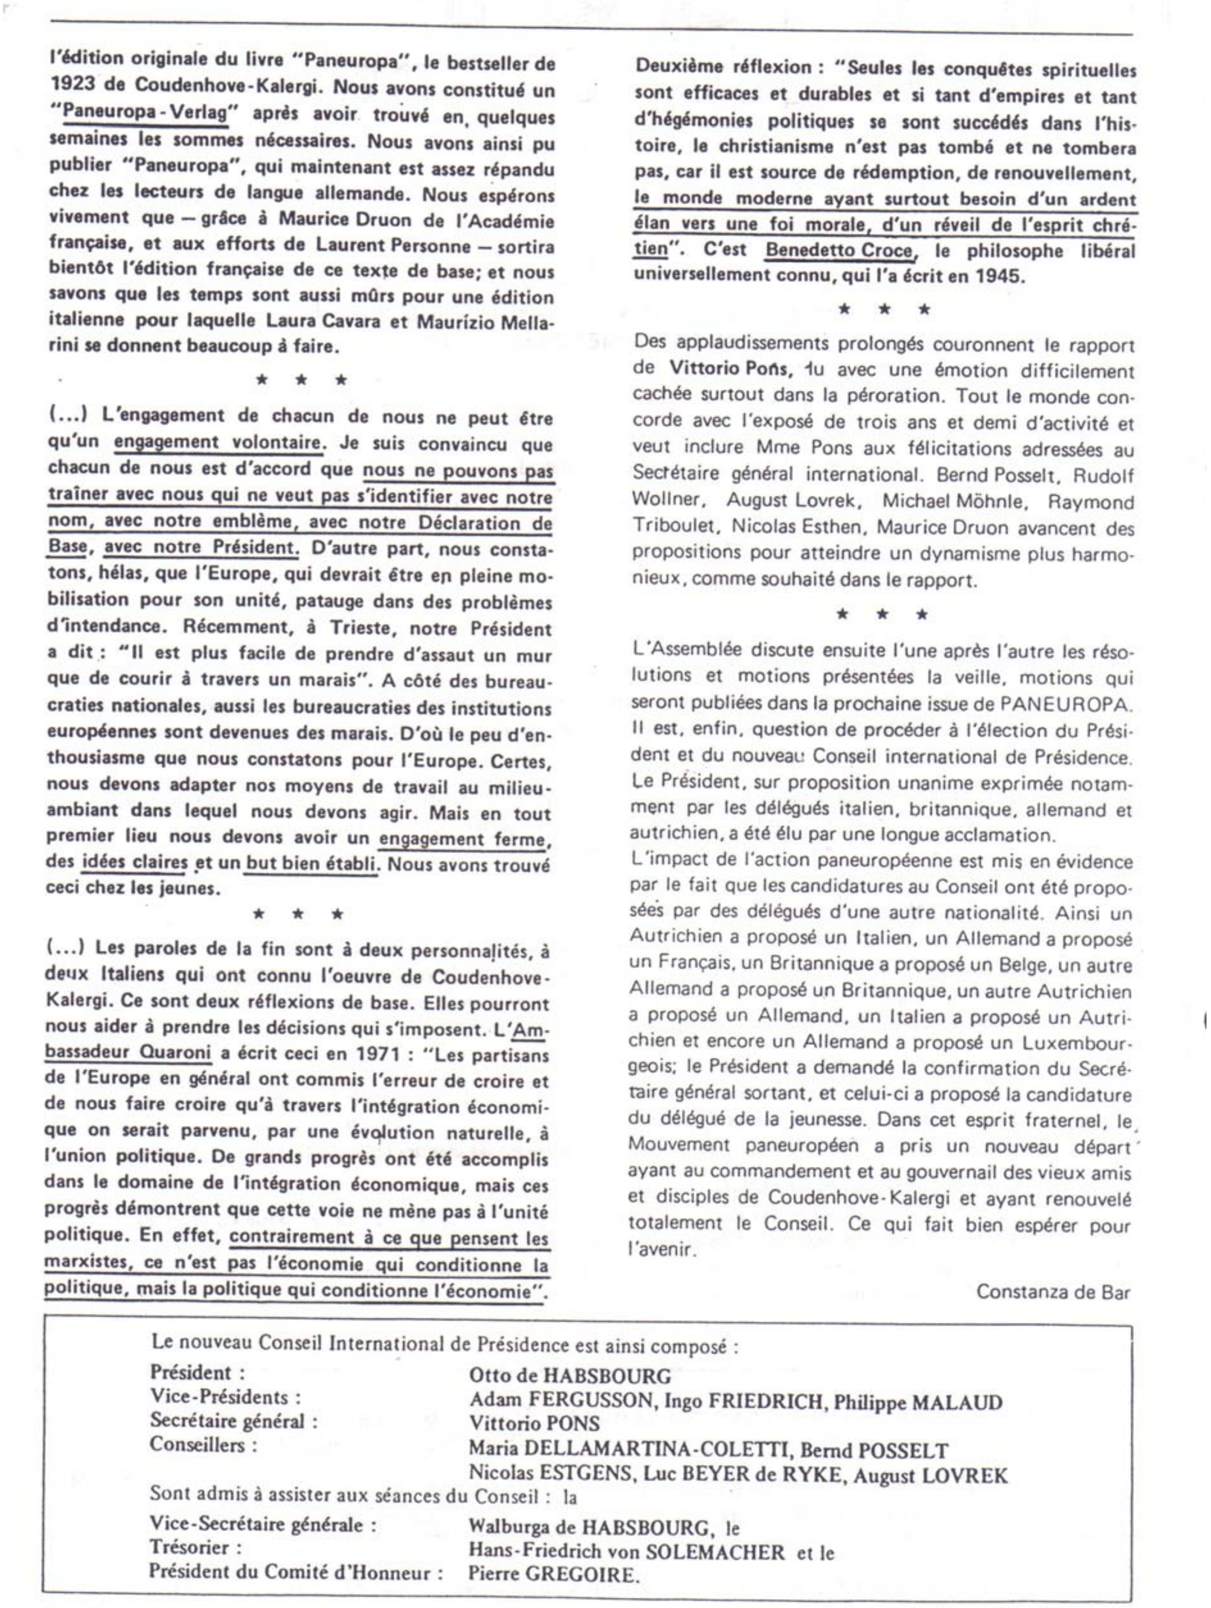
IN NECESSARIIS UNITAS · IN DUBIIS LIBERTAS · IN OMNIBUS CARITAS



l'édition originale du livre "Paneuropa", le bestseller de 1923 de Coudenhove-Kalergi. Nous avons constitué un "Paneuropa-Verlag" après avoir trouvé en quelques semaines les sommes nécessaires. Nous avons ainsi pu publier "Paneuropa", qui maintenant est assez répandu chez les lecteurs de langue allemande. Nous espérons vivement que — grâce à Maurice Druon de l'Académie française, et aux efforts de Laurent Personne — sortira bientôt l'édition française de ce texte de base; et nous savons que les temps sont aussi mûrs pour une édition italienne pour laquelle Laura Cavara et Maurizio Mellarini se donnent beaucoup à faire.

(...) L'engagement de chacun de nous ne peut être qu'un engagement volontaire. Je suis convaincu que chacun de nous est d'accord que nous ne pouvons pas traîner avec nous qui ne veut pas s'identifier avec notre nom, avec notre emblème, avec notre Déclaration de Base, avec notre Président. D'autre part, nous constatons, hélas, que l'Europe, qui devrait être en pleine mobilisation pour son unité, patauge dans des problèmes d'intendance. Récemment, à Trieste, notre Président a dit : "Il est plus facile de prendre d'assaut un mur que de courir à travers un marais". A côté des bureaucraties nationales, aussi les bureaucraties des institutions européennes sont devenues des marais. D'où le peu d'enthousiasme que nous constatons pour l'Europe. Certes, nous devons adapter nos moyens de travail au milieu-ambiant dans lequel nous devons agir. Mais en tout premier lieu nous devons avoir un engagement ferme, des idées claires et un but bien établi. Nous avons trouvé ceci chez les jeunes.

Deuxième réflexion : "Seules les conquêtes spirituelles sont efficaces et durables et si tant d'empires et tant d'hégémonies politiques se sont succédés dans l'histoire, le christianisme n'est pas tombé et ne tombera pas, car il est source de rédemption, de renouvellement, le monde moderne ayant surtout besoin d'un ardent élan vers une foi morale, d'un réveil de l'esprit chrétien". C'est Benedetto Croce, le philosophe libéral universellement connu, qui l'a écrit en 1945.

Des applaudissements prolongés couronnent le rapport de Vittorio Pons, lu avec une émotion difficilement cachée surtout dans la péroration. Tout le monde concorde avec l'exposé de trois ans et demi d'activité et veut inclure Mme Pons aux félicitations adressées au Secrétaire général international. Bernd Posselt, Rudolf Wollner, August Lovrek, Michael Möhnle, Raymond Triboulet, Nicolas Esthen, Maurice Druon avancent des propositions pour atteindre un dynamisme plus harmonieux, comme souhaité dans le rapport.

L'Assemblée discute ensuite l'une après l'autre les résolutions et motions présentées la veille, motions qui seront publiées dans la prochaine issue de PANEUROPA. Il est, enfin, question de procéder à l'élection du Président et du nouveau Conseil international de Présidence. Le Président, sur proposition unanime exprimée notamment par les délégués italien, britannique, allemand et autrichien, a été élu par une longue acclamation.

L'impact de l'action paneuropéenne est mis en évidence par le fait que les candidatures au Conseil ont été proposées par des délégués d'une autre nationalité. Ainsi un Autrichien a proposé un Italien, un Allemand a proposé un Français, un Britannique a proposé un Belge, un autre Allemand a proposé un Britannique, un autre Autrichien a proposé un Allemand, un Italien a proposé un Autrichien et encore un Allemand a proposé un Luxembourgeois; le Président a demandé la confirmation du Secrétaire général sortant, et celui-ci a proposé la candidature du délégué de la jeunesse. Dans cet esprit fraternel, le Mouvement paneuropéen a pris un nouveau départ ayant au commandement et au gouvernail des vieux amis et disciples de Coudenhove-Kalergi et ayant renouvelé totalement le Conseil. Ce qui fait bien espérer pour l'avenir.

RENIFLEURS la vérité

Une "opération douteuse" que cette affaire des avions renifleurs de pétrole. Une opération qui a coûté à la compagnie Elf-Erap quelques milliards de francs français, quelques dizaines de milliards de francs belges.

Une opération qui s'est achevée avec la disparition pure et simple de 500 millions de FF, soit quelque 3.5 milliards de FB (valeur 1979), dont on n'a jamais retrouvé la trace.

L'affaire a fait couler beaucoup d'encre. Expérience scientifique malheureuse? Arnaque d'escrocs professionnels? Ou "montage" en vue de financer un groupe d'influence occulte? "Le Canard Enchaîné", "Libération", "Minute", "Le Point", en France, "Le Soir", "Pour", "Le Pourquoi Pas?" en Belgique, se sont attachés à démonter le mécanisme de ce qui apparaît bien comme l'une des plus belles escroqueries du siècle. Un livre a été écrit par Pierre Péan, un des journalistes français qui a mené l'enquête. Le lecteur reste sur sa faim: le livre s'achève par une myriade de points d'interrogation. Les pistes lancées sont tellement nombreuses qu'il s'avère impossible d'en choisir une. A tous ceux qui ont écrit à propos de l'affaire des avions renifleurs, il manquait des preuves.

Ces preuves, nous les possédons et nous les révélons. Que démontrent-elles? Vous le saurez en suivant pas à pas l'enquête que nous avons menée à son terme.

L'affaire des "renifleurs" est bien plus qu'une simple escroquerie.

AUFRUF ZUR UNTERSTÜTZUNG DER WIDERSTANDSBEWEGUNG IN NICARAGUA

Die Zukunft der Demokratie wird zur Zeit in Nicaragua herausgefordert. Es ist einer totalitären Partei (FSLN) nach vier Jahren Diktatur (Mai 1980 – November 1984) nicht gelungen, den Widerstand eines Volkes zu brechen. Wie die Wahlen gezeigt haben und ungeachtet des durch die FSLN ausgeübten Druckes, hat mehr als die Hälfte der nicaraguanischen Wähler ihr die Zustimmung verweigert.

Die Ankündigung des Ausnahmezustandes zeigt, daß nach der relativen Freiheit, welche die Wahlen geschaffen haben, das politische Ziel der FSLN weiterhin die Errichtung eines totalitären Regimes in Nicaragua bleibt. Deshalb sind wir der Meinung, daß Hilfe für die bewaffneten und zivilen Sektoren der Opposition unentbehrlich ist, damit die Nicaraguaner sich von der Diktatur einer totalitären Partei befreien und ihre politische Zukunft frei wählen können.

Diese Gründe veranlassen uns, den Kongreß der USA im Geiste demokratischer Solidarität zu bitten, dem nicaraguanischen Widerstand weiterhin Hilfe zu gewähren.

Die Leistung dieser Hilfe ist aus strategischen Gesichtspunkten heraus notwendig: Die sandinistische Junta hat niemals verheimlicht, daß ihr Ziel die Integrierung von ganz Mittelamerika in eine marxistisch-leninistische Einheit ist. In diesem Fall wären die USA gezwungen, sich aus einem ihrer überseeischen Hauptverträge zu lösen, und das ist genau das von der sowjetischen Strategie angestrebte Ziel: daß die Vereinigten Staaten sich aus den Regionen zurückziehen, die für sie selbst und für die freie Welt von vitaler Bedeutung sind. Insofern ist das Problem Mittelamerikas auch ein europäisches Problem. Diese Hilfe ist aus moralischen Gründen überdies notwendig. Der Westen muß konsequent in der Unterstützung sein, die er denen erweist, die für jene unverzichtbaren Rechte kämpfen, die Ihre Unabhängigkeitserklärung als solches deklariert hat und die folglich allen gehören müßten.

Wir erklären gegenüber dem Kongreß der USA: Wenn Sie denen die Hilfe verweigern, die diese Rechte auszuüben suchen, käme das Ihrerseits einer Verleugnung des Geistes Ihres eigenen Landes gleich. Im Falle eines Scheiterns in Nicaragua wird die strategische Situation der USA weniger schwerwiegend sein als der Verrat der Prinzipien, auf welche Ihr Land gegründet worden ist. Die Freiheit der Nicaraguaner ist Ihre Freiheit und unsere. In diesem Sinne ist sie unteilbar. Wenn Sie in Nicaragua scheitern, dann haben wir das Recht, Sie zu fragen: Wo werden Sie das nächste Mal scheitern? Wenn die Freiheit und die Demokratie es nicht wert sind, in Ihrer eigenen Hemisphäre verteidigt zu werden.

Die freie Welt erwartet Ihre Antwort – und ihre Feinde.

DÉSTABILISATION

L'étrange projet «Crec»

Nouvelles révélations : au début des années 70, les milieux conservateurs belges avaient de bien douteuses fréquentations.

« Ils vont trop vite et trop loin. » Dans les états-majors politiques, les travaux de la commission parlementaire d'enquête sur le banditisme et le terrorisme commencent à déranger beaucoup de monde. Certains affirment que les « limiers » prennent trop facilement pour argent comptant des témoignages sujets à caution. D'autres estiment, au contraire, qu'ils « se poussent trop devant les caméras ». De mauvaises querelles sans doute, motivées par la jalousie. Il est vrai que la commission occupe, depuis les « révélations » d'un ex-gendarme sur l'existence d'un projet de déstabilisation de la Belgique, la « une » de l'actualité. Des propos sujets à caution ? Sans doute. Ils renforcent, cependant, les déclarations de magistrats en fonction ou à la retraite qui accusent leurs pairs de « bloquer » les enquêtes en cours. Reste maintenant à établir pourquoi ces « redresseurs de torts » n'ont pas dénoncé ces « sabotages » plus tôt. En agissant ainsi, ils n'en auraient pas été les complices silencieux... Plusieurs observateurs soupçonnent d'ailleurs certains témoins de vouloir profiter de l'intérêt de l'opinion publique pour les travaux de la commission : ils aimeraient régler des comptes et embrouiller davantage des dossiers judiciaires qui sont, par nature, extrêmement complexes.

Les travaux des députés enquêteurs ne sont cependant pas inutiles. D'abord, parce que André Bourgeois (CVP), président de la commission, et ses « limiers » redonnent espoir à bon nombre de citoyens qui doutaient de voir élucidées un jour les énigmes judiciaires qui défraient la chronique depuis 1978. Ensuite, parce que l'on peut maintenant affirmer avec certitude que l'« on » a voulu enrayer les enquêtes des policiers chargés de faire la lumière sur ces dossiers brûlants. Pour éviter la découverte d'une entreprise de déstabilisation ? Cette rumeur ne date pas d'aujourd'hui. En 1936, déjà, un général de gendarmerie a été soupçonné d'avoir voulu prendre le pouvoir. Plus tard, en 1947, en pleine guerre froide, des cercles anticommunistes, liés au monde du renseignement, ont également semé la panique en affirmant que l'URSS parachutait des armes dans les Ardennes. Celles-ci, juraient-ils, devaient équiper des commandos d'ex-résistants qui voulaient marcher sur la rue de la Loi. Les milieux gouvernementaux ont alors pris peur, forçant le ministère de l'Intérieur à créer une cellule de crise disposant d'un réseau indépendant de liaison radio.

Durant la « Question royale », des partisans de Léopold III ont également songé à remettre le souverain sur le trône en utilisant la manière forte. Au début des années 60, c'est encore dans ces cercles ultra-conservateurs, hostiles à l'indépendance du Congo, que l'on a beaucoup évoqué l'idée d'utiliser des mercenaires pour s'emparer du pouvoir. Quelques années plus tard, en 1966, lorsque l'Otan s'est installée en Belgique, un député de l'Union de la gauche socialiste (UGS), une formation d'extrême gauche aujourd'hui disparue, a même affirmé que les milieux atlantistes belges étudiaient un plan de coup d'Etat baptisé « Opé-

CONFIDENTIEL

LISBOA 19 MAI 1969

Guérin - Serac.

Messieurs ,

Il convient de faire le point de notre progression dans la tâche entreprise pour constituer le C R E C .

Je dois reconnaitre que nous n'avons pas beaucoup avancé depuis le début de l'année , c'est-à-dire depuis l'accord de principe obtenu sur les deux synthèses .
Il y a des raisons à ce retard dont les principales sont :

- les difficultés dans lesquelles est plongé le groupe ami Italien ,du fait de la situation chaotique et révolutionnaire de leur pays .
- les tendances centrifuges du groupe Français dont la reconversion n'est pas encore terminée .

Nous ne devons pas pour autant arrêter nos efforts .

Lors d'une réunion préparatoire franco-belge réalisée à Bruxelles en Mars , nous avions convenu du plan de travail suivant :

A- Définition des positions politiques élémentaires sur l'unité de l'Europe .

B- Définition des objectifs et recherche d'une stratégie.

C- Organisation générale du C R E C : bases et statuts de fonctionnement .

D- Préparation d'un plan politique et d'un plan psychologique à mettre en oeuvre par le C R E C

E- Organisation d'une commission financière .

Au cours de la réunion de Vienne au début de ce mois , il a été suggéré d'établir un plan-questionnaire destiné à faciliter l'expression , la classification et le rapprochement des idées politiques des divers groupes en présence sur l'unité de l'Europe .
Vous trouverez donc ci-joint un questionnaire qui correspond aux paragraphes A et B du plan ci dessus .

Je vous invite à m'adresser les réponses et les exposés que vous aimeriez y ajouter .

Je prends à ma charge le soin d'en faire la synthèse, - éventuellement de relever les oppositions ou les différences trop accusées et de rechercher avec les intéressés la conciliation nécessaire - enfin de vous soumettre ensuite des conclusions .

Avec mes sentiments très cordiaux .

ration Prométhée ». L'information n'était pas dénuée de fondement mais l'UGS s'était trompée d'heure et de lieu : en effet, c'est en 1967, en Grèce, que le coup d'Etat s'est produit. Et ce sont des colonels d'extrême droite qui ont renversé la démocratie. D'autres projets ont encore défrayé la chronique en 1973, en 1978 et, plus récemment, dans le cadre de l'enquête sur l'assassinat de l'ingénieur commercial de la FN Juan « Tonio » Mendez (Voir Le Vif/L'Express du 27 novembre 1987 et suivants).

Des documents découverts par Le Vif/L'Express permettent aujourd'hui d'affirmer qu'à partir de la fin des années 60 et jusqu'à la moitié des années 70, les milieux ultra-conservateurs belges, partisans d'une grande Europe anticommuniste, ont entretenu des contacts discrets avec des hommes de main susceptibles d'effectuer (et de réussir) des opérations de déstabilisation. Basé à Lisbonne sous la couverture « d'Aginter-Presse », ainsi que du mouvement « Ordre et tradition », ce groupe d'extrême droite était dirigé par Yves Guérin-Sérac, l'ancien membre de l'OAS, l'organisation terroriste française hostile à l'indépendance de l'Algérie. « Aginter-Presse » a notamment travaillé pour la Pide, la police politique de la dictature portugaise ; pour la Kyp, le service secret des colonels grecs ; pour le Boss, l'agence sud-africaine de renseignements, ainsi que les policiers espagnols chargés d'éliminer les indépendantistes basques. En Italie, elle a également été mêlée aux tentatives de coup d'Etat fomentées par la loge maçonnique P2. Plusieurs hommes de main d'Aginter-Presse se sont enfuis en Amérique du Sud, où ils ont été recrutés par le « Servicio especial de securitad » (SES) bolivien. Un service spécial dépendant du ministère de l'Intérieur et financé par les trafiquants d'héroïne. En Italie et en Espagne, d'autres ont été mêlés à des assassinats collectifs ressemblant, par certains aspects, aux tueries du Brabant (ils tiraient indistinctement dans la foule).

Au début des années 70, Guerin-Serac entretient des rapports étroits avec un certain Edmond Damman. Ce dernier, militant actif de la cause de l'Europe chrétienne et anticommuniste, est bien introduit dans les milieux conservateurs belges. Il fréquente les membres en vue du Cercle des nations, de la Ligue internationale de la liberté, et d'autres clubs d'où sortiront, par la suite, les cadres du Cepic, l'aile droite du PSC. En outre, il organise des « Dîners Charlemagne » où se presse le Tout-Bruxelles conservateur. Affable, Damman joue les intermédiaires. Il met en rapport des hommes d'affaires honnêtes avec des financiers véreux, de vrais nobles avec des demi-mondaines et de faux princes avec des demoiselles à marier.

Mais derrière sa façade d'homme serviable, Damman, dont le nom sera, beaucoup plus tard, cité dans le scandale des « avions renifleurs » (une affaire d'escroquerie, qui a coûté des milliards de francs au gouvernement français), ne perd rien de ce qui se dit. Il recueille de nombreuses confidences qu'il reproduit quotidiennement sur des fiches Personnalités politiques, militants d'extrême droite, financiers.

AGENCE INTERNATIONALE DE PRESSE

Aginter-Presse était implantée partout.

Est-ce ce fichier, ainsi que les portes qu'il pourrait lui ouvrir, qui intéressait Guerin-Serac ? Il est certain, en tout cas, que Damman et le « patron » d'Aginter-Presse se sont beaucoup vus. Ils ont également échangé une abondante correspondance restée, jusqu'à présent, inédite. Entre 1969 et 1974, les deux hommes ont notamment jeté, avec l'aide « d'amis italiens et français », les bases d'une structure anticommuniste secrète baptisée « Crec ». Une réunion s'est d'ailleurs tenue à Paris, en mars 1969, au cours de laquelle un questionnaire visant a établir des « objectifs », ainsi que des « éléments de stratégie », a été établi. Damman était-il dupé par Guerin-Serac ? Ignorait-il le rôle joué par le chef d'Aginter-Presse dans les nombreux attentats qui ensanglantaient alors l'Europe ? C'est possible. Aveuglé par son anticommunisme, l'ancien de l'OAS considérait, lui, la Belgique comme un « corps infecté ». Il accusait, notamment, une « cellule communiste de la poste » de lire le courrier qu'il échangeait avec Damman et il fulminait contre le gouvernement belge, qui venait de reconnaître la République populaire de Chine. Familier des « coups tordus », le mercenaire voulait en découdre. Y compris en Belgique. Cependant, après la chute de la dictature portugaise, en 1974, Guerin-Sérac a disparu dans la nature. Et nul ne sait si le « Crec » lui a survécu.

ORDRE ET TRADITION

C.F.

Lisboa le 26 mars 1969

Cher Monsieur DAMMAN,

Je vous remercie des aimables lettres des 19 et 20 mars qui m'apportent ici à l'extrême pointe du continent le souffle revigorant d'espérances européennes venues du coeur même de l'Europe !

Je suis également d'avis,si vous me le permettez de le donner,qu'il faut porter le maximum d'effort sur l'Académie et le Collège parce que c'est là que viendront les éléments les plus dynamiques et les plus agissants.Cependant , et vous avez encore raison,pour susciter un climat indispensable il faut toucher une élite plus large et plus diversifiée. Ecarter le Comte pour le remplacer par l'Archiduc est une solution,mais si elle se révèle impossible il est logique à mon sens d'envisager la création d'un autre organisme.

« Ordre et Tradition » servait également de couverture à Guérin-Sérac.

ASSISES DE LA DESINFORMATION (13-16 NOVEMBRE - NICE)

Puisque les temps changent, pourquoi s'étonner de voir certaines méthodes changer au même rythme? De nos jours la désinformation ne vise plus seulement certaines élites. Elle essaie d'utiliser l'opinion publique comme levier. Voilà qui donne tout son sens à la manifestation que nous organisons du 13 au 16 novembre à Nice: les premières Assises Internationales de la Désinformation. N'insistons pas sur l'intérêt d'un programme que vous pouvez découvrir de manière précise dans les pages centrales. Mais arrêtons-nous quelques instants sur certaines vérités, toujours bonnes à dire, en particulier sur la nécessité de concevoir la lutte contre la désinformation comme un tout. D'abord parce que le caractère global de la désinformation est amplement démontré. Ensuite parce qu'à partir du moment où celle-ci s'attaque au plus grand nombre, la présence d'un public nombreux a Nice est infiniment souhaitable. C'est la raison pour laquelle nous comptons sur vous pour qu'une fois de plus vous soyez associés à une démarche qui, depuis la création de notre Institut est en partie devenue la vôtre.

EDITORIAL L'ARME OFFENSIVE DE LA GUERRE MODERNE

Il n'y a pas beaucoup plus de dix ans que le mot «désinformation» est entré dans le Larousse en dix volumes: cependant, au Moyen-Age, Roland tombait sous ses coups à Roncevaux. Dans le Japon du XVIIIème siècle, le Samouraï Akaï-Gaki n'hésitait pas, pour venger le meurtre de son Daïmio, à affronter l'opprobre en se roulant aux trois-quarts ivre dans le ruisseau. Abusés par cet avilissement apparent, ses ennemis étaient amenés à tenir devant lui des propos qui lui permettraient de les démasquer et d'entraîner dans une vengeance sanglante les 46 Ro-Ninns légendaires, ses compagnons.

L'histoire abonde d'exemples qui nous prouvent que «induire en erreur, cacher ou travestir les faits en utilisant les techniques de l'information», pour reprendre la définition du Petit Robert 1989, constitue l'une des plus redoutables tactiques guerrières connues de l'homme. De nos jours, la désinformation prend, à mon sens, deux visages: celui de l'intoxication et celui, plus subtilement flou et peut-être encore plus efficace de la subversion.

L'intoxication consiste à accréditer auprès du public de masse des rumeurs propres à le tromper, le dérouter ou le démoraliser. C'est ainsi que, durant la guerre de 1914, nos grands-parents furent persuadés que tous les soldats allemands coupaient les mains des petits enfants français. Pendant la seconde guerre mondiale, des espions à la solde d'Hitler firent circuler le bruit que l'état-major soviétique serait prêt à collaborer avec l'Allemagne. Il en résulta que Staline, berné, décima le corps de ses officiers en en faisant exécuter la moitié.

Plus près de nous, la presse mondiale désigne sous le nom de «plus vieux prisonnier du monde» Nelson Mandela, lequel fêta son soixante-dixième anniversaire, entouré des siens, dans un séjour d'incarcération doré qu'il n'accepte pas de quitter, sauf en des occasions exceptionnelles, afin de ne pas compromettre une image légendaire qui aurait dû revenir à Rudolf Hess. Il a d'ailleurs récemment répondu à l'invitation de Pieter Botha bénéficiant d'une permission, faveur semblant prouver que le système pénal français a fait école dans le monde.

L'Afrique du Sud constitue, du reste, un terrain de choix où poursuivre la guerre idéologique dans laquelle sont passés maîtres les pays totalitaires est-européens assistés par Amnesty International: le procès de six noirs assassins d'un policier, de couleur lui aussi, monopolise les projecteurs des journalistes internationaux alors que les exactions commises par les sbires de Winnie Mandela retiennent à peine plus leur attention que les enfants noirs périssant dans d'atroces souffrances, un pneu enflammé autour du cou. Les «ghettos» de Soweto tirent toujours de leurs yeux des larmes de crocodiles mais aucun d'entre eux, pratiquement, n'a la probité de dire et d'écrire que, désormais, à Prétoria comme à Cape Town, jardins publics, hôtels de luxe, salles de spectacles, sauf quelques exceptions de plus en plus rares, sont ouverts à la population africaine. Encore moins ne prennent-ils la peine de souligner que la République Sud-Africaine, pays le plus évolué et le plus moderne du continent, est équipée somptueusement grâce aux impôts payés par les seuls contribuables blancs, au bénéfice des 25 millions d'habitants qui la peuplent.

Le spectre de l'apartheid doit continuer à isoler du monde occidental libre un continent riche qui, situé entre l'Océan Atlantique et l'Océan Indien, offre une position stratégique attisant les convoitises.

En revanche, la discrétion règne sur le régime policier contraignant les Arméniens, les Lettons, les Lithuaniens, les Estoniens, les Biélorussiens, les habitants de l'Azerbaïdjan et autres colonisés à posséder un «passeport intérieur» pour circuler dans leur propre pays et ce, 70 ans après la révolution bolchevique «libératrice». Il faut évidemment se garder de gâter l'euphorie dans laquelle plongent béatement les laudateurs de la pérestroïka... Ne risquent-ils pas de voir leur confiance ébranlée lorsqu'ils apprendront que la Pravda compare «l'intervention militaire à Pékin à la nécessaire amputation d'une jambe malade»?

Les tentatives pour couper les relations entre l'Europe de l'Ouest et les Etats-Unis entrent dans le cadre de la lutte souterraine qui sert les intérêts du bloc hégémoniste soviétique: oubliée l'attaque de Pearl-Harbour, dans le droit fil du code de la guerre nippon; par contre, éditoriaux, scénarios de films et de pièces de théâtre perpétuent le souvenir du largage sur Hiroshima de la bombe atomique, événement tragique s'il en est, mais qui, il ne faut pas l'oublier, épargna la vie de milliers de Britanniques et de Français d'Indochine, déjà recensés par les troupes japonaises d'occupation pour être déportés vers des camps de concentration inspirés du modèle «made in Germany».

N'est-il pas de toute première importance d'empêtrer dans les complexes d'une faute infamante, inexpiée, la seule nation capable, pour l'heure, de résister à un affrontement avec l'URSS?

Plus diffuse, la subversion agit sur tous les secteurs de la vie d'un pays, créant un soubassement idéologique où s'engluеront les agents propagateurs qui se recrutent souvent parmi les adversaires à abattre.

Grâce à son efficacité, le pouvoir colonialiste n'en finit pas d'être fustigé pour avoir privé de leur identité les peuples qui lui ont été soumis, alors que appel est fait à la générosité, au sens de la solidarité humaine et au respect des Droits de l'Homme pour que les étrangers qui arrivent dans notre pays, participent à nos consultations électorales, au risque de voir définitivement disparaître l'identité qui est la nôtre. Notre Président de la République s'est même risqué à déclarer, le 18 mai 1987, lors d'un colloque S.O.S. Racisme à la Sorbonne: «Je veux que l'on puisse venir en France, je veux que l'on puisse bousculer la culture et les usages français...» Il semble qu'il ait déjà été entendu sur bien des points si l'on en croit la chronique des faits divers des quotidiens français et celles des annales judiciaires.

La justice est le garant du respect de ces «Droits de l'Homme» tant célébrés cette année, au nombre desquels figure la liberté bafouée jusque dans nos rues puisque le fait d'y circuler vous expose à être détroussé ou agressé. Gardienne de lois écrites qui constituent un bastion de défense pour tous les citoyens, elle connaîtra néanmoins les attaques de la subversion qui, à travers elle, visent à saper les fondements d'une société «responsable de tous les maux qui l'affectent» alors que les individus qui la constituent en sont innocents. Conception diamétralement opposée à celle de Paul de Iarse qui allait répétant «le monde serait meilleur si vous l'étiez».

Bien qu'un journaliste du Figaro ait écrit, le 21 octobre 1987: «Les assassins servent en quelque sorte de boucs émissaires, ceux qui paient pour la folie de tous», les tueurs d'enfants, de jeunes filles et de vieillards suscitent encore la réprobation unanime du vulgum pecus.

Il n'en est pas de même pour les terroristes qui rencontrent non seulement la compréhension de notre intelligentsia mais de tous ceux qui, n'étant pas les victimes, voient dans leur action un combat courageux pour un idéal défendu au péril de leur vie. Précisons cependant que seule leur maladresse éventuelle peut mettre en danger leur existence dans les pays occidentaux: . Le censeur international, l'O.N.U. toujours prompt à condamner l'Occident, réagit faiblement devant l'appel au terrorisme lancé par le Président du Parlement iranien contre les Français, les Américains et les Britanniques «parce qu'ils sont plus faciles à tuer que les Israéliens».

De manière surprenante, des représentants

Editorial (suite)

de la justice française optent pour la «justice populaire»... En 1973, Dominique Charvet, l'un de nos magistrats, a déclaré au cours d'une table ronde organisée par l'Ecole Nationale de la Magistrature: «Le problème est de savoir si les avocats et les magistrats auront le courage de saborder leur profession pour faire place à cette justice spontanée qui a surgi dans les favellas du Chili ou dans certains grands ensembles de nos régions. Il y a déjà dans les arrières-salles de Bobigny ou de Nanterre des juges populaires qui se lèvent pour rendre la justice dans leur propre milieu. Ce devra être cela, la magistrature de demain...»

La célébration du Bicentenaire de la Révolution Française est arrivée à point pour nous remettre en mémoire ce que peut être la justice populaire... et des propos traduisant une telle déviance auraient de quoi faire frémir d'horreur les esprits les plus avancés, s'ils n'étaient irrémédiablement endoctrinés.

Un autre membre du syndicat de la magistrature, Monsieur Oswald Baudot, concluait une péroraison tout aussi stupéfiante en invitant les élèves magistrats à avoir «un préjugé favorable pour le voleur contre la police, pour le plaideur contre la justice»... Le projet est en tous cas en bonne voie: la Cour de Sûreté de l'Etat a été supprimée et la loi «Sécurité et Liberté» vidée de sa substance. Leurs cadavres iront rejoindre dans la fosse commune de nos valeurs ancestrales celui de l'orthographe sur le point d'être mis à mort en cette année 1989 qui commémore à grand bruit l'avènement de nos libertés. (1)

L'empreinte d'un enseignement familial pouvant constituer un danger pour l'ancrage, dans de jeunes esprits, du mode de réflexion socialiste, il était de toute importance de couper d'une manière ou d'une autre les parents de leurs enfants. Une tentative avait déjà été amorcée avec l'élaboration d'un nouveau langage mathématique qui avait rendu pères et mères incapables d'apporter la plus petite assistance familiale à leur progéniture . Demain, avec une réforme de l'orthographe ne semblant comporter aucune implication politique (?) de nouveaux fossés se creuseront entre les générations, entre les différentes couches de la société.

Les tenants des conjugaisons devenues archaïques s'opposeront aux partisants d'une langue simplifiée et les étrangers qui auront mis toute leur volonté et leur application à appréhender les subtilités du français se verront frustrés de leurs efforts: il est fort à craindre que ces aléas ne portent à la francophonie un coup mortel, nous enfermant, par la même occasion, dans un isolement néfaste pour notre pays.Cette évolution d'un langage qui fut l'outil d'un corpus philosophique européen sur lequel repose encore notre pensée contemporaine, aboutira, je le crains, à la création du «Novlangue» dont Orwell a superbement défini les principes dans «1984»:

«...L'appauvrissement du vocabulaire était considéré comme une fin en soi et on ne laissait subsister aucun mot dont on pouvait se passer. Le «Novlangue» était destiné non à étendre mais à diminuer le domaine de la pensée et la réduction au minimum du choix des mots aidant indirectement à atteindre ce but.

.... Le «Novlangue» était basé sur la langue que nous connaissons actuellement bien, que beaucoup de phrases «Novlangue» même celles qui ne contiennent aucun mot nouveau, seraient à peine intelligibles à notre époque».

D'aucuns trouvent que je donne une portée dramatique à un simple épisode de l'histoire de notre langue. Je leur rappellerai que les civilisations qui ont vu se perdre la leur sont mortes. Il n'est pas encore trop tard pour sauver la nôtre, grâce à notre vigilance et à notre sagacité, en faisant lever la mainmise que font peser sur elles des intelligences perverses au service d'une utopie inspirée de l'évocation d'un monde espérantiste.

En gagnant cette bataille, nous remporterons la première manche d'un long combat qui verra le triomphe de nos libertés.

Maire de Nice,
Pdt du CI GI des Alpes-Maritimes.

Israel on the Brink of Decision
Division, Unity and Crosscurrents in the Israeli Body Politic

The recent initiative by US Secretary of State James Baker, proposing talks between Israel and Palestine, exposed the divisions of opinion in Israeli society. It effectively brought down the government and highlighted the intense conflicts between the many different parties in the Knesset on the subject of negotiations with the Palestinians.

In this scholarly study, Dr. Rosemary Hollis describes the historical background to the complex situation in Israel and analyses the contradictory forces at work there.

At a time when most Israelis want to see the end of the Palestinian Intifada her sensitive insight is an invaluable aid to understanding the peculiar intractability of a problem involving much human suffering.

Resolving the question is in the first instance a matter for collective Israeli political will. Dr. Hollis explains in clear and dramatic terms why Israelis find it so difficult to come to terms with Palestinian needs and aspirations, as well as settling their own differences on the subject of national identity.

Research Institute for the Study of Conflict and Terrorism

The Research Institute for the Study of Conflict and Terrorism was established in 1989, primarily to undertake research and publishing activities. It continues to produce the well-established monthly series, Conflict Studies, begun in 1970 by its predecessor, the Institute for the Study of Conflict.

RISCT has a research base at the University of St. Andrews where its Director is Professor of International Relations. Its administrative and publishing headquarters and the editorial offices are based in London. RISCT offers membership to individuals and corporations and receives support from trusts and foundations, as well as income from subscriptions and sales of publications.

Its main aims are:

- to research into the causes, manifestations and trends of political instability and conflict throughout the world;
- to study the activities of extremist organisations and their international links and support;
- to publish balanced assessments of issues vital to international security.

Publications

Conflict Studies

A series of monographs, Conflict Studies, has been published regularly since 1970 and now runs to over 220 titles. Each study, by an established expert, examines a specific area or aspect of national or international conflict. They are politically independent and based on academic and first-hand research, providing indispensable background and reference material.

Conflict Studies are published 10 times a year. Subscribers include governments, the media, armed services and police, security and law enforcement agencies, universities, business corporations and individuals in some 60 countries. Subscription details are provided overleaf; back numbers may be ordered individually.

Conflict Bulletin

A quarterly bulletin (issued to members and subscribers) gives news of RISCT's activities, and contains reviews of recent books on international affairs, and previews of forthcoming Conflict Studies as well as articles and editorial comment on subjects of topical interest which fall within the ambit of RISCT's work.

Special Reports

Occasional special reports are published to highlight contemporary issues, or topical events.

Conferences and Briefings

As well as disseminating the results of its research through its publications, the Institute has conducted conferences and seminars, sometimes in conjunction with overseas associates, and arranges briefings and round-table discussions for groups from universities, industrial and commercial organisations, the media, the armed services and police, as well as for individuals.

IMPORTANT

Pour des raisons de sécurité faciles à comprendre, des contingences matérielles nous obligent à affiner notre organisation et plus particulièrement l'accueil des participants à l'Assemblée Nationale.
Aussi, les personnes qui souhaitent s'inscrire doivent le faire dans les meilleurs délais afin, compte tenu de la dimension de la salle, de ne pas avoir la mauvaise surprise de ne pas pouvoir pénétrer dans les locaux de l'Assemblée le jour de nos Assises.
Seules les inscriptions accompagnées d'un chèque libellé à l'ordre de l'IED seront prises en considération. Ces renseignements demeurent, bien entendu, confidentiels. Ils nous serviront uniquement à établir les badges des participants qui leur donneront accès à la salle où se tiendront les Assises.
Précisons que tous les participants devront avoir sur eux une pièce d'identité pour le premier contrôle du vendredi 10 dans la matinée. Mais une fois que leur badge leur aura été remis, ils pourront, en cas de nécessité, quitter l'Assemblée Nationale pendant quelques instants et revenir un peu plus tard écouter un autre participant, à condition bien sûr qu'ils n'aient pas égaré leur badge entre-temps.
Ce document vous donne désormais une idée très précise de l'importance de cet événement qui sera par ailleurs agrémenté par des débats, des projections de diapositives, d'extraits d'émissions de télévision ou de films qui, de manière systématique, illustreront la désinformation dans les domaines évoqués. C'est la raison pour laquelle nous comptons non seulement sur votre participation mais également sur votre prosélytisme afin d'inciter certains de vos amis, qui ne connaissent pas encore l'IED, à assister à ces Assises, d'autant que le prix d'entrée en est modique, compte tenu de la qualité et du nombre des intervenants.

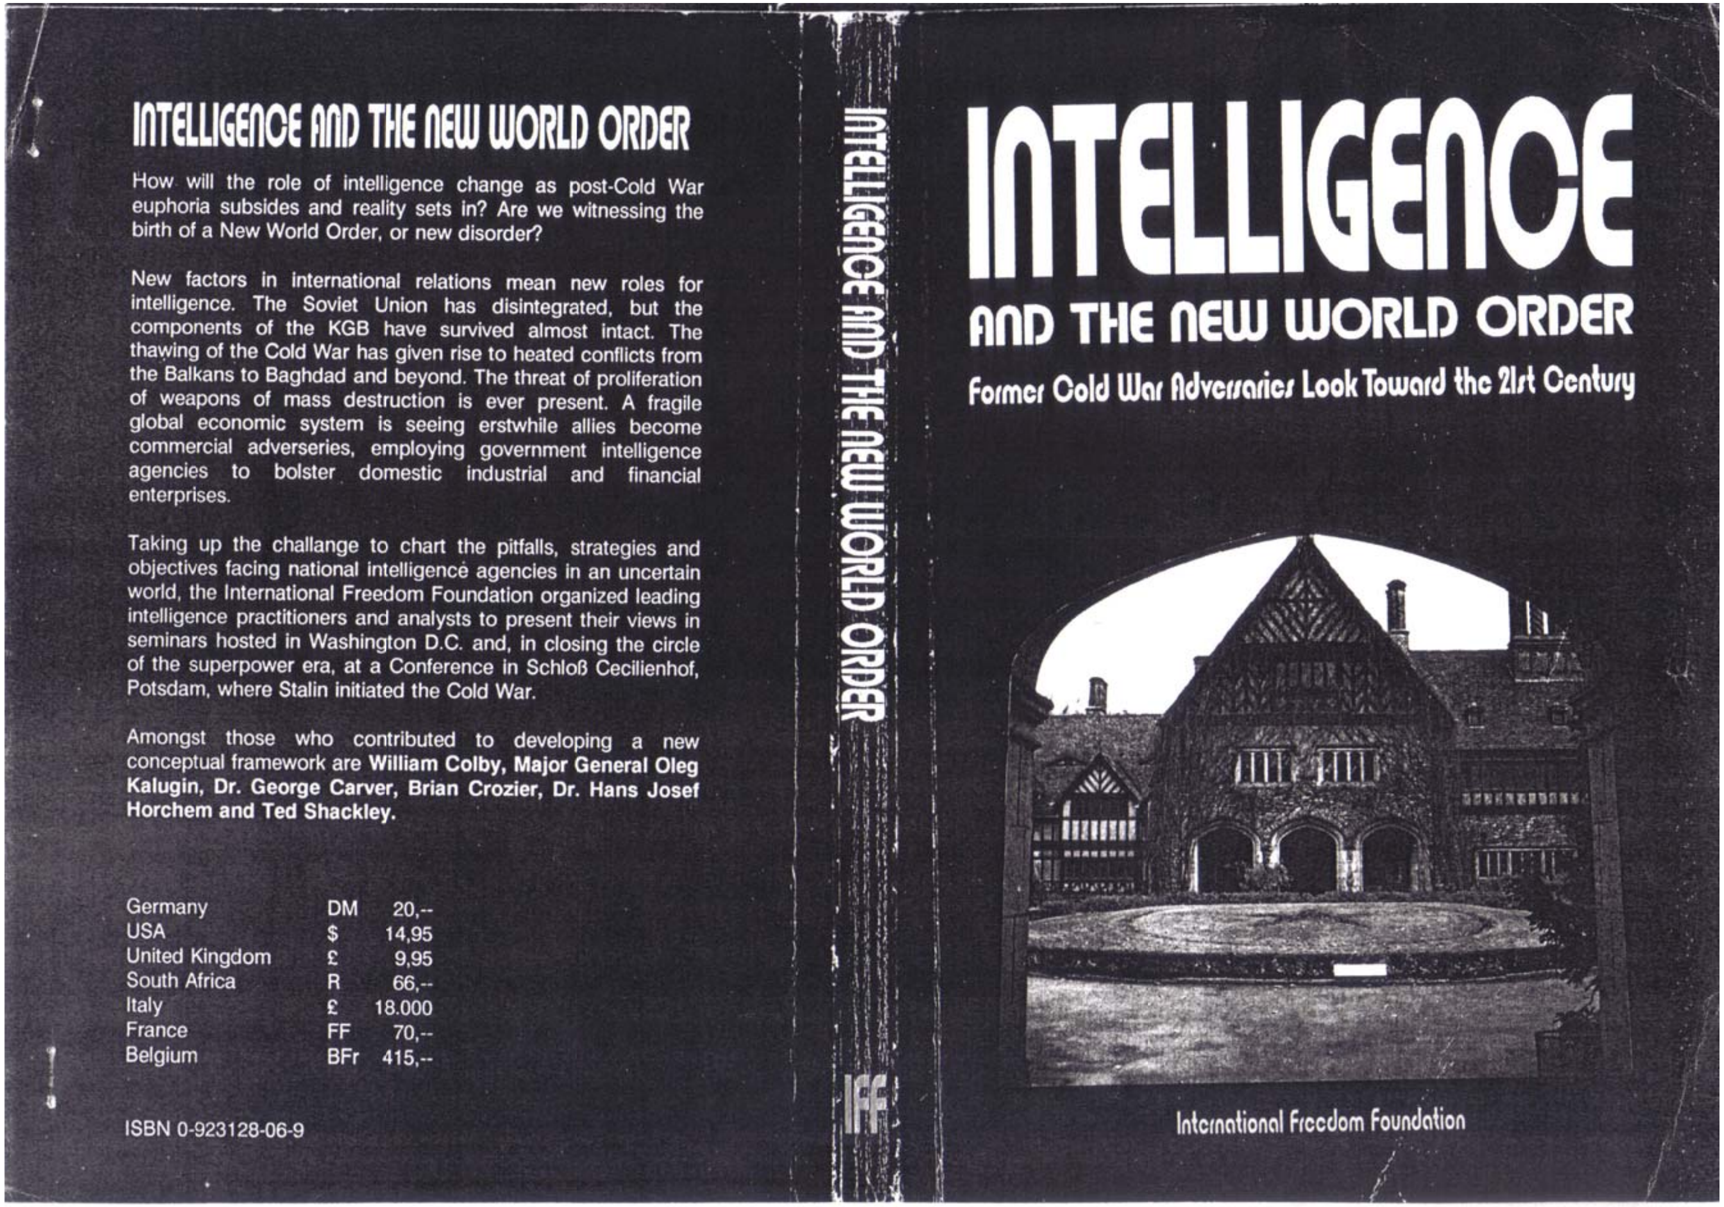
DESINFORMATION-HEBDO N°256 - 1.4.92 - 3



INTELLIGENCE AND THE NEW WORLD ORDER

How will the role of intelligence change as post-Cold War euphoria subsides and reality sets in? Are we witnessing the birth of a New World Order, or new disorder?

New factors in international relations mean new roles for intelligence. The Soviet Union has disintegrated, but the components of the KGB have survived almost intact. The thawing of the Cold War has given rise to heated conflicts from the Balkans to Baghdad and beyond. The threat of proliferation of weapons of mass destruction is ever present. A fragile global economic system is seeing erstwhile allies become commercial adverseries, employing government intelligence agencies to bolster domestic industrial and financial enterprises.

Taking up the challange to chart the pitfalls, strategies and objectives facing national intelligence agencies in an uncertain world, the International Freedom Foundation organized leading intelligence practitioners and analysts to present their views in seminars hosted in Washington D.C. and, in closing the circle of the superpower era, at a Conference in Schloß Cecilienhof, Potsdam, where Stalin initiated the Cold War.

Amongst those who contributed to developing a new conceptual framework are William Colby, Major General Oleg Kalugin, Dr. George Carver, Brian Crozier, Dr. Hans Josef Horchem and Ted Shackley.

About the Authors

Dr. George A. Carver is the John M. Olin Senior Fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, in Washington, D.C., and — concurrently — President of his own consulting firm, C&S Associates, Inc. A Phi Beta Kappa graduate of Yale, Woodrow Wilson Fellow and Fulbright Scholar, he took his doctorate in political theory at Oxford. During a 26 year government career in intelligence, he served as an operations officer, an analyst, and a senior manager — serving for ten consecutive years (1966-1976) on the Management and Executive Committee of four successive Directors of Central Intelligence. From 1966-73 he was Special Assistant for Vietnamese Affairs to three successive Directors and then, from 1973-76, Deputy for National Intelligence to two DCIs. From 1976 until 1979 he was Chairman of the US Intelligence Coordinating Committee in Germany and head of the American civil and military intelligence community there. He also served on President Reagan's November 1980 to 1981 Intelligence Transition Team.

Dr. Carver joined CSIS soon after retiring from government, in August 1979, and founded C&S Associates, Inc. eighteen months later. He is a frequent commentator on television and radio, both in the United States and abroad, has lectured widely to corporate, academic, governmental and general audiences — also in the US and abroad — and has published numerous articles and comments on a broad range of intelligence, security and foreign policy-related topics. As a consultant, he has advised private sector clients in the US and overseas on a wide variety of strategic planning, political risk, security (broadly defined) and business-climate related concerns and problems.

William Colby was Director of Central Intelligence (CIA) from 1973 to 1976. Earlier he had been Chief of the CIA's Far East Division (1963-68) and its Executive Director and Comptroller (1972-73). His intelligence career began during the Second World War where he parachuted into France and Norway to work with resistance forces for the Office of Strategic Services. He served as an attorney on the National Labor Relations Board from 1949 to 1950, and as an associate with the New York based law firm Donovan, Leisure, Newton and Irvine from 1947 to 1949, which he rejoined in 1988. Between 1951 and 1962, Mr. Colby served with the American Embassies in Stockholm, Rome and Saigon. He was Ambassador and Deputy to the Commander of the US-Military Assistance Command in Vietnam from 1968 to 1971, directing American support to the Vietnamese government's Rural Pacification Program.

Mr. Colby received his AB cum laude in 1940 from Princeton University where he was elected to Phi Beta Kappa. He received his LLB in 1947 from Columbia University Law School and has been admitted to the New York State, District of Columbia and US Supreme Court Bars. Since leaving the CIA, Mr. Colby has been a consultant on international and domestic political matters to various corporations, governments and investment organizations, has practiced international and American law in Washington, has written two books (Honorable Men and Lost Victory) and numerous articles, and has lectured and appeared in the media throughout the US and abroad. He is currently Counsel to the Washington law firm Donovan, Rogovin, Huge and Schiller.

Mr. Colby has received numerous high awards and distinctions during his career, including the National Security Medal in 1973, and the State Order of Vietnam in 1972. He is also a decorated World War Two veteran, having received the Silver and Bronze Stars, French Croix de Guerre, the Norwegian St Olaf's Medal and the British Mentioned in Dispatches.

Brian Crozier founded the Institute for the Study of Conflict in 1970, working as its Director until the end of 1979. In addition, he has worked as a journalist and editor for a number of specialist publications, including his position as editor of The Economist's "Foreign Report" and columnist for the New York based National Review. As a specialist on international communism, Mr Crozier has published a number of books, including: The Future of Communist Power, (Methuen 1970); A Theory of Conflict, (Hamish Hamilton 1974); Strategy of Survival, (Temple-Smith 1978) as well as a number of biographies, among which on General Franco (Eyre & Spottiswood 1968), De Gaulle (Eyre Methuen 1973), and Chang Kai Chek (The Man who Lost China, Angus & Robertson 1976).

Amongst his most recent works are, This War Called Peace (Co-Authored, Sherwood Press 1984), and The Gorbachev Phenomenon: Peace and Secret War (Claridge Press 1990).

Joël-François Dumont, 46, is a senior journalist with the French National Television Corporation FR3. He has, over the past twenty-four years, gained considerable experience of international affairs: first as Brussels-based EC and NATO correspondent, and more recently in his present capacity as a political and diplomatic analyst in Paris. Mr. Dumont is a former Auditor of France's National Institute for Advanced Defence Studies (IHEDN) and a graduate of the Institute of Security Studies of Kiel University, Germany. He is currently also Director of the Center for Intelligence Studies (Europe).

He has published and contributed to a number of studies, among which: The Peace Movements in Europe and America, (London, 1985); Für ein Deutschland in der Zukunft, (Berlin, 1985); and La Désinformation Stratégique et les Mesures Actives Soviétiques, (Paris, 1987).

His premonitory television series The Limits of Economic Growth was awarded the Grand Prix of the Biarritz Industrial Film Festival in 1972. As an EC Agricultural Policy specialist, Mr. Dumont received the Cross of Chevalier of the French Order of Merit for Services to Agriculture in 1986.

David Holliday has enjoyed 25 years of experience in State and federal Government as well as in journalism. After finishing his studies at Miami University, Oxford and Ohio in 1957, Mr. Holliday started his career in journalism as Press Secretary to Governor Tim Babcock (Montana) and Governor Stan Hathaway (Wyoming) in 1969. From June 1969 to 1973, he was General Manager at KBLL Radio and television (Montana) and from 1973-76 Capitol Correspondent for KWTV Channel 9 (CBS).

Mr. Holliday's political career began in 1976 as Administrative Assistant to Governor David L. Boren of Oklahoma and between 1978 and 1985 as Chief Assistant for Legislative Affairs to Senator Boren. Between 1985 and 1987, Mr. Holliday served as a Professional Staff Member on the US Senate Select Committee on Intelligence where he was active in the preparation of the Intelligence Authorization Bill and the budget document authorizing appropriations for the US intelligence community, including the CIA, NSA and DIA. Between 1987 and 1991, Mr. Holliday was the Special Assistant to the Chairman and Official Spokesman of the US Senate Select Committee on Intelligence. Currently he is a state government relations specialist with the Distilled Spirits Council of the United States, Inc.

Dr. Hans-Josef Horchem was the Head of the Office for the Protection of the Constitution (BfV) in Hamburg from 1969 to January 1981. After retiring, Dr. Horchem became a Research Fellow of the Institute for Strategic and International Studies at Georgetown University, and of the Center for Strategic Studies in Tel Aviv. He is currently Director of the Institute for the Study of Terrorism in Bonn.

Between 1955 and 1957, Dr. Horchem served as a Judge in the Rhineland, whereafter he worked for the Federal Office for the Protection of the Constitution in Cologne. In 1968 he attended the NATO Defence College in Rome and in 1978 he served as a special consultant to the Spanish government in anti-terrorist measures. Since 1980 he has acted in an advisory capacity to the Basque government in security measures.

Dr. Horchem has studied law, history and political science at the universities of Mainz and Cologne where he received his doctorate of law. He is the author of a number of works, including: The Long March through the Institutions (1973), West Germany's Red Army Anarchists (1974), Urban Guerilla in West Germany (1976), Rightist Extremism in the Federal Republic of Germany (1979), Extremisten in einer selbstbewußten Demokratie (1979), and Die veleorene Revolution (1988).

Donald "Jamie" Jameson attended the US Naval Academy where he obtained his BS in electrical and mechanical engineering and Russian language, in 1945. He proceeded to study at Columbia University, obtaining his MA and Certificate from the Russian Institute in 1949, following on with Advanced Graduate Studies in Soviet law, economics, and politics until January 1951. Mr. Jameson's career in the CIA began in 1951 as an officer involved primarily in operations focussed on the Soviet Union and Europe. Serving in Europe, he participated in estimates, assessments, analysis and policy consultation. Between 1973 and 1979 Mr Jameson was employed as a Senior Scientist and Project Director at Tetra Tech Inc., and as Secretary-Treasurer of Tetra Tech International. He directed US government projects in energy and Soviet weapons systems for Tetra Tech which provided technical services in the Middle East, especially Oman, where the company operated in an advisory capacity on oil, water and economic development.

Between 1980 and 1987, Mr. Jameson was elected Vice-President of Research Associates International, Ltd., Arlington VA, a company that does risk assessment and economic feasibility studies, reporting on international events, especially concerning the international oil market. In addition, the company operates an executive protection program for its principal clients in the oil trade.

Mr. Jameson has enjoyed a term of office as the Vice-President of the Jamestown Foundation, a charitable trust set up to help Soviet and East European defectors publish articles and books. Since May 1989, he has worked as a consultant to various companies on economics, feasibility studies for new ventures, the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. In his capacity as a writer, he has contributed a number of articles to numerous magazines and newspapers, including the Washington Post, Washington Times, Chicago Sun-Times, Atlantic, Signal, US Strategic Review, Journal of Defense and Diplomacy, and others, and has appeared on over fifteen radio and television specials and talk shows in the US and Europe. Other works published by Mr. Jameson include Securing the Seas, an Atlantic Council Study on Soviet and US navies, of which he is a co-author.

Oleg Kalugin is a retired Major General of the Soviet KGB. Born in Leningrad in 1934, his father was an officer in of Stalin's NKVD. He attended Leningrad State University and was recruited by the KGB for foreign intelligence work, serving in the First Chief Directorate. Under cover as a journalist, he attended Columbia State University in New York, conducting espionage and influence operations. He later served as deputy rezident at the Soviet Embassy in Washington. General kalugin rose quickly in the First Chief Directorate, becoming the youngest General in the history of the KGB, and eventually to become head of Line KR, foreign counter-intelligence.

General Kalugin's internal criticism of cronyism within the KGB caused friction with the First Chief Directorate head Viktor Kryuchkov, and he was later demoted to serve as deputy chief of internal security in Leningrad. He recalls that for the first time in his career he saw the KGB's internal functions had little to do with the security of the state and everything to do with maintaining corrupt Communist Party officials in power. He resigned from the KGB in 1989 and became a public critic.

His vocal attacks on the KGB won him both notoriety and a political following. In 1990 President Mikhail Gorbachev signed a decree stripping General Kalugin of his rank, decorations, and pension; General Kalugin then ran successfully for the Supreme Soviet, or "parliament" of the USSR. From the August 1991 Putsch, General Kalugin became an unpaid advisor to reformist KGB Chairman Vadim Bakatin, who attempted unsuccessfully to dissolve the state security apparatus. General Kalugin's autobiography, Burning the Bridges, will be published in 1993.

Sven Kraemer, a former senior US government official and an expert on defense, arms control and foreign policy.

Mr. Kraemer's 25 years of government service began in 1963 in the Kennedy Administration in the Office of the Secretary of Defense. His career includes an unparalleled 16 years in the White House with the National Security Council (NSC) during the administrations of four Presidents (Reagan, Ford, Nixon and Johnson) and ten National Security Advisors — a period extending from 1967 to 1976 and from 1981 to 1987. His awards include the Secretary of Defense Medal for Meritorious Civilian Service.

From the beginning of President Reagan's Administration until September 1987, Mr. Kraemer was the NSC's Director of Arms Control. In this capacity he helped shape United States arms control policy at the highest national levels including participation in some 40 NSC meetings, representing the NSC on ten arms control interagency groups, and holding special responsibilities in coordinating verification and compliance issues.

Mr. Kraemer has also held senior staff positions in the Congressional branch of government, working with Senator John Tower (R-Tex) and the Republican Policy Committee of the US Senate (1979-80), and with Representative Jack Kemp (R-NY) in the House of Representatives (1987-88). He is currently a consultant to the Department of Defense.

Mr. Kraemer is a graduate of Phillips Academy, Andover, Massachusetts, an Honors Graduate of Harvard College, and the recipient of a Masters degree in political philosophy from the University of California, Berkeley, where he also taught and did additional graduate work.

Herbert Romerstein investigated Soviet espionage and influence operations for eighteen years as a professional staff member of the US House of Representatives Committee on Internal Security, and the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence. From 1983 to 1989 he was a senior policy officer for

Diplomacy, and others, and has appeared on over fifteen radio and television specials and talk shows in the US and Europe. Other works published by Mr. Jameson include Securing the Seas, an Atlantic Council Study on Soviet and US navies, of which he is a co-author.

Oleg Kalugin ~~is a retired~~ Major General ~~of the~~ Soviet KGB. Born in Leningrad in 1934, his father was an officer in of Stalin's NKVD. He attended Leningrad State University and was recruited by the KGB for foreign intelligence work, serving in the First Chief Directorate. Under cover as a journalist, he attended Columbia State University in New York, conducting espionage and influence operations. He later served as deputy rezident at the Soviet Embassy in Washington. General kalugin rose quickly in the First Chief Directorate, becoming the youngest General in the history of the KGB, and eventually to become head of Line KR, foreign counter-intelligence.

General Kalugin's internal criticism of cronyism within the KGB caused friction with the First Chief Directorate head Viktor Kryuchkov, and he was later demoted to serve as deputy chief of internal security in Leningrad. He recalls that for the first time in his career he saw the KGB's internal functions had little to do with the security of the state and everything to do with maintaining corrupt Communist Party officials in power. He resigned from the KGB in 1989 and became a public critic.

His vocal attacks on the KGB won him both notoriety and a political following. In 1990 President Mikhail Gorbachev signed a decree stripping General Kalugin of his rank, decorations, and pension; General Kalugin then ran successfully for the Supreme Soviet, or "parliament" of the USSR. From the August 1991 Putsch, General Kalugin became an unpaid advisor to reformist KGB Chairman Vadim Bakatin, who attempted unsuccessfully to dissolve the state security apparatus. General Kalugin's autobiography, Burning the Bridges, will be published in 1993.

Sven Kraemer, a former senior US government official and an expert on defense, arms control and foreign policy.

Mr. Kraemer's 25 years of government service began in 1963 in the Kennedy Administration in the Office of the Secretary of Defense. His career includes an unparalleled 16 years in the White House with the National Security Council (NSC) during the administrations of four Presidents (Reagan, Ford, Nixon and Johnson) and ten National Security Advisors — a period extending from 1967 to 1976 and from 1981 to 1987. His awards include the Secretary of Defense Medal for Meritorious Civilian Service.

From the beginning of President Reagan's Administration until September 1987, Mr. Kraemer was the NSC's Director of Arms Control. In this capacity he helped shape United States arms control policy at the highest national levels including participation in some 40 NSC meetings, representing the NSC on ten arms control interagency groups, and holding special responsibilities in coordinating verification and compliance issues.

Mr. Kraemer has also held senior staff positions in the Congressional branch of government, working with Senator John Tower (R-Tex) and the Republican Policy Committee of the US Senate (1979-80), and with Representative Jack Kemp (R-NY) in the House of Representatives (1987-88). He is currently a consultant to the Department of Defense.

Mr. Kraemer is a graduate of Phillips Academy, Andover, Massachusetts, an Honors Graduate of Harvard College, and the recipient of a Masters degree in political philosophy from the University of California, Berkeley, where he also taught and did additional graduate work.

Herbert Romerstein investigated Soviet espionage and influence operations for eighteen years as a professional staff member of the US House of Representatives Committee on Internal Security, and the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence. From 1983 to 1989 he was a senior policy officer for the United States Information Agency, where he was Director of the Office to Counter Soviet Active Measures and Disinformation. Mr. Romerstein has lectured and written extensively on Soviet espionage, active measures, and international terrorism. Among his works is The KGB Against the Main Enemy (Lexington, 1988), with Stanislav Levchenko.

Vladimir Rubanov is a former Colonel in the Soviet KGB. Upon completing his training as an aircraft engineer he studied "law" at the KGB Higher School and was posted to Veronius as Deputy Chief of Counter-intelligence, focusing on industrial security. In 1982 Colonel Rubanov was posted to KGB headquarters at Lubyanka in Moscow where he continued his duties in counter-intelligence and became chief of the Department for Economics, Science and Security (Directorate T). Critical of waste and abuse and realizing that Soviet militarization was causing the country to slide backward, he wrote an article for the journal Kommunist in 1988, which caused President Gorbachev to discharge him from the KGB.

Colonel Rubanov was subsequently hired by Vadim Bukatin, the reformist Minister of Internal Affairs (MVD), serving as executive assistant until December 1990, when Mr. Gorbachev fired Minister Bakatin and replaced him with KGB General and future coup conspirator Boris Pugo. The day after the Putsch, Russian President Boris Yeltsin and Mr. Gorbachev named Mr. Bakatin to head the KGB, whereupon Colonel Rubanov was named Chief of the Analysis Department. After the KGB was partitioned into separate services in November 1991, Colonel Rubanov became Chief of the Center for Information and Analysis of the short-lived Inter-Republican Security Service (MSB) which succeeded the USSR KGB Second Chief Directorate until the Soviet Union Collapsed in December.

Theodore Shackley is a 28 year veteran in intelligence and spent 17 years living or travelling in Europe, Latin America, Asia, Africa and the Middle East. He progressed through the ranks of the CIA as a recruiter and handler of agents and became the CIA's Senior Officer in Miami, Berlin, Laos and Vietnam — running more big stations in times of crisis than any other officer. Prior to retiring in 1979, Mr. Shackley was CIA's Associate Deputy Director for Operations, responsible for worldwide foreign intelligence collection, clandestine counter-intelligence and covert action. He holds a number of foreign decorations and has thrice been awarded the CIA's highest decoration, the Distinguished Intelligence Medal.

After retirement, Mr. Shackley founded Research Associates International of Arlington, Virginia. This firm specializes in risk analysis, threat assessments and executive protection for firms with interests in oil or international trade in manufactured products.

Mr. Shackley is an author of note, and in addition to numerous magazine articles, he wrote The Third Option, which is an American view of counter-insurgency operations. He is co-author of a book released in December 1989 entitled You're the Target, which instructs corporate executives how to cope with terrorism and crime.

Mr. Shackley has also taught at Georgetown University and regularly lectures at universities and service schools on topics of interest to those who are concerned with national security policy formulation.

The lapsing importance of the central coordinates in a once bi-polar world has given rise to optimists who believe that foreign intelligence services have become redundant. However, interim events have already dashed such hopes — old threats may have disappeared, only to be replaced by new sources of instability and a growing potential for international conflict.

In the former Soviet Union the centrifugal forces generated by ideological centralism have collapsed, the results of which few wish, or even dare, to imagine. Only around twenty percent of those borders which exist in this region today are traditionally respected. Moreover, growing material poverty and germinating nationalism now combine to generate a highly explosive atmosphere.

Similar scenarios are just as relevant in eastern Europe — conflicts in the Balkan region have already ignited and unchecked military aggression has paved the way to de facto political accomplishment.

The threatening factors which existed before the 1991 Gulf War are still very much in evidence throughout the Near and Middle East. Regional problems are still far from being solved while the proliferation of weapons continues with an alarming increase in atomic, biological and chemical weapons arsenals.

North African states are being swept by emergent authoritarian regimes, religious fundamentalism and explosive population growth. This, together with

Decisive: ex-premier Antoine Pinay, 101, casts his vote

Living la différence

DURING the French elections British journalist Martin Vennard was working on St-Etienne's newspaper Le Progrès, in the constituency where the 101-year old ex-prime minister Antoine Pinay always casts his vote. Last year Vennard reported the British general election for the provincial newspaper the Hexham Courant. Here he sums up la différence:

‘Probably the most important distinction is that here the readers are interested in what you write. The circulation of Le Progrès jumped by 40 per cent. In Hexham, the election made little difference to numbers.

Secondly, most polling stations close at 6pm, and by 8.35pm all three St Etienne results were final. Last year in Hexham I was still waiting for the result at 2.30 in the morning.

The results for the three constituencies arrived at the St-Etienne town hall by telephone from each polling station. Even better than that is the hospitality of the French authorities. Winners, losers and reporters tuck into a free buffet with champagne.

I'll take St-Etienne over Hexham at election-time any day.’

ROGUE AGENTS

The Cercle and the 6I in the Private Cold War

The Cercle Pinay was founded in 1952-53 as a confidential forum of European leaders who sought to promote the vision of a Catholic and conservative Europe and to oppose the threat of Communism.

Shrouded in secrecy, the Cercle brought together statesmen such as Antoine Pinay, Konrad Adenauer, Franz Josef Strauß, Giulio Andreotti, Otto von Habsburg, Richard Nixon, Henry Kissinger and David Rockefeller, as well as top figures from the European and American intelligence services.

Following the rise of student counter-culture in the 1960s, the Cercle focused on domestic subversion, using its network of propaganda and intelligence veterans to attack progressive politicians such as Harold Wilson, Willy Brandt, Jimmy Carter and François Mitterrand, and to promote their favoured candidates: Giscard d'Estaing, Margaret Thatcher, Ronald Reagan and Franz Josef Strauß. Throughout the 1960s and 1970s, the Cercle also worked to defend apartheid South Africa and the dictatorships in Spain and Portugal.

After the electoral victory of the Right in 1979-1980, the Cercle and the private intelligence agency, the 6I, targeted Western peace campaigners and the new Soviet regime under Mikhail Gorbachev. Meanwhile, Habsburg played a key part in the fall of the Iron Curtain and then ensured the integration of Eastern Europe into the European Union.

In this final sixth edition of a groundbreaking thirty year investigation, David Teacher lifts the veil of secrecy to reveal the unseen role played by the Cercle and its allies in shaping the world as we know it today.

Canada's Most Infamous Trial on Child Abuse

BY KEVIN MARRON

$24.95

RITUAL ABUSE

Ritual Abuse is the startling behind-the-scenes story of the most disturbing child custody trial in Canadian history. For eighteen months, investigative reporter Kevin Marron sat in attendance during the trial that filled the quiet community of Hamilton with horror and shocked outrage.

In February 1985, two sisters were placed in foster care by their mother, who feared for their safety. Only days later, the foster mother announced that the children were telling explicit tales of being sexually molested by their unstable young mother, her live-in boyfriend and their violent estranged father. Then came macabre stories of pornography, orgies, cannibalism and ritualistic murder involving many other children—allegations so extreme, so bizarre, so graphic in detail that it seemed impossible that they could have been made up. Finally, in March 1987, Judge Thomas Beckett ruled that the parents in this trial would no longer be granted access to their children, describing the evidence as a "virtual flood of the most lurid, gruesome bloodthirsty stories that any person could possibly imagine."

Now, long after the decision was handed down, evidence from all over North America suggests that what happened in Hamilton may not be an isolated incident but that ritualistic child

INTRODUCTION

This book is about two young girls, who dared to tell their story of sexual abuse and savage rituals. It is a story that seemed beyond belief to the policemen who first investigated it. But the children's stories of sexual molestation, pornography, cannibalism and ritual murder were so detailed and consistent, contained so much knowledge inappropriate to children, and were accompanied by such clear symptoms of distress, that doctors, social workers and eventually the judge concluded that the children were not fantasizing or fabricating, but describing events from their own experience.

To these two sisters, whom I will call Janis and Linda, I dedicate this book. They were both less than eight years old when they first disclosed their history of abuse. A court order protecting their identity prevents me from disclosing their precise ages and some other details. I have never met them, but feel I have come to know them well, after covering the 18-month-long Crown wardship hearing that examined their story in painstaking detail. They are gentle, loving children, who have maintained a certain trust and innocence, in spite of having lived through horrors that are quite beyond the experience or even the imagination of almost any adult. They are now in the care of the state, and it is up to therapists and foster parents to help them cope with their bizarre and traumatic experiences, and, hopefully, grow up to lead normal lives.

Like almost everyone who attended the 150-day hearing in the Hamilton-Wentworth Unified Family Court, I was shocked and deeply distressed by what we heard of the children's graphic descriptions of horrendous degradation and abuse. I have not led a sheltered life, and as a working journalist I have frequently been exposed to quite horrible examples of human perversity, and have encountered many tragic victims. But I was quite unprepared for the gruesome and sordid details that we heard day after day in that small Hamilton courtroom. The horror of this material was rendered all the more intense by the knowledge that it represented a part of the life experience of two little girls, one of whom is barely out of kindergarten, and that the children's own parents were among the perpetrators of these shameful acts. The traumatic memories will stay with Janis and Linda for the rest of their lives. I, too, feel haunted by the image of their suffering, and can only hope that some good will come of it, as a result of the extraordinary level of publicity, which focused public attention on their case, and the issues that arose from it.

Besides providing some moving testimony on the emotional impact of extreme child abuse, the case raised important questions about the investigation of sexual abuse, and the rights of parents and children in the subsequent court process. The hearing also shed light on the new and frightening phenomenon of ritual abuse. This is the abuse of children as part of the rituals of a cult. It is different from other forms of child abuse in that it appears to be motivated not by passion or frustration, but by the pursuit of some perverse spiritual goal.

The children gave detailed descriptions of graveyard rituals, which suggested that they were the victims of a satanic cult. They described scenes that included cannibalism, pornography and the ritual murder of children and animals. Many elements of their descriptions were strikingly similar to disclosures made by children in various parts of the United States.

Such allegations have been taken seriously by many child abuse experts and police investigators in different communities across North America, while others have treated them with scorn and derision. No-one has yet come up with any satisfactory explanation for the spate of more than 100 similar cases, which could point to the existence of organized or closely related groups engaging in cult activities, or using the trappings of satanism as a means of terrorizing and exploiting children. The Hamilton hearing represented the first attempt by a Canadian court to probe this new aberration, and was, perhaps, the most thorough investigation of such a case undertaken anywhere.

Janis and Linda began making disclosures about sexual abuse in February, 1985, after being placed in temporary foster care by their mother. The mother was herself a former victim of child abuse, who had suffered through a violent and tumultuous marriage to the children's father, an aggressive, hot-tempered man. At the time she put the children in care, the mother was experiencing difficulties in her relationship with her boyfriend, and was afraid she might harm the girls while in her depressed state. In a series of gradual and painful disclosures, the children accused their mother, her boyfriend, and their father of sexually abusing them. They then went on to describe in graphic detail pornographic video-making sessions at a television studio, macabre orgies of sex and violence and graveyard rituals involving cannibalism and the murder of other children.

Representatives of the Hamilton-Wentworth Children's Aid Society, who had concluded that the children were telling the truth, launched a court action under the Ontario Child Welfare Act seeking to have the children made wards of the Crown. This court action cited the children's forced participation in cannibalism and ritual murder as grounds for their being in need of protection from their parents. A police investigation, which child welfare workers believed was lax and haphazard, failed to find evidence to support criminal charges against the alleged perpetrators.

It was initially the bizarre allegations that attracted media interest. Child welfare hearings are not normally open to the public, and it was only after hearing submissions from media representatives that the case involved matters of public concern, that the presiding judge, District Court Judge Thomas Beckett, decided to allow reporters for six media organizations to attend the trial. As one of these reporters, representing the Globe and Mail, I had no idea, when I took my seat in the courtroom in October, 1985, that the hearing, which was scheduled for ten days, would extend for 18 months. I had no idea that I would hear a horrific and moving story that will probably haunt me for the rest of my life. I also had no idea then of the shocking pervasiveness of child sexual abuse in our society and the devastating impact it has on so many lives.

The hearing came at a time when the public was just becoming alerted to the significance of the problem of child sexual abuse, which has recently been discovered to be a disease of endemic proportions in North America. The extensive media coverage that the case received also fell in the context of a wider public debate on new federal legislation concerning the use of children's evidence in court. The sexual abuse of children presents peculiarly difficult problems for the legislators and the courts because it is a crime that usually takes place within the privacy of the home, and often leaves no physical scars on its victims. In most cases the victims have been molested by a family member, and the sometimes confused and intimidated victim is the only eye-witness to the crime.

The question of how to handle such cases in the courts is a new one, because it was not until the early 1980s that the sexual exploitation of children was recognized to be a widespread problem. Just a few years ago, hardly anyone was aware of its existence. Described by one expert in the field as "the best kept secret,"[1] this phenomenon, which has probably been with us for generations, has not been recognized for a number of reasons. It has remained hidden, first, because abused children are extremely reluctant to disclose that they have been victimized by family members or other trusted adults whom they fear and love; second, because adults have generally not been prepared to believe the few abused children who have attempted to disclose their painful secrets. Children were seldom considered to be credible witnesses and their allegations of abuse were often dismissed as fantasies.

In the 1950s the work of radiologists, who detected bone damage in a large number of young children, made the public aware of the problem of the physical abuse of children. Child protection services grew as a result of this, and psychiatrists began paying more attention to the problem of family violence. Out of this new concern grew an awareness of an even greater problem, as more and more reports of sexual abuse were investigated and found to be valid. The women's movement also helped to make the public more aware of sexual violence against women and children. By the mid-1980s, about two-thirds of the cases of child abuse reported to Canadian child protection agencies involved sexual molestation.

Many psychiatrists and social workers have come to believe that children rarely lie in making such allegations, particularly when they make them against their parents. However, until new legislation was passed in 1987, it remained extremely difficult for children to testify in Canadian criminal courts. No special arrangements were made to prevent young children from being frightened and intimidated by the ordeal of facing their alleged abuser in a formal court process. In order to be sworn to testify in court, children under 14 years of age had to pass a competency test to satisfy a judge that they understood the meaning of the oath. If they did not pass this test, which sometimes involved questions about their religious education, their evidence was heard by the court, but was not given the same credibility afforded to an adult witness.

In a package of measures designed to address the problem of child sexual abuse, the federal government amended the criminal code and the Canada Evidence Act in 1987. This legislation created three new offenses: sexual interference, invitation to sexual touching, and sexual exploitation. These will make it easier to prosecute child sexual abuse cases that were previously dealt with under the same sexual assault laws that applied to offenses against adults. The rules of evidence were changed so that it will now be possible for children's evidence to be given the same weight as that of adults, providing the child is found to be capable of communicating and can promise to tell the truth. The new law enables children to testify outside the courtroom, providing the accused is able to view the testimony on a closed-circuit television. Another important change allows for the use in court of videotaped statements made by the child on a prior occasion. If such statements are used, the child still has to be available for cross-examination in court, but does not necessarily have to undergo the ordeal of detailing all of the alleged abuse.

This new legislation was being formulated and debated during the 18 months that the Hamilton case was before the court. Child welfare advocates were pressuring the government to enact the changes, and opponents of the legislation were concerned that the rights of accused people would be compromised by the new laws. While supporters of the legislation drew attention to dramatic increases in the number of validated reports of child sexual abuse, other people expressed alarm about the preponderance of false allegations of abuse that were surfacing in divorce and custody cases.

The Crown wardship hearing that resulted from Janis's and Linda's allegations explored some of the crucial questions in this ongoing debate. How can the credibility of young children's statements be adequately assessed? Is it possible to do this without subjecting the children to the ordeal of testifying? Is it appropriate to use videotaped therapy sessions as evidence in court? The family court, which was not required to follow the same strict rules of evidence as a criminal trial, considered the hearsay testimony of foster parents and social workers, examined the children's credibility through the analyses of expert witnesses, and watched the children in videotaped therapy sessions, without ever forcing them to testify. Some of these novel procedures went further than anything proposed in the new federal laws, which will still require that children testify in some way before their evidence can be used in a criminal trial. But these procedures do involve new methods that some experts would like to see applied in a modified way to criminal proceedings. Even before the Hamilton hearing was over, lawyers, judges and psychiatrists had begun to consider the lessons that could be learned from it.

My initial reaction on hearing about the children's bizarre allegations was that they were preposterous and incredible. I thought they must have been either lying or fantasizing, and I wondered how the doctors and social workers who examined their stories could possibly have taken them seriously. But as I listened to the evidence, it became clear to me that the girls' horrible descriptions of sexual abuse could only have been based on experience, and that their accounts of ritual violence had the same ring of authenticity. Other evidence at the trial tended to strengthen the possibility that the children might have been involved in satanic cult activities.

Even if one dismisses the possibility that the children were describing actual murders that they witnessed, and assumes that they were confused or mistaken about this, their evidence still presents profoundly disturbing questions. Were these children used in rituals that featured sex, sadism and animal mutilation? Were they used in the making of pornographic movies, involving simulated violence and terror? Were they terrorized by the trappings of satanism and simulations of murder and cannibalism, in order to insure their compliance in sexual abuse? Or were they exposed to such traumatic sexual abuse and brutality in their home that their distorted memories of this came out as a lurid, but realistic, horror story? In pondering all these questions we have to think seriously about the level of protection that our society is providing to children, the resources it is allocating to the investigation of such abuse, and the underlying social conditions that have resulted in such perversions of human values.

The length of the case and the estimated $1 million that it cost the taxpayers was a subject of great public concern. Lawyers involved in the hearing became concerned that the children's right to a speedy determination about their future was being eroded by the process that was supposed to be protecting them. The rights of the children's parents to the same speedy determination were also compromised, and the process took a very heavy toll on the girls' emotionally unstable mother, who had to be hospitalized when she collapsed screaming and shaking on the courtroom floor while giving her evidence.

The case also posed broader questions of public policy on the issue of child sexual abuse. Evidence in the trial exposed inadequacies in the level of communication between doctors, day-care workers and child protection workers about the plight of the children before they were taken into care. If that communication had been better, it is possible that the abuse and neglect of these children might have been identified sooner, and they could have been saved from some of their horrifying ordeals. Does this therefore point to a need for more professional education and training in this field and better co-ordination of services? Did the police adequately investigate the children's allegations? Do they have the resources and the training to cope with the ever-increasing number of reported cases of child sexual abuse? Are they able to properly investigate ritual abuse or organized pornography rings?

Editors at the Globe and Mail, like those at the five other media organizations that obtained permission to attend the closed hearing, clearly believed that all these issues were important enough to merit daily coverage throughout the 18 months of the hearing. All were confronted with the problem of how to present the sordid and gruesome material that emerged from the trial in a way that would neither sensationalize nor offend, but at the same time reflect the gravity and the very specific nature of the children's allegations. This issue, which provoked anguish and considerable debate in newsrooms, was handled in different ways at different times: at some times the stories were shockingly graphic; at other times they were perhaps lacking in relevant detail. Judge Beckett did, however, several times express his belief that the media had done a responsible job in covering the trial. Other parties, including the Hamilton-Wentworth Children's Aid Society, emphasized the important role that this publicity was playing in focusing public attention on the issues involved.

What newspapers, radio and television could not do, because of the limitations of these media, was to present the full story of the case, explain its full context and explore the vital problems that it addressed. That is the role of this book, and again I am confronted with the dilemma of how to present the material in a way that does justice to the subject, without unnecessarily disturbing the reader with grossly offensive descriptions.

I do not believe it is possible to convey the truly horrendous quality of the children's allegations, or explain why so many people found them to be totally convincing, without including many lurid details, which most sensitive readers will find difficult and deeply disturbing. I was shocked both by the overall import of what the children disclosed and by their specific descriptions of extreme sexual abuse and sadistic violence. Psychiatrists, who have worked with many abused children throughout their professional careers, reported that they spent sleepless nights brooding over the particularly distressful disclosures that these children made. In his final judgement on the case, Judge Beckett referred to the girls' allegations as "a virtual flood of the most lurid, gruesome, bloodthirsty stories that any person could possibly imagine." But, he said, "as distasteful and as upsetting as it may be to have to repeat this material here, I consider it important to do so, because I believe that these allegations that the children made to a large extent form the basis of decision."

The reader will no doubt find some passages in the book extraordinarily disturbing to read. What I can promise, however, is that such passages are not included for any reason other than to inform the reader of the horrors of child sexual abuse, which must not be ignored. If we are aware of the physical and emotional pain that these children experienced, perhaps we can prevent other children from suffering a similar fate.

Doctors have long had to struggle with their personal sense of outrage as they dealt with the victims of what a 19th-century French physician described as "crimes of the home." Another French doctor from the same era said child abuse "is one of the most terrifying problems that can trouble the heart of man."[2]

In 1970 an American surgeon told the National Commission on Pornography and Obscenity: "Lately, I've been in gynecology and obstetrics. It's absolutely frightening to see what's going on. The wards and private rooms are filled with young girls. . . . Their insides are torn to pieces. It is impossible to describe the repair jobs we do. These girls suffer from every kind of sexual abuse."[3]

Yet the statistics suggest that the victims seen by doctors represent just a tiny fraction of the hundreds of thousands of children who endure their pain in a fearful and guilt-ridden silence, and whose scars cannot be detected by a physical examination. Psychiatrists and former victims have documented the crippling effects that the invisible internal injuries of sexual abuse usually have on the future lives of molested children.

"Statistics, for all the horror they imply, can be so vast that we shield ourselves from the individual lives they represent," wrote Ellen Bass, in an introduction to a book of writings by survivors of child sexual abuse. "It is not easy to open oneself to the knowledge that millions of children are raped. Our defenses rush to protect us from experiencing the pain. But we cannot close ourselves off and hope for the best. We are in danger. Our daughters are in danger. Even our sons are in danger. Behind each statistic, there is a child. She may be you. She may be your daughter. She may be your sister. She may be your friend. You cannot protect her until we can protect all children."[4]

In telling the story of Janis and Linda, I have attempted to explain its significance by drawing on material gleaned from interviews and research on child abuse and satanic cults. But the narrative itself is based entirely on court testimony. All the quotes from the children and adults involved in the case are taken directly from court testimony or documents filed as evidence at the hearing. Some details have been omitted to prevent the children from being identified, and for the same reason I have not used the real names of the children, their parents, their mother's boyfriend and other individuals whom the court ordered must not be identified.

In order to present the children's story and the issues raised at the hearing in a logical and readable sequence, I have not followed the order in which evidence was presented at the hearing. The first section, on the mother's background and the children's early lives, is drawn from the evidence of social workers, teachers, day-care staff and doctors, as well as from the mother's own testimony and statements she made to other people that were entered as evidence at the hearing. The section on the children's allegations is based largely on the foster mother's notes and testimony, with additional information that was supplied by other witnesses. The third section, which deals with the investigation of the case, recounts and analyzes the testimony of police, psychiatrists and social workers. The final section contains detailed accounts of the children's videotaped therapy sessions and the testimony of the three people they accused of abusing them—their mother, her boyfriend and their father.

Although this book documents an extreme example of human depravity, it also describes the love and idealism that fortunately survives in the face of all suffering. While the children's stories were shocking, they were also intensely moving. After hearing the girls' disclosures and seeing them in videotaped therapy sessions, I was left not only repulsed by the abuse they had suffered, but also inspired by the fact that these traumatic experiences have not broken the spirit of these children. I was also greatly impressed by the sincerity and commitment of the foster parents, social workers and doctors who have devoted much energy to helping them deal with their pain. I fervently hope that readers of this book will share these insights, address the overwhelming problem of child sexual abuse and help make some changes in our society.

RITUAL

PART ONE

A BACKGROUND OF ABUSE

CHAPTER 1

SETTING THE SCENE

A last-day-of-school atmosphere prevailed on January 22, 1987, as lawyers made their final submissions in Canada's longest-ever child welfare hearing. One of the lawyers, Michael O'Neail, a large, bald-headed fellow, whose conviviality always looked as if it was bursting to break out of his somber legal garb, brought a party noisemaker with him. He blew it, with the slightly surreptitious air of a schoolboy venturing a classroom prank, just after Judge Thomas Beckett, another large, affable man, adjourned the hearing to await his final judgement, and left the bench with an unaccustomedly sprightly gait.

For 17 months the court had been delving into the allegations of two very young children, whose tales of ritual violence, degradation and abuse contained more stark horror and brutality than almost anything anyone present had ever heard, seen, read or imagined. As they probed from the calm and security of a Hamilton, Ontario, courtroom into a grim and violent story of life in Canada's hidden slums, the judge and lawyers had heard about threats on their own lives, allegedly made by the girls' irate father. They had witnessed a dramatic courtroom scene in which the mother, herself a tragic victim of the cycle of deprivation and abuse, ran screaming from the witness stand and fell shaking into a fetal ball on the courtroom floor, believing that the black-gowned lawyer, who was trying to comfort her, was her now-deceased father threatening to hit her again.

But, as the court adjourned to await a final judgement in the case, the talk was mostly about football. The Toronto lawyers, who had been taken to the cleaners when they bet against Hamilton in the 1986 Grey Cup, were now hoping to get their money back on the Giants in the Super Bowl. They were exchanging banter and pieces of paper with the court constable. This had become quite a ritual as the hearing had continued through two Super Bowls, two Grey Cups and two World Series, while two young children waited in foster homes for the court to determine their future.

It is not every day that lawyers specializing in child welfare issues get their pictures in the paper, and some of them were quite excited about the photographs that the Toronto Star reporter was taking to go with her wrap-up stories on the case. Michael Hartrick, a witty, urbane young man, who represented the children's notoriously violent and unsophisticated father, was very concerned about his hair. He had had his long red mane trimmed a little after the reporter had mentioned that, when it was blowing in the wind, it gave the impression that he was balding on top. O'Neail, who represented the mother's enigmatic boyfriend at the hearing, was taking great delight in an unreassuring show of mock sympathy for Hartrick's concerns.

John Harper, the lawyer for the Children's Aid Society, a dark-haired, serious man with a brusque but friendly manner, was listening with amusement to Hugh Atwood, the representative of the Ontario Official Guardian, express his pique when told that his assistant was more photogenic than he. He said he thought it must be because he had a few gray hairs, and he was hoping for better things from the sketch artist, who was there for the Globe and Mail.

Meanwhile, the Star reporter was cajoling the mother's lawyer, Arthur Brown, a slightly pudgy, red-haired man with a ruddy complexion, who, unlike the other lawyers, considered it beneath his dignity to pose for a photograph. He had just put on a large comical-looking fur hat, and the reporter was telling him he would look quite foolish if she had to resort to sneaking a shot of him in that ridiculous hat. His client, Sharon Wells, was taking great delight in this discussion. Though she had shown huge swings of emotion during the 150 days she had sat in the courtroom, she usually enjoyed a simple joke outside the court and often affectionately teased her lawyer, who, she said, was the only person she trusted in the whole world.

Some reporters and court staff watching this exchange were quietly speculating about a change they had noticed in Sharon during the last few weeks of the hearing. She was a small woman, whose shabby dress and disheveled appearance seemed to reflect the disintegration of her life. But she recently appeared to have acquired a new wardrobe, and had started to take more care of herself. She was now quite smartly dressed and was even wearing makeup—and this new guise coincided with a subtle change in her behavior. She suddenly appeared more distant and controlled, where before she had been casual and friendly outside the courtroom, though in a guarded and distracted way. This new image might have been a last-minute attempt to persuade the court that she was a competent and stable person, who would be capable of caring for her children. Perhaps it was an attempt to convince herself of that.

Nobody who followed the case could fail to feel great compassion for Sharon, after witnessing the young mother's courtroom breakdown and hearing her tell her story of the horrendous abuse she suffered as a child and in her tumultuous marriage. One could not help but feel that this slightly built woman, who somehow gave the impression of never having been given a chance to grow, was a victim of a harsh system that was now grinding her down with this relentless, interminable legal process. Everyone in the courtroom was touched when she would show off her Instamatic snapshots of her baby daughter, Melanie, who was born while the trial was already in progress, and then snatched away by the authorities within days of her birth.

Yet it was a sympathy that was mixed with horror and disgust. The court had also seen hours of videotaped play-therapy sessions in which Sharon's young children Janis and Linda screamed, hid in cupboards, played at being little babies who were being cooked in ovens and showed almost unbearable anguish and fear as they told their psychiatrists about grotesque forms of sexual abuse inflicted by their mother and her boyfriend Gary. The handful of observers permitted to attend the closed Crown wardship hearing had been shocked and repulsed by witnesses' accounts of the children's detailed graphic descriptions, not only of ugly, degrading abuse, but also of macabre scenes of violent ritual, including murders and cannibalistic acts, which the girls said their mother and Gary and their father involved them in.

Beyond belief these stories may have been, though the psychiatrists who examined them and many of the people who sat in the court eventually ceased to think so. But where did they come from? What perverse influences could have so warped the minds or life experience of two young girls who were barely out of kindergarten? Why did their mother, who reveled so much in her own role as victim, display no horror or sympathy for the dreadful things her children were relating?

These questions lingered in the minds of people who observed Sharon Wells as she sat in the courtroom, gasping and sighing, shaking her head and wringing her hands, her prominent lips open in a vacant expression, as her unexpectedly piercing eyes darted all around her. People wondered about her as she would rock back and forth in her chair, repeating a prayer that became almost a chant, "God give me strength," while she waited for the judge to decide if she would ever be allowed to see her children again.

Those who puzzled over their mixed and confusing responses to Sharon Wells had less opportunity to study the character of her former husband, Gordon, whose comparatively brief appearance nevertheless deeply impressed all who saw him testify. If ever there was someone whose reputation preceded him, it was Gordon Wells. For months the court had been hearing details of his alleged acts and threats of extreme violence, culminating in Sharon's claim that he had told her he was going to shut the court down and "bring his satanic friends to testify." Even his lawyer, Michael Hartrick, was not being entirely facetious when he said he was scared of him—in fact Hartrick had been one of the people in the court whom Gordon had, according to Sharon, threatened to "blow away."

When he did appear, this brusque, aggressive man exhibited a certain rough charm. He spoke softly most of the time, but in a rapid, clipped manner, seldom finishing a sentence. His long black hair appeared to be carefully brushed back and greased down and he wore a slightly threadbare black velvet jacket over his jeans and work boots. But his eyes glared threats and his brow furrowed menacingly with anger as his voice sometimes rose to a fierce, blustering tone.

Again the questions lingered. Was this man, who made light of the fact that he carried a sawed-off shotgun in the trunk of his car, really just a "mush-ball" on the inside, as his lawyer claimed? Or could he have committed the grisly murders that his daughters alleged? Why could he say no more about his children's bizarre tales than "It's all B.S."? Did he have to give an explanation in the face of quite thin evidence against him? Was he a potential victim of a child-protection philosophy that assumes parents to be guilty solely on the basis of children's statements? Did the state have the right to take away this man's children because they were emotionally threatened by his violent lifestyle?

As Judge Beckett retired to consider his judgement, he was also confronted with the puzzle of what to make of Gary Evans, the young university graduate who had become the boyfriend of the unattractive, hostile and somewhat simple-minded Sharon Wells. Evans was the father of the new baby and the most prominent figure in the two older girls' detailed descriptions of sexual abuse. A soft-spoken, mild-mannered man of West Indian descent, he had told the court that he was not the "type of person" who would harm children in any way, and psychiatric reports had supported this claim. Was he a predatory pedophile who got involved with Sharon in order to molest her little girls, or was he an innocent who had become entangled in a legal web woven from children's fairy tales?

Another possibility that the judge would have to consider was that these small children had been somehow manipulated, that someone had planted strange ideas in their minds—ideas that had been elaborated and distorted through the promptings of prejudiced or gullible social workers and foster parents. Perhaps their foster mother, the grandmotherly Catherine McInnis, who was almost driven to distraction by the girls' fearsome horror stories, was, as their father suggested, "a nut case." Could the foster mother have encouraged their fantasies?

Judge Beckett would also have to think about what to make of the fiasco of the police investigation of the case, which seemed to have been founded on the assumption that the girls' stories were "beyond belief" and not worth taking seriously. The Hamilton-Wentworth Regional Police had found no tangible evidence to support the children's allegations. But what was the judge to make of that, when the officers assigned to the investigation had not even interviewed some of the key people involved the case. Also, they had cajoled the children with their aggressive skeptical interrogations and allowed plenty of time for evidence to be destroyed or removed before they went looking for it.

All these questions, and many more, confronted Thomas Beckett as he walked out of the court to begin the monumental task of sifting through the evidence contained in 142 exhibits and more than 15,000 pages of court transcripts in order to arrive at a judgement as to whether Janis, Linda and Melanie should be made wards of the Crown, and, if so, whether their parents should have any access to them.

When it began in September, 1985, the case of the Children's Aid Society of Hamilton-Wentworth versus Children X and Y had been scheduled to last ten days. However, it had soon become apparent that it would take considerably longer because of the detail and bizarre character of the children's allegations and the fact that they were too young to testify. Their statements had been made to a variety of people and been analyzed by a bevy of experts, all of whom would also have to testify.

At that point no-one dreamed how much longer it would take. Certainly not the newspaper, television and radio reporters who gathered in an art deco style downtown office building that housed the Unified Family Court to cover what promised to be a weird and sensational case. Their very presence caused the first of many delays and legal wrangles, as lawyers argued about whether the media should have access to the proceedings, which were closed to the general public in order to protect the identity of the children.

Judge Beckett, who had been active in Liberal Party politics and had gained a considerable reputation as a civil libertarian lawyer before being appointed to the bench, decided that the public had a right to know about a case involving issues of general concern. But he made an order that limited the media coverage to insure that nothing was reported that would identify the children, parents, foster parents or even some of the professionals who worked with the children. In order to avoid turning the case into a "media circus" and because of the limited space in the court, the judge also ordered that only six news organizations could cover the hearing, and that others be allowed to attend only if some of the original six gave up their places in the court. This ruling, which caused great anguish to editors, actually had the effect of insuring that the case had an unprecedented level of daily coverage—newspapers and electronic media, which normally drop in and out of lengthy trials according to the potential news value of the anticipated testimony, felt obliged in this instance to be there continually, fearing that someone else would claim their seats in the court.

The case began to take on a nightmarish complexity, as it proceeded in a stuffy little courtroom, where the indoor environment was measurably more polluted even than the notorious air of the industrial city outside. The new baby was born, and an application to make her a Crown ward was joined with the original case. This meant two new lawyers coming into the hearing, which was moved to a more spacious, but equally stuffy, courtroom in the Hamilton-Wentworth District Court House. Some of the lawyers originally involved in the hearing had to pull out for personal reasons—one to have a baby with whom she had become pregnant at around the time the trial began. The need for new lawyers to catch up with details of earlier testimony required adjournments, as did various side issues and procedural wrangles that crept into the case. The case became, as Judge Beckett put it, "like a living organism" that grew to almost unmanageable proportions as it dragged its feet through the ponderous legal process.

Public concern began to grow over the monstrous length of the case, the huge expenditure of public funds and the danger that traumatized children, and, possibly innocent adults, were suffering because of this protracted legal process. Judge Beckett began to show signs of distress from the public pressure he was under, and his normally patient, good-humored approach sometimes gave way to flashes of temper, in which he used his keen wit to lash out satirically at lawyers engaging in legal wrangles or "interminable cross-examinations."

Just before adjourning the case to await his judgement, Beckett had been provoked into an angry outburst about the "obscene" length of the trial. He railed at lawyers, who, he said, appeared to be wanting to make a career of the trial and seemed prepared to continue interminably a legal process that had been "an act of perverse cruelty to these children."

As was usually the case, a long lunch-break restored the comfortably-proportioned judge to a more affable frame of mind. There was an expression of immense relief on his large, sensitive face as he almost skipped out of the courtroom on that January afternoon. At the age of 62, he had just remarried. After a few weeks of hard work on his judgement, he was hoping to be able to take some time off for a honeymoon.

EARLY YEARS

Childhood experiences are often a dominant influence on people's lives. The way people treat their children is frequently modeled on their own upbringing. This natural human characteristic takes on a tragic dimension for a person whose early experiences were of pain and humiliation and whose only model for parenting was one of brutal abuse.

Sharon Wells was such a person. She was victimized by her own parents and other adults during childhood, just as her own children were abused by her and the people she associated with. She was part of what social workers call "the cycle of child abuse," the process by which exploitative behavior is passed on from one generation to the next. As Judge Beckett noted in his final judgement on the case, "An adult who is abused as a child is predisposed to abuse his or her own children since people tend to repeat what they grew up with."

Slum clearance, development and restoration have now transformed the Toronto inner-city neighborhoods where Sharon Wells grew up. One can trace, in the series of addresses where her family lived, the pattern of migration of Canada's urban poor during the last 20 years, as they were driven ever further from the city center by the wrecker's ball and the needs of a booming real estate market.

It was an exodus that ended in what was to have been the promised land: the efficient high-rise buildings of the outer suburbs. But the milk and honey went only to the developers, as these rapidly deteriorating apartment complexes became isolated enclaves of poverty and crime—the newer and bleaker ghettoes of the dispossessed.

An expensive new town house development now occupies the site of one of the homes where Sharon lived during her abused and deprived childhood. It is now a fashionable district full of art galleries, bookstores, restaurants and boutiques. This development was the subject of a bitter planning controversy in the late 1960s, as citizens' groups fought to preserve a working-class neighborhood. Sharon did not remember the place with nostalgia.

"It was such a bad place to live. We had to move because there was rats and bugs," she said, as she told the court her tragic life history. "They were never really good places. The best place we lived was in North York. But there were still bugs."

Sharon, and thousands like her, escaped the plague of rats by leaving the inner city, and that may have been the only real progress that came from the best intentions of public planners, allied with the perhaps less pure motives of the property developers. Although they did nothing to break the cycle of poverty, they did succeed in sweeping a highly visible social problem off the downtown streets and under a carpet of suburban sprawl.

Low-income housing and welfare rights are no longer such fashionable issues as they were in the late 1960s. The public agenda has moved on to other concerns. Near the top of that agenda is the newly recognized plight of sexually abused children. No-one knew or cared when Sharon silently suffered such abuse 20 years ago in the downtown slums.

In Canada, the 1984 report of the federal government Committee On Sexual Offenses Against Children And Youths, which is usually referred to as the Badgley Commission, concluded, "Child sexual abuse is a largely hiddent yet pervasive tragedy that has damaged the lives of tens of thousands of Canadian children and youths." This committee did a survey of a representative sample of Canadians and found that about 40 percent of the women interviewed said they had been victims of unwanted sexual acts during childhood. The report described the fear, shame and helplessness experienced by these victims, and noted that three out of four of them kept the assault a closely guarded personal secret. The report commented: "Why did so few of the young victims seek assistance? These persons, or the parents of children who have been assaulted or molested, explain in their own words why most of them did not even tell another family member. Two-thirds were too young when these incidents occurred to know that sexual contacts were wrong. If they did know, then they were too ashamed about what happened, or they were too afraid of their assailants to tell others. Among the few who later told a parent about these incidents, all were initially disbelieved."

Sharon Wells was one such victim. As she told her pathetic story to the court, shaking and wringing her hands, pausing often as she began to sob or pant hysterically, everyone who listened was conscious of the dreadful irony—she was also describing what her own children had allegedly suffered at her hands.

Sharon was the fourth of six children. Sharon's mother and father split up soon after their youngest son, Mike, was born.

Sharon's first memory of abuse was from when she was about three or four years old. They were living in a three-storey brick house with an attic, which led out onto the flat roof. Sharon used to go up to the attic to play. There was a back room in the attic, little more than a cubbyhole. Her father kept a telescope up there. They had a boarder living in the house whom the children called "the redheaded woodpecker" because of his red hair.

Judge Beckett gently told Sharon to take her time and relax, as she tearfully told the court of her encounter with the redheaded woodpecker: "We were playing a game: horsey. My mom used to play it with me on her foot. But I wasn't on his foot. I was laughing because I didn't really understand then. But I do now. I got wet. And we were just playing. He just got mean afterwards, and he put me in the cubbyhole, and said if I tell anyone he would. . . . He threatened me. I didn't know. I didn't know. I didn't understand. But I do now."

It was towards the end of the wardship hearing that Sharon gave this testimony, and she apologized to the judge for her lack of composure: "I'm sorry. I listened to all this through this court. I thought I'd be able to sit here, since I already heard it, and it would be easier to sit here and say it."

She also remembered being abused by her father in the same house. He stuck his fingers in her, she said. She didn't tell anyone because "he would kill me. You just don't get him angry at you."

One time he inserted a block in her, and her mother took her to the hospital. She didn't tell anyone about how it got there "because you don't make my dad mad. He hit us kids a lot. He would kick my brother, take the boot to him. My brother come home, and said he got beat up at school. My dad whipped him good. He'll kill you, sure as you sit there.

"One time I needed help to tie up my shoes. I asked him to help me. He just said, 'Don't bug me.' He hauled off, and went wham, and I went flying. We had this boarder called Lorne. I used to like to watch him put insoles in his boots. He said, 'Sharon, some day you'll find happiness.' I just looked at him. He said, 'I hope it isn't after you're dead.' I didn't understand what he said. But I do now."

Sharon said her dad put his fingers in her when he got drunk on weekends—not every weekend, but about ten or fifteen times altogether. She said her mom and dad used to fight a lot and one of the reasons her mother eventually left her father was that she caught him molesting her.

Her mother moved with the children to a rat-infested house in the neighborhood, which was slated for redevelopment. From there, they moved to an apartment over a store, in a seedy, run-down district where the housing had deteriorated too far to be worth renovating. This area remains much the same today, except that the corner store is now owned by a chain. The tavern over which Sharon's family lived for a while now seeks to lure the more daring or desperate into its bleak confines with a neon sign advertising "Three Exotic Dancers."

What Sharon remembers most about the apartment over the store is the broken stair, which you couldn't step on, where she once lost her doll. There were two bedrooms, one for the boys and one for the girls, and her mother slept in the living room on a bed. She does not remember how long they lived there, except that they were there for at least one Christmas because the children sold Christmas trees, which the boys had scrounged by telling someone "a sob story."

They lived over the tavern for about another year and Sharon's most vivid memory of this place was a haunting one. Her father was not living with them but he used to visit. One day Sharon's older sister Sally brought her to the window of the apartment and pointed to a stained paper towel on the ground.

"That's Dad's blood," Sally told Sharon, "Dad fell out the window."

Her mother told her that her dad had jumped out of the window. He had been taken to hospital and recovered. He continued to visit them after that, but he did not sexually abuse Sharon any more.

She remembers being physically abused by her mother. She used to try to protect herself from these beatings by laughing instead of crying. This would enrage her mother, but the more the woman hit her, the more Sharon would laugh. Sharon later wondered if this had somehow distorted her emotionally. She said she scared herself sometimes by laughing when she should have been crying. She could understand, however, why her mother would be driven to administer these beatings: "She didn't know any better. Her mother did it to her. Her mother's mother did it."

From the tavern the family moved to a house on a short narrow street, where many of the buildings are now uninhabitable and boarded up. When she was asked to describe this house to the court, Sharon shook her head with an expression of disgust. "There were lots of bugs," she said. "It had a veranda and a backyard covered with cement.

"My mom has a saying: A place can get messy and can get dirty, and her place is always messy not dirty. From my point of view it was always dirty," she told the court.

She said her mother would tell the children to clean the place. On one occasion her sister Sally was washing dishes to get ready to eat supper, when their mother noticed that the table had not been washed. "She made us put food right on the table. She said, 'If you want to eat off a dirty table . . .' I don't like what happened. There was people there, company there."

When Sharon was about ten years old her mother's latest boyfriend moved in to live with them. This perverse and violent man, Anton Laroche, who would later become her stepfather, was to have a devastating effect on the precarious emotional balance of Sharon and her sisters. Anton and Sharon's mother had a child, Lucille, who was born when Sharon was 13 years old. Anton also had a daughter by a previous marriage who was about Sharon's age.

Even before he moved in, when Sharon and her younger sister Lesley would stay at his house with their mother, Anton would join in the games they played with his daughter, and encourage them to touch him sexually.

When Anton moved in with the family, his nephew also came to stay as a lodger. It was he who first persecuted Sharon. She and Lesley used to share the same bed in the basement, and one night when their mother and Anton had gone out, his nephew, whom the girls called uncle, came down to the basement.

As Sharon described her memory of this incident to the court, she said, "When I think about this it makes me so angry inside. I can't believe it. He had his pants down and he was rubbing against me. I kept my eyes closed so he wouldn't think I'm awake, because I'm so scared. A knock came at the door. Mom caught him going upstairs doing up his pants.

"She kicked him out. That was great. I'm proud of her for kicking him out. But he was eating at the table the next day. She threw the sucker out, and to think he was eating at our table the next day. I can't believe that woman," said Sharon, almost shouting in the silent courtroom, as she relived her rage, "I don't feel I've got the worst mother in the world. But I have a hard time believing it."

On another occasion Sharon was in an upstairs room watching a raccoon who was sitting outside on the windowsill. Her mother was having a party downstairs. Anton's nephew came upstairs, grabbed Sharon and pulled down her pants.

"He started rubbing my bum. I was facing the other way. I remember looking at that raccoon, you know, just watching. He started putting fingers in me. He said, 'I do this to my wife. She likes it. You're going to like it.' I thought, 'Hey, that raccoon has some great power. He could stop it.' I said, 'That raccoon is going to eat you,' and the raccoon just left. He kept rubbing my bum.

"That's not the last time. I just can't understand my mom. I didn't tell her about that. Why should I? The guy said nothing could hurt him, and women like being touched there.

"Once he did it to Lesley. I lied there. I didn't do a damn thing to help her. I should have done something. I didn't do anything. And when I turned sixteen, I left. I didn't stay there and help her. I should have done something. I feel I should have done something to help her. I helped me and my sister bolt the door so Anton wouldn't get in. That's all I did. I just lied there. To this day I don't understand why I didn't help her. Why didn't I jump up and beat him?"

But the cruelest abuse came from Anton himself. "He was sick, sick," Sharon told the court. "I don't know how the Lord can make such sick people."

She had some respite after her mother tried to leave Anton following a chaotic period of bitter fighting between them. But eventually Anton moved into their new home, another run-down building in a seedy section of Toronto. Sharon's brothers shared a little room behind the furnace. The walls were painted black and they had decorated the room with objects such as a fearsome skull with a head of hair, which Sharon remembers with horror. Anton used to babysit the children, and when the others went out to play, he would take Sharon to her brothers' room.

"He used to touch me all over and say, 'It's mine. Your tits are mine.' He used to do nasty things. I was so scared. He was just . . . I don't know . . . I guess maybe . . . I don't know. We'd be out playing. He'd call me in to get a cookie or something. He'd put me on the bed. The room was painted black with a skull. He used to tie my hands to the bed. It was around about the time my mom was pregnant that he really did it more."

Sharon choked on her words as she tried to describe to the court the "nasty things" that Anton used to do to her. She said he would stick things into her. Her own lawyer, Arthur Brown, persistently trying to draw details from her, asked her what things. She tried to speak several times, before she hoarsely whispered, "A carrot and . . .

other things. I know it hurt. I know I can feel it sometimes. It bothers me a lot.

"My friend, who lived two doors beside us, had an uncle. We used to go to his place, and he used to do things like Anton. Touch us down there and play with us. I just felt like, hey, men do that to you. It's allowed. That's the way they care and love you."

Sharon said this man used to give them money, and sometimes they would go to his house for that reason. She worried that this meant that she was a prostitute.

She said the family moved to government housing—"It looked like a barracks, houses after houses, rows of houses, houses here, houses there, all attached together"—but the abuse continued.

School provided some respite from the home environment. Sharon said she used to stay on at school for sports, plays and other activities. She got on to the cheerleading team. She liked being out of the house. The one school activity she used to avoid was the health classes, which involved sex education: "I used to skip off to the washroom. I didn't like it, because I didn't like the slides and stuff they showed us. I didn't want to know about it. I figured I knew all I wanted to know about it, and I didn't want to know any more."

She told the court, "I just didn't understand. I wanted to understand. I'd not let my kids go through what I went through. No way, when people do things like that to you. You don't understand at that age, who I was, what I was, where I was. I just thought these men are allowed to do this to you. When you finally realize this is wrong, you don't want it. You go to your friends, and their uncle is doing the same thing. I wonder, 'Is it right and is it wrong?' A part of me saying, 'It's right,' a part of me saying, 'It's wrong.' I'm so confused.

"The pain doesn't go away. I'm trying so hard to put it in the back of my mind. You try and live day to day, but you can't forget."

Like many victims of child sexual abuse, Sharon Wells escaped from her home at the earliest opportunity. At 16, she left her school and what little protection her home afforded her. She was sexually experienced but ignorant of any of the joy, or even of the pleasure, that can be found in normal adult relationships. Desperately deprived of love and understanding, she deeply distrusted other people, and had little self-esteem.

Sharon's needs were great, but her expectations were low. Her stunted childhood had prepared her for only one role in life, that of the victim of violent and exploitative men. It did not take her long to find one.

When she was asked in court to describe the natural father of her first child, Sharon said, "Ross was like every man. They start out nice and then they turn."

Sharon first met Ross, when she was 15 years old, while visiting her sister Sally in New Brunswick. The older sister had gone there when she fled their abusive home a few years earlier. It was during this visit that Sharon first learned that Sally had also been sexually abused by their father and then their stepfather. Sally urged Sharon to come to live with her as soon as she turned 16, and promised to send her a ticket as a birthday present.

"I was really glad. I was so happy getting out of there," Sharon said, as she described the optimism with which she embarked on her "fresh start," the first of many attempts to somehow magically cleanse a life that had been polluted at its source.

It was summertime when she went to New Brunswick. She enrolled in school and stayed for a year, but she didn't get a certificate and is not sure what grade she was in, though she thinks it was grade ten. She became friends with Ross, who had a job and would take her out and buy things for her. He used to give her money and buy her lunch. She said they got along well together, until her sister went back to Toronto and Sharon moved into a one-room apartment. She became more dependent on Ross, who started to make greater demands on her. She used to record her personal feelings in a diary, which Ross got hold of one day. Sharon would not say what it was in the diary that enraged her boyfriend, but she said it was after this that he started to get nasty and violent with her.

As Sharon told her story in court, her mood would frequently shift from anger and tearful anguish to a childish, giggly, lighthearted state, which wasn't always appropriate to the harsh experiences she described. At times it seemed that she was enjoying having an audience, and delighting in her role as heroine in her own tragedy. It was almost with nostalgia that she described some of the acts of violence inflicted on her, as if she perceived these acts as an expression of love, and her victimization as an endorsement of her own importance to the man who abused her.

Sharon, who had skipped the sex education classes in school, soon became pregnant. She was still only 16 and she was scared. But she was also happy. She wanted to keep the baby, "because I would have someone who was going to love me, and I was going to love them with all my heart and soul."

She wanted to go home to Toronto. She felt that she needed her mother's help and she believed she could stand up for herself at home now. She didn't think Anton would touch her any more. She said it never occurred to her that her stepfather would have by now found a new victim in his own daughter, Lucille. Lucille was Sharon's halfsister, her mother's daughter, and about ten years younger than Sharon. Sharon said she told Ross that she was going back home to her mom to have her baby. He said, "We'll get married and have the baby, and give the baby a name and that." Ross and Sharon both lived with her family until the baby was born, but they were not allowed to sleep together because it was felt that this might be a bad influence on Lucille. They never did get married.

Sharon said Ross used to hit her during her pregnancy but not hard enough that it would leave marks on her. She said that once when they went to the Canadian National Exhibition together, they got into a big fight and he hit her, and then took her money and left her there. He had a chip on his shoulder, she said, because he was very good-looking and women would be attracted to him. She said she would tell him, "It's not fair to me. You're looking at other women, and I'm carrying your child. You're going to marry me, not them."

Ross got a job in a factory, and, after Janis was born, he and Sharon moved into a small apartment. Sharon's 14-year-old cousin lived nearby and used to visit them to see the baby. It was not the safest of neighborhoods, and Sharon used to ask Ross to walk home with the girl when she stayed late at night. She did not exactly trust Ross with other women, but did not dream she had anything to fear from a 14-year-old girl. When she came home one evening to find Ross and her cousin in bed together, Sharon was astonished and outraged. She felt both of them had betrayed her trust and their relationship with her. When she tried to throw Ross out of the apartment, he beat her up badly. She called the police, who arrived in time to hear him say, "I should have killed you." Sharon said that, on the advice of the police, she charged Ross with assault causing bodily harm, and he was sentenced to two years less a day.

Janis was about six months old when Sharon and Ross split up. After a few months Sharon began a relationship with Gordon Wells, who would later adopt Janis as his daughter. Gordon was a friend of Sharon's older brothers, and she had first met him when she was about 14 years old. She remembered being impressed with his good looks and his skill at drawing. Soon after the breakup with Ross, Sharon went to visit her brother and saw Gordon there, lifting weights. At that time Gordon was going out with Sharon's stepsister, Anton's daughter from a previous marriage, but he and Sharon got together at a party. She said that, when she told him about her relationship with Ross, Gordon said, "If that bastard ever touches you again, I'll kill him. Stick with me and I'll protect you from that guy."

Sharon said Gordon did protect her. "There was a time when Ross came. But he went away because Gordon said he'd bury him if he came near me. He meant what he said. He was going to protect me. I felt very safe with Gordon. He had muscles and tattoos. He looked very manly. I was 17." Ross remained on the scene, however, until he was sent to jail.

Janis was admitted to hospital for gastroenteritis when she was nine months old, and it was noted on the hospital record that the baby was dirty when she was brought in by the mother. After Janis was released from hospital, a public health nurse visited Sharon's apartment. The nurse reported to the Metro Toronto Children's Aid Society that the apartment was "a disaster area," with dirty clothes, garbage and food on the floor. Janis's crib was missing some screws and was not safe. When asked about the baby's diet, Sharon said she fed her steak, pork chops and Kentucky Fried Chicken.

Sharon moved before the Children's Aid Society (CAS) could follow up on this report. She denied suggestions made by a CAS lawyer at the wardship hearing that she was attempting to get away from the social work agency when she moved into an apartment in the building where her father lived. It turned out to be her last contact with her father before he died several years later, and it was a negative one. At her dad's insistence she went out one night with a friend of his, who liked her and wanted to see her again. She later stood him up for Gordon, and this enraged her father, who called her a tramp.

Sharon moved in with Gordon. She said he loved Janis and knew that she and Janis were a package deal. She knew he was her brothers' friend and wouldn't do anything to hurt her. They spent a lot of good times together. He drank a lot, but he wasn't nasty, she said. "We'd run around the house, and joke, and put on records. He wasn't that violent. He would talk violent, but he wasn't violent with me before we married."

There was one incident, however, before they were married, that boded ill for their future relationship. They were sleeping together, Sharon said, and she woke up to find his hands around her throat. She said Gordon told her he was asleep and did not remember what happened, but she was not altogether convinced. She said that, as a result, she was always uneasy about sleeping with Gordon.

The picture of Gordon Wells that subsequently emerged from Sharon's testimony at the wardship hearing, divorce depositions and various other statements made in other court proceedings was of a man obsessed with violence: a man who terrorized his wife with threats, and several times came close to killing her. His behavior, as she described it, was so outrageous that it began to take on some elements of black comedy, elements that Sharon sometimes appeared to find quite amusing in retrospect. Gordon was portrayed as a man who would keep a sawed-off shotgun under his bed, clean his nails with a switchblade and trim the Christmas tree with a machete.

When he testified at the wardship hearing, Gordon confirmed many aspects of Sharon's account of their relationship, though he took issue with some of the specific allegations she had made against him. He said she used to bait him and play upon his temper by saying things about Ross. Gordon said his relationship with Sharon was "the complete pits. I could be around anybody, no problems. But, around Sharon, it was like setting off a short stick of TNT."

One of Gordon's tattoos was a depiction of a cartoon character called Hot Stuff—a baby-faced devil figure with horns and a forked tail, carrying a pitchfork. Much would be made of this devil tattoo during the wardship hearing because of suggestions that a satanic cult was involved in the violent graveyard rituals described by the children. The tattooed caricature was given more sinister connotations when linked with some comments attributed to Gordon, such as "God is dead, and I am the devil," and "When I die I will go to the devil."

Sharon and Gordon were married a few months after they began living together in a dilapidated house in an older suburban neighborhood. Sharon was pregnant again, and it was winter. The house wasn't heated properly, and, Sharon said, it was always cold. She became depressed and began to question whether she should have the baby. After counseling from her doctor, she decided not to have an abortion.

Not long after they were married, Sharon made her first attempt to separate from Gordon. She left him and went to her mother's house. But her mother urged her to return to her husband. She told Sharon, "You made your bed. Lie in it."

Sharon returned, but she was afraid of the gun that Gordon kept. It was a pump-action shotgun, and, according to Sharon, Gordon's father had sawed off the barrel for him. Sharon's fears were realized when Gordon got drunk one day, had an argument with her and threatened to blow her head off.

She said she was also uneasy about leaving her husband alone with the baby. She had a job for a while and used to return home tired after work. Gordon would tell her to go to bed and that he would watch Janis. Sharon would do as he suggested, but used to get up and "creep up on him, to see what he was doing to Janis." One day she explained to him that she was very scared because she had been sexually molested as a child.

"He said, 'People like that should be shot, hung up by their feet—something to that effect—and killed, should not just be killed but castrated,'" Sharon recounted. "So from that day on I was more at ease when Gordon would watch Janis."

Sharon said Gordon never hit the children, but he once picked Janis up, when she was a baby, and slammed her against the wall with such force that he might have put her right through it. She said she told him never to do that again.

Around that time, Janis was treated three times for head injuries, either in hospital or by the family doctor, Dr. Harvey Knapp. Dr. Knapp was not alarmed by this, as he maintained that two-year-olds are prone to falling or banging their heads. Any fears he might have had were allayed when it was found that a torsion in the child's foot might be affecting her stability, and a foot brace was prescribed to correct it.

After Linda was born, Gordon legally adopted Janis. Sharon, Gordon and the two children moved into a high-rise apartment building in a newly developed area in the outskirts of Toronto. They planned to start afresh in a nice new place. It was to be a different way of life.

The Children's Aid Society, which had been concerned about Sharon's care of Janis as a result of the public health nurse's report, concluded that the older child's situation had improved as a result of the marriage and the move to the new apartment. The agency closed its file on the family for the time being.

The fresh start, however, turned out to be a disaster. The relationship was rapidly deteriorating, and Sharon partly blamed the new apartment, which she described as a "bad luck place. I started getting moody because we lived on the 20th floor, and there was not a lot I could do. I was just totally bored. I loved my kids and everything, but everything started to get to me."

She and Gordon would get into huge fights over little things. Sharon said she got bothered about things like the way he parted his hair. He was drinking more, and Sharon said she was "super bothered" by all the beer bottles that were left around the apartment. She said that when Gordon had his friends over to visit he would boast to them about what he did in bed with her.

Sharon said she began to feel great anxiety. She started to realize that she shouldn't have married Gordon. She had never loved him, she said, and only married him because Janis never knew anyone else as a father, and because she didn't want to jump from man to man.

"When Gordon thinks I baited him, maybe I did. I took a lot of anger out on Gordon, which I shouldn't have done, and maybe that's what prompted him to do what he did," she reflected, as she gave her testimony in court. "My personal thing that happened to me as a kid was really getting to me. Sometimes I would pick a fight so that I didn't have to sleep with him. Often Gordon ended up sleeping on the couch."

Linda, the new baby, was sickly from birth. She had been treated in hospital for a bladder infection. Sharon was having trouble feeding her, and was convinced that this was the fault of the medication prescribed for the child.

Little more than a month after they had moved into the new apartment, Sharon insisted that Gordon leave. She would later explain to social workers that it was because he was too sexually demanding and had forced her to have intercourse against her will. As he continued to be seen around the building, the welfare worker and the social worker attached to the housing project suspected that the separation was just a ruse to allow Sharon to collect welfare. They began to investigate her, and later felt guilty as they feared this investigation might have caused her mental breakdown a month later.

Sharon would later describe this breakdown as "an anxiety attack"—a term she heard frequently in court as doctors analyzed her voluminous medical record. It happened the same day she had taken Janis to the hospital for treatment for a head injury. She said she found herself shaking and crying. She didn't know what was wrong with her. She called Dr. Knapp. He asked her where the children were, and either called her mother or told her to do so.

Sharon said that at the time she called the doctor Janis was crying for something to eat. "I made Janis a sandwich, and gave Linda her bottle," Sharon recalled. "I crawled to the table because I could not stand up. My legs were totally shaken. I went into the storage room, a cubbyhole, because I was very afraid, afraid of me, afraid I might hurt the kids because of the crying. Then my mom came and told me it was going to be okay."

Dr. Knapp noted in his file, "I feel very sorry for her, but everything is very complex. Out of my league at that time to handle this degree of problem."

Sharon was hospitalized for 35 days, and while she was there she took an overdose of sleeping pills—they were pills that she had had at home and had asked Gordon to bring in for her. She said Gordon was "really nasty" when he came to visit. He called her a mental patient and said she was sick. She took her rings off her fingers and threw them at him.

"I felt nobody gives a damn about me, why should I live. Gordon had brought the pills. At that point in my life I just wanted somebody to give a damn about me. I didn't feel that anybody cared."

CHAPTER 3

THE CAS GETS INVOLVED

Social workers were usually more than a little scared when they were called upon to go into the huge apartment complex where Sharon and her children lived. The stark and forbidding high-rise blocks were devoid of any aesthetic appeal, and the minuscule pieces of green space that the developers had provided were usually strewn with trash. A small token playground, for the hundreds of children living in this "family housing development," was sandwiched between the highway and a parking lot. It afforded a dispiriting view of the back of one of the buildings, where the monotony of concrete and glass was broken only by several large garbage containers and the wire mesh that covered the ground-floor windows.

When Marg Wilson, a social worker with the Metro Toronto Children's Aid Society, drove down the short street that separated the development from its immediate neighborhood, she traveled from the security of a quiet, modestly affluent suburb into an area of poverty, violence and despair. She could read this on the threatening faces of the youths who loitered around the drab entranceway, as she prayed that they would not follow her into the elevator.

This was by no means a new experience, however, for Ms. Wilson, who was a seasoned veteran of social work. She was a tough, shrewd woman, whose casual, slightly offhand manner tended to put people at ease. The image she projected was not that of a prying, middle-class do-gooder, but of a busy, caring person, who could relate to the concerns and problems of her clients.

How much Ms. Wilson, and others like her, were able to do for their clients was determined less by their own personal dedication to the job than by the restrictions imposed by the system in which they worked. Their role in that system was fraught with almost impossible contradictions, which are rooted in society's conflicting goals and priorities as they relate to child abuse and family violence.

The Children's Aid Society that Marg worked for was founded in 1891 by a crusading journalist, as a private organization devoted to the protection of neglected children. Ontario government legislation, introduced two years later, encouraged the establishment of similar organizations across the province, and charged them with the administration of public measures for the prevention of cruelty to children. While these agencies have remained private, they are largely financed and controlled by the Ontario government. This unusual status perhaps reflects an ambiguous attitude on the part of governments toward the delicate issue of state intervention into the traditionally sacrosanct, private realm of family life.

Legislation requires that Children's Aid Societies protect children, where necessary, but at the same time support the integrity and autonomy of the family unit. In 1983 a standing committee of the provincial legislative assembly was told that this sets up "an incredible, inhumane dilemma" for the social worker.

Former Minister of Community and Social Services Frank Drea told the same committee, "A CAS worker who is involved with a high-risk family has to walk a very, very difficult line. On the one hand they are there to prevent or to help. On the other hand at the very same time that they are in the household, they are also collecting evidence by just being there. They are looking around and they are seeing things. This is a very, very difficult line, where they have to be, at the same time, the investigator and the remedy."

Their task is made even more difficult because the government has put increased demands on the social work agencies. New laws require that all suspected cases of child abuse be reported and investigated; the Children's Aid Societies maintain that they have not been granted enough additional funds to do the job properly. Yet, whenever they fail to do all that is required of them, public opinion, now highly sensitive both to child abuse and to human rights, is easily moved to outrage, either over the plight of a child whose abuse has gone undetected, or over a parent who is wrongly accused of abuse.

It was about a month after Sharon's release from the psychiatric ward that Marg Wilson first visited her in Sharon's 20th-storey apartment. Ms. Wilson found the young mother depressed and overwhelmed by her situation. Sharon told her she was unable to cope and very disorganized in her housework. Janis was very demanding, and, according to Sharon, was getting lippy, would pull at the baby, mess her room, throw tantrums, dawdle, hit other children and spit out food.

Linda was sick with diarrhea and vomiting. A public health nurse had already been in the home to assist with this problem; a pediatrician, who felt that Sharon had a problem feeding the baby properly, recommended that she be encouraged to be more tolerant and take more time with her. Sharon said she wanted to be a good mother and didn't want to hit the children, but felt like she wasn't able to get up in the morning and get her work done.

Sharon's mother had always warned her not to trust the Children's Aid, but she was desperate for any kind of support and immediately established a rapport with the sympathetic and practical Ms. Wilson. The social worker made arrangements for a visiting homemaker, and for Sharon to participate in a parenting project that provided guidance to mothers considered to be in danger of abusing their children.

Ms. Wilson had been called upon to visit Sharon because of concerns reported by a social services worker, who became involved with the family when Sharon applied for welfare. Marg knew about Sharon's hospital admission, but she was not aware of the suicide attempt. She was also unaware, until about a year later, of Sharon's prior involvement with the CAS, because that information was filed under Sharon's maiden name. This kind of communication failure was characteristic of the various professional attempts to help the family, as it is in many such cases. Part of the same pattern was the fact that Sharon's physician, Dr. Knapp, was never aware that the CAS was involved in her case, just as he was also ignorant of several occasions when the children were taken to different hospitals for treatment of injuries. In spite of all the best efforts of the conscientious individuals involved, the family's problems were simply too great for any one of them, and their combined interventions were plagued with breakdowns in co-ordination and communication.

Another problem was Sharon's attitude when help was offered; although she appeared willing to seek help, she was perhaps not as forthcoming as she appeared to be, and certainly was not consistent in following through with all the arrangements that were made for her. It was clear when she testified in court that Sharon was often torn and confused by conflicting impulses. Her own account of what happened in her life was often misleading and contradicted by other evidence. A part of her seemed to dearly wish to be a good mother and do everything right for her children, but there was always something else to intervene, something that she didn't understand, or wouldn't talk about. The long succession of sicknesses and injuries suffered by her children left an overwhelming impression that they were being mistreated. Yet it was only because Sharon was so conscientious in seeking medical attention for these problems that they ever came to light.

These ambiguities were all present when Sally, Sharon's older sister, reported a suspected sexual assault on three-year-old Janis. There was no way of knowing whether or not, if the child was sexually molested on this occasion, it was an isolated incident or part of the ongoing pattern of abuse that Janis would talk about a few years later. At the hearing, Sharon's lawyer claimed that the fact she reported this incident showed her desire to protect the children. But there is some question about whether the allegation would have been reported if Sally had not taken the initiative. According to Sharon's first account of the incident, told to Harriet Jensen, the director of the parenting project she was attending, her 14-year-old brother Mike was staying at the apartment, and Sharon went along with Janis's request that she be allowed to sleep with her uncle on two successive nights. By the time Sharon testified in court, this part of the story had been revised, and she said, "I'm not sure how he got into bed with her." In any case, she said, the child told her afterwards that her uncle had touched her in the genital area, which appeared to be sore and red. Sharon said she confronted Mike and he denied it.

Sharon discussed the incident with Sally, telling her that she was worried that her husband would kill Mike if he found out about the incident. She told Sally she was confused and didn't want everybody to know about it. She said she was really torn between her relationship with her daughter and her relationship with her brother. Sally also attended the parenting project and said she would talk to Harriet Jensen. Sharon said her sister told her that she didn't want this to go on in the family for another generation.

Sharon told the court that she received a phone call from Harriet Jensen, who said she had a legal obligation to check out the situation. Ms. Jensen took Sharon and the child to the Hospital for Sick Children, where a doctor found no evidence of damage or sexual abuse. But he told them that this did not prove it didn't happen, since a sexual assault need not leave any physical scars. The doctor advised Sharon to keep her brother and her child apart.

When Sharon received follow-up calls about the incident from the CAS and a social worker at the Hospital for Sick Children, she was angry because "I didn't want the rest of the world to know my business." She told Harriet Jensen, "I don't want anything to do with you, or what you have to offer."

Marg Wilson of the CAS found that Sharon was unwilling to discuss the incident. The social worker reported to her supervisor: "Sharon is backing away from CAS as a result of this incident, but I feel she will come back, if given some breathing space." She recommended that the CAS continue its monitoring and support, as this was a high-risk case. Ms. Wilson arranged for a subsidized day-care place for Janis, whom she described as a disturbed child—she was quite whiney and manipulative, and got on her mother's nerves. She said the child's mother was refraining from disciplining her as she was afraid she might not be able to stop hitting her.

Without any actual evidence that abuse had taken place, there was little that the social worker could do, except hope that Sharon would eventually be willing to see her again. As long as a client was unwilling to co-operate with the CAS, there was nothing the agency could do to help the children, unless it had enough evidence to take legal action.

However, the continuing crises in Sharon's life were such that she needed support. The allegations about her brother Mike had precipitated a big family crisis, when discussion of the issue prompted Sharon's halfsister, Lucille, to disclose that her father Anton had been sexually abusing her for years. This revelation led to a suicide attempt by Sharon's mother.

Sharon returned to the counseling sessions at the parenting project, but told Ms. Jensen that she would not tell her about any more abuse, until she had discussed it with her own doctor. A few days later Janis was taken to hospital with a severe injury to her abdomen and blood in her urine. A hospital report recorded that Sharon went away, leaving her child unattended on a stretcher. Sharon told her doctor that a beam had fallen on the child. She told Harriet that a counter and a television fell on Janis. She said she had bought the three-year-old child, who wore a brace on her foot, some roller skates, and that while she was skating in the living room, she had banged into a counter with a television set on it, and pulled both of them down on top of her.

When Sharon herself went into hospital a couple of weeks later, she told Harriet it was to have an ovarian cyst removed. The CAS was never informed of Sharon's stay in hospital, which was in fact for an abortion. Dr. Knapp had recommended the therapeutic abortion, because Sharon was in a distraught state and unable to cope. He said she had found it very difficult to accept that she was pregnant, and at first claimed it was impossible as she had not had sexual relations with her husband for several months.

She explained to the court that after she and Gordon separated, his best friend Don, who had been best man at their wedding, moved into her apartment because he had had a fight with his girlfriend and didn't have a place to stay. She said it came as a shock to both Gordon and her that she was pregnant. She said Gordon told her, "It's not my kid. I'm not going to raise another kid that's not mine."

Sharon said she was deeply hurt by this response because she thought that Gordon fully accepted his adopted daughter Janis as his own. She said he calmed down later and apologized for his cruel reaction, and they agreed that it would be best for her to have an abortion. She said she subsequently felt extreme guilt, and received psychiatric treatment for depression. It was not clear from Sharon's testimony whether or not Gordon had good reason to doubt that he could have made her pregnant, or if Don had played a role in the matter.

Gordon had moved out and was living with some friends, but he would visit her on weekends, in what Sharon said was an attempt to reconcile their differences. The welfare department took a different view of this and on one occasion withheld Sharon's checks on the grounds that they believed her husband was still living with her. During Gordon's visits, he and Sharon would often get into huge arguments. Gordon would take out his frustrations on the furniture. Sharon said he punched a light once—it went flying into the ceiling and broke. She said one time he picked up a coffee table and threw it at the washing machine. Also, she said he put his fist through doors and walls, and on one occasion hurled his machete into the wall, just missing her head.

When Ms. Wilson next visited Sharon, she found the apartment a mess, with dirty dishes and diapers everywhere. The social worker for the housing project also reported that Sharon's housekeeping was dreadful, and that the place was extremely dirty and infested with cockroaches. A succession of homemakers, sent in by the CAS, made little impact on Sharon's housekeeping abilities. One time when Ms. Wilson arrived for an unannounced visit, she found the children alone in the apartment with dirty clothing scattered around. She found Sharon in a neighbor's apartment. Sharon told her that she was taking diet pills and they made her feel drowsy. She said she felt lethargic, immobilized with depression and overwhelmed with the kids and with housework. Sharon said she was no longer seeing her husband, since he told her that his girlfriend was pregnant. She said that had made her come to her senses.

Doctors at the Hospital for Sick Children continued to be concerned about baby Linda's health. She spent much of her first two years in and out of the hospital, and it was noted that, while she remained below normal weight for her age, she would always gain considerable weight while she was in the hospital. She was therefore diagnosed as suffering from inorganic failure to thrive: a condition of weakness that is usually attributed to inadequate care.

As Linda grew old enough not to depend on her mother to feed her, she began to gain weight, though she remained a frail little child. The pediatrician noted a fine tremor in her hands, which he attributed to stress. Both children continued to suffer from an unusual number of injuries, and Janis was treated for infections. Dr. Knapp said he might have had more cause for concern had he known about the family's history of sexual abuse.

Sharon became preoccupied with a fear that the abortion she had had might have rendered her infertile, and, without disclosing the true reason for these fears, saw Harriet Jensen for some individual counseling sessions. The therapist later testified that Sharon told her, at that time, that she was unable to form satisfactory relationships with adults, and depended on relationships with children to meet her needs for companionship and love. Sharon told Ms. Jensen that she was afraid that when the girls grew up and left home, she would not have the ability to produce more children to replace them.

Sharon claimed that she had invested heavily in being a good mother, didn't leave the children with people she didn't trust, and therefore limited her own social contacts to those where she could include her children. She said she was very critical of adults in her life, and cut them off when they did not fulfill her expectations. She told Harriet, "My dream was to have as many children as I can, to do right by them, to have someone to fall back on when I'm alone."

Ms. Jensen was concerned that the incident with Janis's uncle Mike was not a good prognosis for Sharon's ability either to see the danger of sexual abuse or to stand up for her daughters if they were abused by someone who was close to her. In addition, she was afraid that Sharon had a tendency to seek out the kind of partner who may be attracted to children, or who would turn to children for gratification when frustrated in adult relationships. With all her own problems, Sharon would quickly frustrate such men and leave her children as targets. Ms. Jensen formed the impression, while she was counseling Sharon, that there was a high risk that children in Sharon's care would be sexually abused, because she was not prepared to work through the problems caused by her own childhood abuse. She said the way Sharon would turn to her daughters for nurture, wanting them to meet her adult needs, was a typical setup for a child who gets sexually abused.

As far as Marg Wilson knew, the two children got on well at day-care. That is what their mother told her. The Children's Aid Society social worker was aware that the girls were absent from the day-care on occasion, and got explanations for these absences from Sharon. But she heard nothing from the day-care staff to cause her to have any additional concerns about the children.

The day-care staff did have grave concerns about Janis and Linda, but did not think it necessary to communicate all of these to the Children's Aid Society. They knew that the social work agency was already involved in the case, and was presumably watching the children carefully, as it was the CAS that designated them as being at high risk of abuse. While Ms. Wilson was told about some problems with the children's attendance, she was not made aware of the extent of this problem. She did not know that the girls were absent half of the time that they were supposed to be in day-care; their attendance at the day-care was mainly to protect them from potential abuse at home. Most of the children's absences were unexplained.

"There were not many smiles on their faces. That's something that sort of stood out," the day-care supervisor recalled. She described Janis and Linda, to the court, as pale, unkempt, untidy children. She said Linda's clothes were often too big for her, and the child used to tremble "like a little leaf in the wind." Janis was observed to be a rather willful child, who did not play with other children and was often unpleasant and aggressive with them.

The day-care workers were also disturbed by Linda's persistent odor of dried urine on unwashed clothes. They asked her mother to provide them with second sets of clothing for the child, but Sharon kept forgetting to do this in spite of frequent reminders. When Sharon came to the center, the staff remarked that she often appeared to be unresponsive and "spaced out" on some kind of drug or medication.

One day while Linda was in the washroom, a day-care worker noticed bluish marks on her lower abdomen and thighs, close to her vagina. Having determined that they were not bruises but some kind of dye, the supervisor asked Sharon about the marks and was told that on the previous evening Janis had taken some marker and painted Linda.

A few weeks later, during "circle time," a period when the children were encouraged to tell stories and talk about their own lives, Linda announced that her father had held a knife to her mother's throat the night before. Sharon was asked about this incident, and confirmed that it had taken place, explaining that she was having a very difficult time with her estranged husband.

In November, 1982, Sharon met Gary Evans at a disco bar. If one accepts Sharon's account of their first meeting, it involved what must be one of the most unromantic overtures ever made. Sharon testified that she told Gary, "I have two kids. I'm separated and if you touch me I'll sock you. I'm a package deal. You have to love my kids and you have to love me."

Sharon's relationship with Gary developed slowly. She had been very attracted to him when she first met him. He was a small, slim, dark-skinned young man with a clean, innocent face and carefully coiffured hair. Sharon liked his looks as soon as she spotted him in the crowded disco, and, when she saw him talking to an acquaintance of hers, she had asked to be introduced to him. Sharon and her girlfriend went there for Ladies' Nights, when women patrons could win prizes and were given their first drink free.

Perhaps inhibited by Sharon's warning that he should keep his distance, Gary did not ask to drive her home until the third or fourth meeting, and then Sharon declined the invitation. But they continued to meet at the bar to dance and have a good time. Sharon was quite enchanted with the courteous way this shy, middle-class young man treated her. They became friends and started going out, with the girls, to the beach or Ontario Place. It was, according to Sharon, nine months before she would allow Gary to enter her apartment. She said, “I wanted to make sure he loved me and my kids. The girls liked him. They never complained or anything. I think Janis was more closer to him. Janis always wanted to hold his hand or stuff.”

Sharon felt herself falling more and more in love with Gary. She had never before known such a sensitive person. Sharon would describe him as a very quiet, sweet, beautiful guy, like no-one she had ever met before. She would marvel at the way they could discuss things, without arguing or fighting. She said he was a virgin until they started to have sex together.

It was after they started sleeping together that Sharon discovered that Gary was a very religious person. She illustrated this with a story about how Gary got Janis a bicycle, after Gordon had promised her one but failed to follow through. Sharon said Gary found a bike in the garbage, and said all it needed was a wheel. She said he then looked out of the window and saw a wheel, and explained, “That’s the way God works. He performs miracles like that.”

Gary’s family also impressed Sharon, as they never yelled and screamed at one another, or insulted each other. They were different from any people she had been involved with before. She could never understand what Gary’s father said, because of his fast clipped speech, and she knew that Gary’s sisters would have rather seen him with a black girl; she was amazed that none of them was ever mean to her.

Gary and Sharon were not living together. He would visit her most weekends and would stay over sometimes during the week. They took the children on a couple of camping trips. When they went out together in the evenings, Sharon said they would either leave the kids with a baby-sitter, with Sharon’s mother, with her sister’s boyfriend, or with Gordon.

The question of whether or not Gordon had a good relationship with Gary was a disputed issue at the wardship hearing, as the children’s allegations suggested that they were partners in crime, perhaps members of the same satanic cult. According to Sharon they did not get on at all. Gordon once called her “a fucking nigger lover,” Sharon told the court. “He did not like Gary because Gary was black. He calls him ‘that fucking black bastard, that nigger.’ He would just blow off the handle, and say, 'That nigger should be shot.' I don't know if that was his color, or because he was with me. He always threatened to kill Gary. Even today he threatens that. The last time I saw him he threatened that."

Although she was happy when she was with Gary, Sharon became uneasy about her relationship with the middle-class university student. She explained it this way: "There was a time when I thought my life was going too good for me. I asked Gary to get out of my life. I said, 'You're from a whole different world than me.' His family is such a sensitive family. They care about one another. Different from what I grew up with. The whole atmosphere in his home is different. I felt like a Cinderella sort of thing. I went to his place, and then went back to my place. He'd say, 'I'll get you out of this. You deserve better than this.' I didn't feel I deserved better. I said, 'That's my life. That's the way I live.'"

She asked him to go away, and they agreed to stop seeing one another. Sharon said the children cried when they were told she and Gary were going to separate. Then Gary called her and told her he loved her and wanted to try to make it work. He said he really wanted to make something of her. He said he wanted to see her succeed.

With Gary's encouragement, Sharon was trying to better herself by going to school for upgrading classes. She attended sporadically and dropped out after about six months. She said she derived a lot of strength from children and wanted to pursue a career in early childhood education. She said she had a dream of one day opening her own day-care center.

Meanwhile, Gordon continued to terrorize Sharon with his violent behavior. She charged him with assault after he slammed her against the wall during one of their attempted reconciliations. She later dropped the charges. She also had him charged with dangerous driving, when she claimed he tried to run her over at a shopping plaza after she refused to lend him $10 from her baby bonus money. This charge was also dropped and Gordon signed a letter agreeing that he would not act violently towards her again.

In a divorce application presented to Family Court, Sharon cited these two incidents, and also claimed that Gordon had told her he was getting guns from the United States and would use them to kill the kids, her and himself. When Sharon was convicted of defrauding a bank of about $650, she claimed that Gordon had driven her and the children to the bank, and threatened to kill her if she didn't commit the crime.

"Gordon could be the nicest guy in the world. Just don't get him angry," Sharon later told the wardship hearing.

Sharon described another incident, when she said Gordon hung her over her 20th-storey balcony. He had come over to pick up the children, she said, and they got into a big fight. He was very strong and could lift her with one hand. He had her over his shoulder, and she was punching him, kicking and screaming. Sharon said he told her, "I'm going to kill, you bitch," but she held on to the bars of the balcony and eventually he pulled her back.

Gordon later claimed that on this occasion he had saved Sharon's life; he said she tried to throw herself over the balcony during a violent argument. His version of the story was supported by a note made by Dr. Knapp: "Severe depression. Very suicidal that day. Had a problem with her teacher. Told me she had assaulted her teacher and was going to be charged. Said she had nothing to live for. Almost jumped off a balcony. This was the worst I had ever seen her."

Sharon said she was feeling a lot of pressure in her life at that time. She felt she was being torn in two by Gary and Gordon. She was struggling to keep up with school and to attend a center for handicapped children, where she was doing volunteer work. The distances involved in traveling to and from her remotely located apartment made this even more difficult, she said.

She was hospitalized again after taking an overdose of tranquilizers. When she was released, she was advised to get out-patient psychiatric treatment. She didn't follow up on this because of the distance she would have to travel to get there, she said. They should provide such facilities in the community closer to where the patients live, she told the wardship hearing.

Once again, Ms. Wilson knew about Sharon's stay in hospital, but was never told about the drug overdose. When Ms. Wilson next went to visit, Sharon told her she was too busy to see her, as she was expecting a visit from her husband and Gary. Ms. Wilson went back a week later and was not allowed to enter the apartment. Sharon answered the door, stepped outside and said she had forgotten Ms. Wilson was coming. Ms. Wilson said that, if Sharon was forgetting appointments and not bringing up issues to discuss with her, it was maybe an indication that she no longer needed the services of the CAS. Believing that the children were okay, and knowing nothing about Sharon's suicide attempts or the fact that psychiatrists were pessimistic about her recovery unless she received further treatment, Marg Wilson closed the case in April, 1984.

During the six months after Ms. Wilson closed the CAS file on the case, each child was involved in allegations of sexual assault. In each case it was one of the parents who made the allegations, and in neither was enough evidence found for authorities to do anything other than to continue to "monitor" the family.

In August, 1984, Sharon took Janis to hospital, complaining that the child had been sexually molested at a baby-sitter's apartment. According to Sharon, Janis was afraid she would be beaten if she talked. The child said she had a dream that a man with one eye and half a nose was hurting her. Sharon said the child's genital area was red, and she did not believe that it was a dream. She said she had been out with Gary that night and asked him to drive her and the child to the hospital.

At the Sick Children's Hospital it was found that Janis did have some small abrasions. The police investigated, but did not find there was sufficient evidence for any prosecution. Sharon felt the police did not do a good job. They had gone to the baby-sitter's apartment, and returned to say that there was no black man there. They then asked Gary if he had touched Sharon's children. Sharon was indignant about that, as she was convinced that it could not have been Gary. It was later discovered that there was a man living in the building whose face was half eaten away by a cancerous disease, but there was no evidence of any contact between him and the children.

The Children's Aid Society reopened its file, and social workers tried unsuccessfully to contact Sharon for several weeks. She would not return calls, although she did go into the CAS office during this period to pick up a food voucher from a worker unconnected with the investigation.

Meanwhile, Gordon had been receiving phone calls from a woman, who refused to give her name, but said she was a former girlfriend of Gary Evans and had had a child by him. She said Gary had threatened her life, and was now harming Janis and Linda. Gordon told Sharon about these calls, and, when she asked Gary if he had a previous girlfriend and fathered a child, he denied it.

When Gordon had the children for a weekend visit, he noticed that Linda was rubbing herself a lot and was red in the genital area. Gordon refused to return the four-year-old child to her mother and took her to the hospital instead. A young doctor at the Queensway Hospital examined Linda and found she had a yeast infection, but saw no evidence of bruising. Linda told him that Gary had not hurt her. The doctor did not think there was any need to consult a gynecologist, as there was no evidence beyond a vague phone call in the middle of the night. If he had known that there was a history of sexual abuse in the family, or that the Children's Aid Society was involved, he said, he might have referred the child for a more thorough investigation.

Gordon returned Linda to Sharon, with a prescription and the doctor's recommendation that she get some treatment for the yeast infection. Sharon did not follow up on this recommendation. Gordon was angry that neither the CAS nor the police took any action as a result of his complaint.

Ms. Wilson finally got to see Sharon and the children the next day. After hearing the mother's account of the two incidents, she talked to both children. After talking to Janis she concluded that, while there was no evidence for this incident, the way the child described the alleged molestation suggested that she had been abused in the past. She recommended that Sharon should get Janis into a play-therapy group. Ms. Wilson asked Linda if she had fun with Mommy and Gary, and Linda replied, "Gary said not to talk about it." Ms. Wilson asked her if Gary ever touched her, and Linda giggled and whispered, "No."

"There could be something going on in this home, but there is no evidence to support this," Ms. Wilson wrote in a report, recommending that the family should have continuing help from the CAS.

A few days later Sharon and the children moved to Hamilton. Sharon claimed that the main reason for this was that she did not wish to remain close to the neighbor who she believed was responsible for Janis being sexually abused. She also said she wanted to get away from Gordon and be near Gary, who was attending university in Hamilton.

The fact that both parents reported allegations of sexual abuse was cited by their lawyers at the hearing as evidence that Sharon and Gordon would be unlikely to abuse the children themselves. However, the judge eventually found that the parents did sexually abuse the children, and it is likely from the girls' accounts that this abuse started before Sharon took the children to Hamilton. There are two possible explanations for this apparent inconsistency. One is that other case histories have shown that some people who think they have a right to abuse their own children will not tolerate other people abusing them. The other, which seems more likely to apply to Sharon than to Gordon, is that the allegations were some kind of muted cry for help from people who recognized that they were harming their children but could not control themselves.

The social worker at the housing project was shocked by the state of Sharon's apartment when the family moved out. She said there were holes in every wall and in all the doors. The fridge, screen door and toilet were all damaged and the light shades broken. The walls, which were originally an eggshell color, were now a blackish-gray. The floors were sticky with dirt, and the unit was full of cockroaches.

Sharon said the move to Hamilton was to have been "a new beginning, a different life." She and Gary leased the ground floor of a newly renovated house in an older, slightly run-down neighborhood. It had a basement and a small paved backyard. It was the best accommodation she had ever had, and a complete change from the stifling apartment where the children could never go out to play on their own.

She did not tell Gordon where they were living because, she said, she did not want him to come to the house. She said she told the children their dad would come to visit them, but they said, "Mom, he'll come and wreck our place."

Sharon found a school for the children and a low-paying job for herself, but the live-in arrangement with Gary lasted only ten days. Gary had not wanted Sharon to move to Hamilton in the first place. He was looking for a job, but he didn't want to work in Hamilton, as he didn't like the city. He was also studying and said he found it impossible to work in the house because of all the demands that were placed on him by Sharon and the children. Although Sharon and Gary had decided that they were going to live together, get married and have a baby some day, they very quickly concluded that they were not yet ready for it.

However, Gary continued to spend a lot of time at the house in Hamilton, and would look after the children when Sharon was at work. He often took them to school in the mornings or picked them up in the evenings, and would baby-sit for Sharon on weekends. On some occasions Gary failed to take Linda to school, and later explained to Sharon that he hadn't been able to, as he had "things to do." He said it was easier for him to take her with him, and drop her off at his parents' house while he was looking for work in Toronto.

At one time Linda used to say that she didn't like going in Gary's car. Sharon said she thought this was because she peed on the seat, and Gary got mad at her. Sharon also noticed that Janis would get red in her genital area more often than she used to. She asked Gary if he had touched the girls and he said he hadn't. Sharon said she believed him and trusted him completely. She said the girls never complained about any untoward contact.

Linda's kindergarten teacher in Hamilton had been a little concerned that, although the mother spoke a lot about the child's medical problem, she did not seem to have gone to the trouble of locating a family doctor when she moved to Hamilton. The teacher later became worried that the child was undernourished and seemed to suffer from jerky motor control.

Janis's grade one teacher in Hamilton was Rose Eddy, a nervous little woman in her mid-50s. She sat grumbling to herself as she waited to testify at the wardship hearing, and confronted the court with a look of indignation as she answered the lawyers' questions. She said she remembered Janis as a very pale, thin and lethargic child, who was unusually slow in her reactions. She said Janis often used to cling to her teacher during recess, never smiled and had no spontaneity.

"She used to look as if she hadn't been treated well at home. She looked as though she'd cried all night or weekend," Ms. Eddy said. The teacher formed the impression that Janis was "so miserably unhappy" that there had to be more going on in the home than simply the problems associated with poverty or marital discord.

The teacher noticed what she described as "an unusual sensitivity in her lips," and she said Janis's eyes always looked red and swollen. Ms. Eddy sometimes had the children do an art exercise where they would take a straw and blow through it to spray paint on paper. Janis refused to do this, saying her lips hurt. Ms. Eddy noted that the child's lips were red and swollen.

Ms. Eddy said she didn't question the child about her home life, because "there are certain limits as to how far you are going to snoop in a child's life." But she said she did talk to Sharon, who spoke in a slow slurry way, and "seemed in a little world of her own, tired and unhappy.

"You don't say, 'You're not feeding your child properly,'" Ms. Eddy explained to the court. "You just ask if she is getting enough sleep. Mrs. Wells said she was aware of the problem. She said she would see a doctor about it. She seemed to know the right things to say. She seemed to use the right words. I didn't feel a sincerity there, that she was going to do anything about it. But it was not for me to judge. I wondered whether she was really listening to what I was saying, absorbing the full implication of what I was trying to tell her."

It became apparent to the court why Ms. Eddy looked so uncomfortable about giving her testimony when she began to explain what happened in her class during "rug time," a quiet period after recess, when she encouraged the children to rest on a rug. Ms. Eddy explained reticently, "During these times I had observed some of my children like Janis and Andy Jackson kissing and hugging, french-kissing and touching each other in places, where as adults you would call it sexual play. It went on for a period of time before I realized it was not just kids not knowing what they were doing. Some children are very loving and tend to hug and kiss each other. They were a very loving group of children last year."

Ms. Eddy said it was only after another teacher had noticed Janis and Andy touching one another in the playground, and she had received a complaint from a parent, that she understood that what was going on in her class was "more than just a child's innocent play."

She said a few of the boys and girls were involved in this. She saw Janis once grab at a boy's pants, in his private parts, front and the back. "The boys wanted to put their hands under the girls' dresses. I never got as far as to see what they were doing under there. And the girls naturally responded by putting their hands at the boys' zipper area. I don't think it got as far as the girls getting into the boys' pants. I certainly would have put a stop to that. It went beyond the ordinary children's curiosity," Ms. Eddy said. "Another teacher exclaimed to me in horror, in disbelief, 'Look at what the children are doing in recess!' But it wasn't all this one great big orgy or whatever you call it."

"I said, 'There's lots of room on the rug, move apart.' I told them to close our eyes and keep our hands to ourselves. I really believe that was the end of it—on the rug," said Ms. Eddy.

The Hamilton-Wentworth Children's Aid Society was informed of the Toronto agency's concerns about the children, and a social worker, Lesley Morgan, was assigned to monitor the situation. Ms. Morgan was large-boned and slightly heavyset, but an attractive young woman, with a healthy complexion. She got on well with children, and had a pleasant direct approach to everyone. She was generally well-liked, except by those who came into conflict with her and considered her to be stubborn and aggressive. She was idealistic about her work, and devoted much of her spare time to activities involving the peace movement and women's issues.

Ms. Morgan helped Sharon to sort out some problems she had with her financial affairs at Christmastime, and encouraged her to get involved in an incest survivors' group at the Rape Crisis Centre, where Ms. Morgan worked as a volunteer. Sharon, who subsequently became very bitter towards Ms. Morgan, later told the court that she still appreciates what the social worker did for her at that time: "I can't forget what she did. She was there when I needed her."

Sharon told Ms. Morgan that she would call her if she ever felt she was going to harm her kids, and she joined the group after being assured that anything she said there could not be subsequently used against her by the Children's Aid.

The sessions at the Rape Crisis Centre opened up "a can of worms" for Sharon. As she remembered all that had happened to her as a child, she started to take out her hostility on Gary, and, she said, began to get short-tempered with the children. She was also experiencing financial difficulties, and had received a letter from Gordon's lawyer, demanding that his client be given access to the children. Then at the end of January, 1985, Gary left to work at an out-of-town job.

"I was having a tough time. My life was going pretty fast for me," Sharon said. "I was upset from a phone call from the lawyer that Gordon wanted to have access to the kids again, and I didn't want him to find out where I lived. I had a shortage in my pay. I had $36 to feed the kids for two weeks, because they took OHIP off me mistakenly. I had to walk Linda home in wet pants, in wintertime. I didn't think it was fair. I was upset. I was going to the Rape Crisis Centre trying to deal with a lot of things. I was really upset. Gary wasn't in town, and I was all by myself. Everything got to me. I didn't want to hurt my kids, and I just needed a break. I needed time to get on my feet. My life was running so fast compared to what I was used to."

Sharon said she was scared of herself. She had recurrent dreams, one of which was about diving into a garbage pail full of water. She felt she was going crazy. She had begun yelling and screaming at the kids and she was afraid that if she kept them with her she would hit them. She felt she couldn't call on her mother to take the children, and she certainly didn't want to call Gordon, so she arranged with Lesley to have the girls put in foster care for a month.

Lesley Morgan received a call from Sharon in the early hours of the morning of February 7, 1985, four months after the family had moved to Hamilton. The mother told Ms. Morgan she was suffering "a severe anxiety attack." Ms. Morgan found her sitting against a wall on the living room floor, sobbing hysterically. Sharon said she was afraid that, unless Ms. Morgan took the children that night, she would physically hurt them.

PART TWO

THE ALLEGATIONS

CHAPTER 4
THE FOSTER HOME

Janis and Linda were whisked into another world when they were taken to a foster home in the middle of the night. It was a split-level house in a quiet residential neighborhood. To most people it would seem like a very ordinary suburban household, a clean, quiet, well-regulated home, inhabited by gentle and generous people. But Janis and Linda, who were both less than eight years old, had never experienced the simple security of normal family life.

Catherine McInnis was one of the Children's Aid Societies' most experienced foster mothers. During the previous 15 years, she had provided care to more than 300 children. The CAS had nothing but glowing reports of her work. She was described as having a professional attitude, even though she did the work for altruistic reasons. Social workers often chose her home as a placement for particularly difficult cases, as she was well-known, both for her competence, and for the love and understanding she gave to the children in her care. Many of these children would maintain close ties with her for years after they left her home. She was also scrupulous about keeping notes on all her foster children and reporting any concerns about them that she may have had.

In 1985, and for a few years prior to that, she was a provider of short-term or emergency foster care. This often involved taking in extremely disturbed children without any advance notice. She had also adopted some children, who were now teenagers and young adults. It was because of her years of experience and her gift with difficult children that the CAS persuaded her to open her home to children in need of emergency care. These children would usually only stay for a month or two before either returning home or moving on to a long-term foster home. This meant that, while it was important that the children felt as comfortable as possible in Mrs. McInnis's home, and received the nurturing that they usually desperately needed, she also had to be ready to let them go, and could have no expectations of being able to keep them.

Friends and neighbors saw Catherine McInnis as a model of stability. She and her husband of thirty years lived in a split-level home in a quiet residential neighborhood. They were religious without being fanatics, and the church they attended regularly was of a conservative, nonconformist denomination. At the trial, she would speak little of her husband, who seemed to have minimal involvement with the foster children, but would always refer to him with great respect. She clearly saw him as a model of moral authority and good conscience.

Catherine had an idealized reverence for authority figures in society, particularly the police, and would always make a point of telling children in her care to say "policemen" rather than "cops." Respectability and the appearance of respectability were prime values in Catherine McInnis's life. Nothing could be more distressful for her than the thought that other people might think she was crazy, and she would consider it the ultimate indignity to have two police cars parked in front of her door. She was proud that she had always led an upright life, emphasizing that she had always paid her taxes, and never had so much as a parking ticket—a boast that indicated how she perhaps let her own rhetoric carry her away a little, as she did not drive. She also had a great respect for education, and would often put herself down as being "just a simple housewife."

In spite of the rigidity of Mrs. McInnis's life, a certain eccentricity about her came through clearly in her court testimony and in the diaries where she recorded her observations of the children. Both were replete with little digressions in which she displayed an unexpected wit, an obvious enjoyment of a colorful phrase and a loosely bridled sarcasm. She would draw little pictures in her diary to illustrate things she described, and sometimes during her testimony she would mimic a child's voice as she recounted things that the girls had said to her. An avid gardener, Catherine had an intense love of nature, and would make frequent references to her habit of caring for wild and stray animals—practices that she felt she had almost to apologize for, lest someone would think she was "nuts."

Catherine McInnis projected a wholesome, grandmotherly image. She sat up straight in the witness stand and dressed in a dark serge suit with a white blouse that was fastened at the top by a cameo brooch. She looked like someone who would give advice on moral principles, recipes, folk remedies and household hints, rather than some of the most graphic descriptions of sexual abuse and sadistic violence ever heard in a Canadian courtroom. She did, however, manage to include some proverbial wisdom and household lore during her many asides and digressions, but she didn't flinch from any of the obscene words or sickening descriptions that she was required to relate.

Allegations of child sexual abuse often disturb people in a way that elicits the age-old human response of wanting to shoot the messenger who brings bad news. People find it more comfortable to believe that children are natural liars, or that they have been bewitched, manipulated or brainwashed, rather than accept that the sanctity of the home has been desecrated by acts of perverse cruelty. Therefore, as sexual abuse expert Suzanne Sgroi has noted, those who try to assist sexually abused children "must be prepared to battle against incredulity, hostility, innuendo and outright harassment."[5]

People who knew little of the 18 months of testimony that had been presented to the court would assert confidently that the foster mother had obviously made it all up. Defense lawyers at the trial were sure, at the outset, that they would eventually succeed in breaking her down under long cross-examinations, during which they would probe her for signs of hysteria or religious mania. She was put under such pressure that she did eventually burst into tears on the witness stand, complaining about the intensive questioning and ridicule to which she had been subjected. At the end of the hearing the defense lawyers argued that her testimony was highly emotional, and lacking in credibility, but they were not able, on the basis of the evidence that came before the court, to make that argument as strongly as they might originally have wished.

Catherine McInnis was vulnerable to such criticism, because, unlike some of the other people to whom the children subsequently made disclosures of abuse, she was not a professional and did not respond to the allegations in an objective, unemotional fashion. The children were in her care for 85 days, and it was to her that they first made most of their shocking disclosures. She was constantly exposed to the children's macabre preoccupations, was deeply troubled by them, and came to fear for her own safety and that of the children. Eventually she began to respond in some irrational ways, as she became convinced that everything the children told her was true, and that the police were not taking the allegations seriously.

A psychiatrist, who later examined Mrs. McInnis, described her as obsessional and compulsive, but said she exhibited no sign of the kind of psychiatric disorder that would lead someone to fabricate such bizarre stories. The credibility of her reports was also supported by the fact that the children did make other similar allegations to several different people, and that many of the details of the girls' statements, as reported to Mrs. McInnis, were confirmed in other testimony. While the foster mother knew virtually nothing of the children's background before they came into her care, she reported things that later came out in other evidence, such as Janis's "scary dream" in Toronto, their father holding a knife to their mother's throat, his threats to kill Gary and his so-called picture of the devil.

Other testimony indicated that the foster mother had accurately reported even fairly minor details that had made no sense to her at the time. For example, she said the children told her about their mother giving them "drunk stuff" that made them wobble around, and this was later confirmed by Sharon, who said that she had let the girls drink a little wine at Christmas time and that they had all pretended to be drunk. Apart from those allegations that the girls' parents denied, and for which no external evidence was found, there was nothing that

Mrs. McInnis said the children told her about their past lives that did not correspond with what the court heard from other sources. By the end of the trial, even the lawyers representing the parents ceased to maintain that her accounts were a complete fabrication. Instead, they argued that she may have listened selectively to the children, misinterpreting and distorting what they said.

Mrs. McInnis's solid respectability presented the court with a sharp contrast to the uncomfortable presence of Sharon Wells. Sharon was nearly eight months pregnant by the time Catherine took the witness stand. The father, who was now accused with Sharon of abusing her other children, had already abandoned her. Since the court hearing had begun four months earlier, Sharon had attended every day, dressed almost always in the same large sweater and slacks, looking progressively more unhealthy, distressed and distracted. As the foster mother gave her evidence, Sharon would pout and roll her eyes, make angry gestures with her hands, sigh loudly or mutter to herself. Sometimes she would flounce ostentatiously out of the courtroom, or turn around and try to communicate her disgust to the journalists sitting behind her. Her lawyer, Arthur Brown, tried to calm her down on numerous occasions, and once turned round while the court was in session and baldly told her to "shut up."

Catherine's first impression of Sharon was that she appeared to be "scared out of her wits," when she and the social worker, Lesley Morgan, brought the two children to the McInnis home in the early hours of February 8, 1985. The girls appeared frightened too, and Catherine noticed that Linda's whole body was trembling.

As soon as they had got in the door, Linda said she was hungry and asked for something to eat. She struck Catherine as being a bright, talkative little child, but she seemed, to her, to be as pale as a ghost, and her fair hair was as dry as straw. Catherine saw Janis's thin, sad face as being "the shape of a person sobbing." She noticed that both girls had a whiney way of talking. She said this disappeared within a few weeks of their coming to her home.

Sharon told her that the children were "hyper," and produced a bottle of medication prescribed for Linda, who she said had a chronic bladder and kidney infection, and would wet constantly. She warned

Catherine that she would have "little puddles," and that Linda would wake at night and scream in her sleep. Sharon hugged the children, and told them they would be coming home soon, explaining that she had "some problems with Gary that I need to sort out."

As they left that evening, Lesley Morgan noted Sharon's comment to her that she felt good about leaving the children with Mrs. McInnis, because she seemed to be a very caring, motherly person.

The foster mother began to suspect that there was something seriously wrong with the girls soon after their mother left. She felt that both children smelled bad, and decided that, even though it was late, she had to give them a bath before putting them to bed. Catherine said she noticed a sexual odor on Janis. She told the court: "It was clear to me that someone had ejaculated on her since she was last bathed."

As Catherine bathed them, the children cried and screamed, she said, displaying "unbelievable stark terror." Their vaginas were both inflamed, and they both complained that they had sore bums. Then, when she tucked them in bed, Janis held the sheet up to her neck, and had a wild look in her eyes, as if she was scared to death, Catherine said.

Several weeks later the children would tell Catherine that they had been scared when they first came to her home because they assumed that someone was going to abuse them. Catherine testified that Janis told her "she thought everybody would do all those bad things to her all over again. She thought it would be worse even than at home." It took a long time for the girls to realize that they had nothing to fear from Catherine, her quiet retiring husband and their grown-up daughters, Grace and Mary.

Grace McInnis subsequently testified at the hearing and described how Janis and Linda appeared during their first few days in the home. "They appeared terror-stricken the day after they first arrived," she said. "Janis was always looking over her shoulder, always whispering, always scared of somebody else hearing. If someone else came in the room, she would stop talking. And Linda had this strange stare, a really long stare. It wasn't like any stare I've ever seen from any of the other children in the house."

Grace was a student and did not spend a lot of time at home. Her older sister Mary was there even less. They both saw enough of Janis and Linda to be able to describe their behavior in testimony before the court. They both overheard some of the extraordinary disclosures that the girls made to Catherine and were therefore able to corroborate these in court. But they did not spend much time with Janis and Linda, and it was only with Catherine that the children developed a close, trusting relationship.

Two days after Janis and Linda came to her house, Catherine phoned Ms. Morgan, the social worker, to tell her some of the things she had noticed about the girls. She told the social worker that she had "a funny feeling about these children." Catherine had not known Ms. Morgan before she took Janis and Linda into her home, but they quickly developed a good relationship, based on their shared concern for the children. Ms. Morgan asked Catherine to keep detailed notes on what the children said and inform her if there were any further indications that the girls might have been molested or ill-treated.

Keeping notes was something that Catherine always did, as a matter of routine. All her life she had been in the habit of writing little notes to herself. Whenever her foster children said anything that seemed important or interesting, Catherine would jot it down right away on a scrap of paper, a grocery bag or an old envelope, whatever was handy. Later on she would transcribe these jottings into a notebook. Usually all her notes on any one foster child would not fill more than a page or two of her notebook. She didn't dream, when she started a new book for Janis and Linda, that four months later, she would have filled nearly 200 pages with her observations and notes of things they said.

For the first two weeks she had nothing particular to report. She was getting to know the two children, slowly winning their trust. It was obvious they were far from happy. Although they had seemed to be undernourished when they arrived, the children seemed to have little zest for the good meals Catherine provided, and would sometimes refuse to eat meat. Catherine did not press them about finishing their meals as she might have with other children. She sensed that these girls needed a lot of patience, understanding and love.

While Linda was naturally chatty and would go on all day about this and that, she would sometimes become totally disconnected and sit staring intently at nothing for long periods of time. She continued to shake a lot and wet her bed a few times at night, but she stopped wetting during the day as soon as she came to Catherine's house. At first Janis was extremely withdrawn and sullen, but she gradually began to open up to Catherine. She told the foster mother one night about the "terrible dream" she had when she was in Toronto. It was very scary, she said, and after that they moved to Hamilton, where Gary found them "a terrific place, with no bugs and no holes in the walls."

When Sharon came to take them out on the Sunday of the first week that they were in the foster home, Linda cringed and said she didn't want to go with Gary. Both girls said that they didn't like Gary, but Sharon reminded them that they did.

One evening, after the children had been with Catherine for about two weeks, she said Linda informed her, quite out of the blue, "Gary puts his finger where the pee comes out."

Catherine said the child dropped down on the floor and spread her legs. "I lay down like this, and he puts his finger and wiggles it, and I scream. He does it to Janis too," Linda said, and then lowered her voice, as she added, "You don't tell people you know. He thumps the wall when he has finished."

The next day Linda talked to the foster mother again about Gary sticking his finger in her. She said it would happen on her mother's bed: "Sometimes it hurts. Sometimes it tickles. Gary squeezes the thing he pees with, and then he pees into a towel."

Catherine told Linda she should tell her mother. Linda replied, "My mom knows. She was on the bed."

While Catherine immediately informed Ms. Morgan about this conversation, there was something else that Linda told her the same day that she did not mention. She had thought it was strange, and possibly important enough to make some note of, and jotted the child's words down on a paper bag. But what Linda said was so weird that Catherine found it difficult to deal with, and was afraid she would be ridiculed for taking it seriously.

"Elizabeth got dead. A killer got her. He had a knife. He was a killer," Linda said, as Catherine listened dumbfounded. "Me and Gary, and Mom and Janis and Elizabeth went for a drive. Elizabeth was sleeping. She went in the woods."

As Linda spoke, her usual breathless chattering pace slowed down slightly with apparent fear and bewilderment. Janis was frantically trying to get her to be quiet. Linda continued, "I think maybe she walked. Maybe Mom carried her. She was bad. Mom told us she touched things. Mom went in the trees. Gary and us waited in the car. Mom hurried back from the woods. Gary drived fast. Mom had blood on her finger. Mom was scared after a killer got Elizabeth. Mom said she opened her mouth. I guess her mouth opened when the killer got her."

On the IDA drug store bag, on which Catherine noted Linda's disclosure, she also wrote a note to herself: "Should I tell and be a fool, or be quiet and be a bigger one?"

She decided to put the bag away in a safe place, and not say anything more about it for the time being. It was not until two months later, when she had heard a great deal more from the children, that she became convinced that Linda's story about Elizabeth was not a tall tale or a fantasy, but a child's eye view of a real murder.

CHAPTER 5

CHILDREN INTERVIEWED AND MOTHER CONFRONTED

The Hamilton-Wentworth Children's Aid Society offices are housed in a brick building in a quiet, well-to-do residential district about half a mile from the center of the city. It is a homey-looking place, well-suited for such an agency. Lesley Morgan took the children there on March 1 for an interview with the society's sexual abuse specialist, Tricia Donnelly.

They were introduced to Ms. Donnelly in a playroom, where there were toys, dolls and materials for drawing and painting. The room had a two-way mirror, so that observers behind the mirror could watch the interview. Children felt at ease with Ms. Donnelly. She seemed like a really nice, warm lady, who knew how to talk to kids and liked to play games with them. From an adult's perspective, she appeared a little nervous, reserved and cerebral. She was a very neat, carefully dressed, energetic young woman. She seemed scarcely old enough to be an expert, but had interviewed more than 600 sexually abused children.

The children also met Sergeant David Broom of the Hamilton-Wentworth Regional Police. Ms. Donnelly had asked him to sit in on the interview, as this would help to reduce the number of times the children might have to tell their story, if it turned out this was a case of sexual abuse.

Sgt. Broom was a tall, burly man with a pleasant manner. He sat in a corner of the room, while the specialist interviewed each of the children in turn. The interview was recorded and a transcript of this recording was entered as evidence at the hearing. Linda, whom they saw first, struck them as being a chatty and intelligent child, who showed no fear of being there with these two strange adults. When Ms. Donnelly asked her if she knew Gary, Linda said she did. But she said "Yes" a little more hesitantly when the woman asked if she liked the man. Then she asked the child to tell her about Gary, and Linda said, "No."

"Why?" Ms. Donnelly asked.

"It's bad," Linda replied, and after a poignant pause, she added, "If I tell, Gary's going to spank me."

Ms. Donnelly assured the child that she was safe, and that no one was going to hurt her. She gave the children some dolls to play with. These looked like soft, Raggedy Ann dolls, but they were what are known as Anatomically Correct dolls, which, when undressed, reveal a simplified fascsimile of male and female anatomy. They are widely used in the field of child abuse to assist young children in disclosing sexual assaults. Linda was immediately intrigued by the four dolls—an adult and a child of each sex.

Demonstrating with the dolls, Linda said that Gary "sticks his finger in my pee-hole. It hurts. I don't like it. He does it to Janis too."

Linda gave a few more details, played for a while, and then said, "Mom and Gary suck Janis and me. Sometimes we have to suck each other. Do you want to hear another funny thing?"

"Okay," said Ms. Donnelly.

"I stick my finger in Janis, and she sticks her finger in my pee-hole."

Ms. Donnelly asked, "How did you learn that?"

"Mom taught us how to do it."

"Do what?" asked Ms. Donnelly, anxious to insure that there was no misunderstanding.

"Mom taught us to put our fingers between our own legs," said the child, and then added, putting her mouth to the doll's vagina, "I suck Mommy's pee-hole."

The child continued to talk and play for about an hour, disclosing a few further details similar to those she had already told her foster mother. As Ms. Donnelly was taking her out of the playroom to rejoin Lesley, the child soiled her pants.

Arthur Brown, the mother's lawyer, would later argue that this and other interviews that Tricia Donnelly conducted involved a lot of prompting and prodding of the children. But Judge Beckett said he was very impressed with the way the social worker conducted the interviews and did not accept the lawyer's submission, especially as the lawyer said he was unable to provide specific examples of any leading questions that Ms. Donnelly had asked.

Ms. Donnelly was dealing well with a difficulty that faces anyone interviewing an allegedly abused child. Children seldom find it easy to make such allegations, particularly against their own parents, and therefore require constant reassurance. They are also easily distracted and need to be kept on track by persistent, gentle questioning. The use of visual aids, such as dolls and other toys, while facilitating this process of disclosure, also leaves the interviewer open to charges that she has been encouraging the child to fantasize.

Ms. Donnelly told the court that it is very rare for a child to lie or fantasize about being sexually abused by her own parent, and that in the 600 cases she had seen, she had never encountered such a phenomenon. She said the accompanying physical symptoms of distress served to reinforce her belief that Linda was telling the truth. Police officers and defense lawyers would distort this statement, and other similar assertions by psychiatrists, into the patently absurd proposition that "Children never lie."

The interview with Janis produced fewer disclosures than her younger sister had made, but was very revealing. The child appeared to be very nervous, and would glance anxiously around the room. Ms. Donnelly found her a very easy child to play with. She thought she was intelligent, and drew pictures well and very meticulously.

When she asked Janis about her mother and Gary, Janis said, "I'm afraid," but said she couldn't tell why.

Ms. Donnelly said that the dolls might help her tell about her mom and Gary. Janis responded to this suggestion by asking if the dolls' clothes came off. Then she demonstrated the dolls putting fingers in one another and the two adult dolls having intercourse. Ms. Donnelly asked if there was anything else, and the child said she was afraid to talk any more. Ms. Donnelly asked her what would happen if she talked. Janis began sobbing uncontrollably, and said, "I'll die, I'll die."

Sgt. Broom agreed with Ms. Donnelly that there appeared to be little doubt that the children had been sexually assaulted. Ms. Donnelly advised Lesley Morgan not to bring the subject up with the children, but said she suspected that more details of abuse would emerge later. She said that there is a generally recognized pattern in children's disclosure of abuse. They start by talking about some relatively minor instance of molestation. Then, if they meet with an understanding response from the adults to whom they make the disclosure, they begin to make progressively more detailed and more serious allegations. Critics of this theory maintain that this is because the receptive adult is feeding the child's fantasies and encouraging her to fabricate more and more.

When the girls returned to the foster home that day, Janis appeared to be in a state of panic. Catherine overheard her tell her younger sister, "Linda, you talk too much. You tell everything. I'll tell Mom. You don't tell on Mom. You just tell on Gary."

Linda interjected, "Gary did it to us."

"With the finger. Shut up," said Janis.

"Well, Mom does it too," Linda insisted, as Janis continued her attempts at silencing her with warnings that their mom was going to be mad. Linda was shaking uncontrollably. When she noticed that Catherine had slipped into the room during their argument, she crawled on to her lap and cried frantically for a long time, eventually falling into an exhausted sleep on the floor.

It was on the following day, March 2, that the children's mother was questioned about their allegations. Lesley had told her to come to the CAS offices, and Sharon thought they would be making arrangements for her to get the girls back. Instead she was confronted with another social worker and a big policeman.

Sgt. Broom noted that Mrs. Wells reacted to the allegations with dramatic swings in mood. He said she paced up and down, threatening to sue the CAS, then looked up at the ceiling and said, "God, why me?" He also quoted the mother as saying: "I knew it would come to this. To a point where I would get hurt. Okay, it did happen. I swore it would never happen to my kids."

The sergeant noted that Sharon asked him if the children said she put her finger in them. He was curious about this because he had not mentioned that allegation to her. When he asked why her child would say she was afraid she would die, Sharon began screaming hysterically, "I don't know. Keep my kids. I don't care."

While the policeman and the two social workers were stunned by the force of her hysteria, Sharon suddenly bolted from the office and ran out of the agency, screaming. Ms. Morgan, Ms. Donnelly and Sgt. Broom were slow to follow, and, by the time they did, Sharon had disappeared from sight. They spent about 20 minutes looking for her. Sharon later said she had thought about throwing herself under a bus, but then decided to return to the agency. Ms. Morgan found her there, took her back into the interview room and talked with her for a long time, while Ms. Donnelly and Sgt. Broom monitored part of the conversation through the two-way mirror.

Ms. Donnelly later described watching the distraught mother engrossed in a discussion of her own childhood, sitting with her hands crossed over her abdomen, as if she was physically experiencing pain. She said the mother also told Lesley about her violent marriage, and her good relationship with Gary, whom she described as a virgin.

Sharon said she would charge the foster mother with defamation of character. She asked if there was enough evidence for charges against herself. Then she said, "I'll charge everyone. It will cost, but I don't care. I won't get caught. I don't believe it. If my girls have been sexually assaulted, it happened in foster care. I truly believe that.

"I'm not two people. I'm one. I don't have two personalities.

Gary sometimes thinks I have," she told Lesley. "I feel like you don't do your job right. I shouldn't have trusted you so much. It's not easy to prove you're innocent.

"Why am I the victim and accused? How can I be both the victim and the accused? They don't teach you to defend yourself against that at the Rape Crisis Centre. I can't fight my kids in court. My kids have accused me of sex-abusing them. I remember the first time they saw me put a Kotex on. Now they fight to see who will pull the paper off. I need to see the kids to tell them the truth."

Sgt. Broom compared notes with Ms. Donnelly, and concluded that, while Sharon's statements were strange and suggestive, there was nothing that she had said that constituted an admission of guilt. He found out from Sharon that Gary was working out of town, but was expected at her home at about seven o'clock that evening. Sharon was allowed to return home, and the sergeant waited outside her house for Gary.

However, when the boyfriend had not shown up by 7:30 P.M., Sgt. Broom decided to go home, since his shift was over. He did not get another officer to wait and interview Gary.

This was the first of many indications that this was not a high priority case for the Hamilton police. The failure to interview the main alleged perpetrator at the earliest opportunity, and before his alleged partner-in-crime had a chance to warn him of the allegations, was the first item on what proved to be a long list of police mistakes or omissions. These later served to discredit the police investigation and made it impossible for any court to ever find out the complete truth behind the children's allegations.

Sgt. Broom returned to Sharon's house the next morning, but she would not let him in until she had cleared papers and other things from the floor, and put them in a garbage bag outside. He did not examine this garbage, as he did not have a search warrant. Once he was allowed inside, it did not seem to him that the cleanup had made much of an impression on the messy apartment. He spoke to Sharon and Gary, but they refused to discuss the allegations with him and both declined to submit to lie detector tests.

Later on the same day Sharon visited the children at the foster home. She assured them that they would be going home soon. She clearly wanted to talk to them alone, and, though Catherine was hovering around, would whisper to the girls and accompany them to the bathroom. As Sharon left, Catherine mentioned that she found Linda to be a "bright little thing," and the mother responded with a gesture towards Janis, saying, "She is a little slow. Not retarded. Just slow."

After the visit, Linda said, "We'll soon be going home."

"How can we be sure all that stuff won't happen to us again?" Janis asked her.

Linda replied, "Well, Mom and Gary will stop it. We're used to it now. I hate it when Gary . . ."

"You tell too much, Linda," interrupted Janis. "It's not our business what Mom and Gary do. They'll stop doing it maybe."

Linda said, "I like the treats they give us after they do it."

"What kind of treats?" Catherine asked.

"Lollipops and candy," said Linda.

"Sometimes we get money to go to the store," said Janis. "I like that 'cos I can choose the things that I like."

Later Catherine overheard a conversation between the children as they were getting ready for bed. Janis told Linda, "It's Mom's fault we're in a foster home. But Catherine is nice, eh?"

"Yeah, Jan, nobody hurts us here," replied Linda, who went on to talk about her mother fondling her "regina." She said, "It's so crazy. I don't like it."

"Nobody likes it. But we got to like it, because Mom gets angry if we cry," responded Janis.

Mrs. Wells came by again two days later, frantic to talk to the children. She took them outside and whispered to them urgently.

At bedtime Janis said to Catherine, "You know those things we told you this morning. They were just a dream. I told you it was true, but it was a dream. I'll get a licking for telling that stuff."

Linda responded indignantly, "Really. A dream, eh, Jan. It's true. I don't tell lies, Jan. It's crazy but it's true."

Janis said, "I shouldn't say that stuff. Mom is going to give me a licking. Somebody will tell Mom I told."

The next day Linda again came out with a disturbing disclosure, and Janis again tried to silence her. Linda pointed to a little battery-powered "Glow Bug" night-light, and told Catherine, "Mom has a thing like a little knife with batteries. They stick it in, and sometimes it gets poo on it. They stick it in everyone."

Janis, who was playing on the stairs, said, "Shut up, Lin. She's making up stories, Catherine."

Janis herself later talked about what apparently was a vibrator. She told Catherine: "Mom did all those bad things to us before we even knew Gary. They put that banana thing with batteries way up in my vagina. Sometimes I would scream and they would put a towel in my mouth. Gary didn't live with us then. She put it in my bum too. It moves up and down, and in and out, and it shivers. It has batteries in it, and it hurts.

"I'm so scared of it. It's terrible. Your house is so different. I can't believe how people are in this house. It's so safe. Why did Mom hurt me so much? It hurt to sit down. It hurt to walk. I was so sore and so tired."

"Couldn't you rest when you were finished?" Catherine asked.

"But you're never finished," Janis replied. "Everyone's so nice here. How come you are all so nice?"

The two children completely reversed their previous roles when they went for their second interviews with Tricia Donnelly on March 7, 1985, six days after their first meeting with the child abuse specialist. Janis was forthcoming about disclosing abuse, while Linda was evasive. Ms. Donnelly was not particularly surprised by Linda's lack of co-operation, as it is quite a normal phenomenon for children to become scared by the enormity of the allegations they have made, and the response of their parents. Linda told Ms. Donnelly her mother would spank her if she told about Mom's and Gary's secrets.

Ms. Donnelly later explained to the court about a mechanism known as the accommodation syndrome; this is when sexually abused children usually deal with their own feelings of fear, guilt and helplessness by keeping the abuse secret. According to this theory, the child will accommodate her abuse as a part of her normal experience, and only disclose what has happened to her when she feels safe and secure in a different environment. Because her feelings of fear and guilt have become incorporated into her view of the world, the theory states, she is likely to become frightened after making the disclosure, and will then try to deny or retract it. Child abuse experts often cite this theory in court in order to indicate that delayed disclosures and retractions need not necessarily be seen as discrediting children's stories, as they would in the case of adult victims of sexual assaults.

As soon as Janis saw Ms. Donnelly, she said she wanted to talk because "Mom needs help." When the social worker asked what her mother needed help with, Janis said, "Not to do what she's been doing to me and Linda. We should talk, because we have to get Mom better."

She used the dolls to show Ms. Donnelly all the things that Linda had already described to Catherine. Sometimes she questioned whether she should be saying all this, and Ms. Donnelly reassured her that it was a good thing to do. The child said it was hard to tell, and that if she told all it would take until the next morning. After a while she very proudly told Ms. Donnelly that she felt better, and that she was now able to talk without having the dolls to help her.

"I'll tell you something that's very, very sad," said Janis. "It is very sad about my mom and Gary, and what they do to us."

The children's second interview with the child abuse specialist reinforced a decision that the Children's Aid Society had made a day or two earlier. On March 6, 1985, Janis and Linda were officially "apprehended" by the CAS. Though nothing was actually done that made the children aware of what was going on, this involved initiating court proceedings to have the girls declared "in need of protection" under the Child Welfare Act. The CAS obtained an interim court order allowing them to keep the children in foster care pending further hearings. Janis and Linda were told that they would be staying with Catherine for a while longer.

One night as Linda was getting ready for bed, Catherine heard the child singing a sad, tuneless song to herself, with these rambling, improvised lyrics: "I'm getting ready for bed. Nobody can hurt me here. Mommy loves me, but she sticks her fingers in us. And we're going home some day. But she can't hurt me now. I'm getting ready for bed. Nobody hurts us here. We can't go home now, because the boss said, No. I mean the court said, No."

PORNOGRAPHY ALLEGATIONS BEGIN

The children were beginning to look healthier than when they first came into foster care. Linda was still nervous and hyperactive, while Janis was very quiet and often withdrawn. However, Janis appeared to Catherine to have changed significantly from the woebegone little waif who arrived at the foster home six weeks earlier. Catherine observed that she was now beginning to be happy, and had rosy cheeks, while before she had appeared so preoccupied that she seemed to be falling apart at the seams, and so withdrawn that she was "almost like a little robot."

The foster mother had established a warm relationship with the two girls, who felt comfortable about telling her things that they would not disclose to anyone else. Catherine facilitated these disclosures by making an effort to hide her horror and disgust at what she heard, and by not asking questions. As she explained in court, in words that could well be quoted in any manual on child-interviewing techniques, "You know how children are, if they are talking and you ask them something: they just stop talking, or start telling you stories."

Catherine said that from time to time the children would tell her never to tell anyone about what happened in their house, "that it's a secret, not people's affairs, and I must not tell. I must button my lips, and keep it quiet. They just want me to know. I must be quiet so Gary and Mom never find out that they told me. They say Dad would really be mad, if he found out. He would be mad at Mom. He would be mad enough to kill Gary."

The girls did repeat some of what they told Catherine to Ms. Morgan, whom the foster mother frequently invited to the house to discuss the horrible things the children had been saying, or simply to see the terrified state that the girls got into when they made some of their disclosures. Catherine explained to the court that the looks on the children's faces were often so painful that "I used to call the CAS, and say 'I want somebody else to come and see this. I don't want to be the only one to see this kind of thing.' "

There were disturbing indications that the prematurely sexualized Janis was beginning to victimize her younger sister. Catherine had noticed the children on a few occasions rubbing tummies and touching one another in ways that she considered too familiar and altogether inappropriate. Then one night she caught Janis in bed with Linda trying to put her hands between the younger child's legs, while Linda struggled to fend her off. Linda looked relieved when she saw Catherine and complained, "Janis is trying to put her finger in me."

Catherine told Janis not to do things like that again, and warned that, if anyone found out she tried to molest her sister, they would think it was weird and other children wouldn't like her. Linda corrected her on that, and said that it's okay sometimes to put your fingers in your friends. Janis told Catherine that other people still like you if you stick your fingers in them, and mentioned that she had stuck her fingers in some of her friends.

"If I wrote with both hands, I couldn't write it all down," Catherine noted in the diary, which catalogued the children's ever more startling allegations of abuse. Catherine explained to the court that all she had done in her 200 pages of notes was to write down each new thing the children told her, and record conversations that she felt were particularly significant. The children would go over and over the same ground in their discussions, so that all these "gross things" were a constant topic of conversation in her home.

The next ugly revelation came while they were watching television one evening. "I couldn't believe my ears," Mrs. McInnis told the court, as she described how Linda told her: "At my house, I saw myself on TV, with Mom putting her finger in me. And I saw Janis like that too. I saw Gary putting his finger in Janis, and Gary and Mom and everyone doing those things."

The child shivered and shook, Catherine said, as she described how they would use a tape and a thing like a tape recorder, "and when they put the tape in, you see Mom putting her finger in me and Janis."

The girls were due to visit their father, who had just been informed that the children were in foster care, and he had been granted access to them. Janis and Linda warned each other not to tell their dad about what they had been saying. When they returned from this visit, Linda told Catherine, "Dad has a knife."

"I guess it's to kill people," said Janis.

"He held it to Mom's neck once," said Linda. "He doesn't hurt us. He doesn't hurt kids, you know."

Linda went to bed complaining of such a terrible headache that she felt her head would fall off. Then the following day she said something so awful that, Catherine said, "I was shocked right out of my shoes."

"When we are on TV, we don't wear any clothes. They put the bird in me. A real bird with real wings. You know, wings. They put a Kleenex over its head. It was black. They put it in me and Janis. We cried, and they took it out. It hurt. They threw it away after," Linda said.

Catherine said that as Linda was saying this, she noticed on Janis's face "a look of horror that I don't know any words to describe."

In the evening Catherine overheard the children discussing the bird. She heard Linda say, "When they put it in you, you screamed more than me," to which Janis replied, "I really screamed when it was dead, when I knew it was dead."

"It looked awful hanging down between my legs," said Linda.

"It was a dream, Linda. It was only a dream. I thought it was true, but it was only a dream. I'm telling Mom you talked. It's a secret. It's a dream. I dreamed all of that. I'm telling Mom you talked to Catherine. I'm telling Mom that Catherine knows about the bird. I mean that Catherine knows about the dream."

Catherine said the subject of the bird kept coming up in the children's conversation, as they were reminded of it by such things as seeing a bird on television, or in a comic book. She told the court, "The look of agony on the children's faces, when they talked about the bird, is written on my brain in indelible ink. The faces reminded me of pictures I've seen of people who went through the holocaust."

Catherine did also have some ordinary times with the girls, when she felt a great relief that they could for a while just play "I Spy" or "Snakes and Ladders," or listen quietly to a story. But this relief was always mixed with apprehension, as the smallest thing would suddenly spark some traumatic memory. Often they would be playing an innocent game or having a quiet chat, and Catherine would find herself ambushed by a monster that would crawl out of these little girls' consciousness.

Linda would suddenly remember details like how Gary once put "his thing" in her mouth, and it went in too far, and she was sick. Such comments would trigger similar memories in Janis, who said on this occasion that she hated it when the "pee" came in her mouth, because it tasted awful.

Catherine's daughter told the court how, on one occasion, "Mom made salad for lunch with an oil and vinegar dressing. Linda said she wasn't going to eat that, because it looked like the stuff she had to eat off Gary's pee thing. Sometimes it got stuck in the hole."

It was spontaneous statements such as this, in which a preschool-age child displayed a precise knowledge of male anatomy and perverse sexual practices, that would later convince psychiatrists and others of the truth of the children's allegations. The psychiatrists found the descriptions more convincing because of the language that the girls used, and the fact that they would display such natural child-like misconceptions as the notion that what comes from a man's "pee thing" must always be "pee."

There was a tense atmosphere in the small courtroom as everyone present struggled with their painful responses to these disclosures—none more so than Judge Beckett, who watched Mrs.

McInnis intently during her testimony, with a grim expression, bowing his head often and wiping beads of perspiration from his wide forehead. Although the foster mother was displaying no squeamishness about describing the children's words and the gross abuse they had related to her, she did not attempt to disguise her disgust and indignation. There were tears in her voice as she recalled the horror of hearing every day in her own home the girls' continual disclosures of violence and depravity.

One could have heard a pin drop in the court, and one could scarcely imagine what it would have been like in Catherine's living room, when the children's allegations that they were forced to eat feces and drink urine were discussed. As Catherine described it, Linda had abruptly introduced the topic one day by saying, "The subject is that we ate poo."

"I thought my ears were deceiving me. But I knew by the look of her that they weren't," said Catherine, as she referred to her notes in order to relate the subsequent conversation.

"You ate what?" Catherine had asked.

"We ate poo," said Linda.

"Not me," Janis interjected.

"Oh yes you did. You ate poo," Linda replied.

"I forgot. Remember when Mom put it outside to get cold, to get ice on it."

"Yes, and she fed it to me, and it was terrible."

"It's worse when it's hot," said Janis.

"You ate it hot, but Mom fed you part of the poo with ice on it. I wiped it off my teeth with a towel. Gary got me a towel. It sticks to the teeth you know," said Linda.

She said Linda told her, "When Mom made the poo ice in the back yard, she asked Gary to go get it and he wouldn't go. Mom said, 'You fucking bitch ass,' and she went out to get the poo cup. Gary hid Jan and me in the closet."

Catherine apparently felt, from what the girls told her, that this little scene was, perhaps, part of the scenario of a pornographic video in which the children were unwittingly participating. She saw that, in this context, Gary's display of concern for the girls could just have been part of the script. She inserted an editorial comment into her notes: "Somebody was taking pictures of these things, so even the things that seemed kind were brutal."

In making this comment, Catherine showed a natural understanding of a point that has been made by experts in the field of child pornography. The use of children in making pornography is a form of molestation, over and above any sexual abuse that is inflicted on the children at the same time. Researchers have noted that victims often show more distress over the fact that they were used for pornography than over the sexual indignities that they were subjected to while the pornography was made. While a victim can tell herself that the abuse she has suffered is over and done with, she knows that the frozen image of that abuse, in a photograph, film or video, might remain in circulation for years to come. Examples have been cited of teenagers committing robberies in order to recover pornographic pictures of themselves that had been taken by abusers years before.

Although Janis and Linda were too young to have that kind of sophisticated understanding, they did draw these things to Catherine's attention frequently enough to give one the impression that they were, in some way, deeply disturbed by this objective consideration of their abuse.

Resuming her account of the children's disclosures, Catherine said Linda went on to say, "If we don't eat it, she rubs it on our face and hair. Gary doesn't like it. He takes us and gives us a bath. It got all over the tub. Mom gives us pee sometimes."

"I had to drink the pee out of a beer bottle," Janis then told Catherine, who asked her how she knew it was pee, to which Janis responded, "You know by the smell. Mom worried about us crying, because there were people living upstairs, and she put a towel in my mouth."

"At home we eat supper, and then it's always this stuff," said Linda. "I try to run away, but the walls stop me. But we get treats afterwards."

In their frequent references to treats they received after suffering abuse, the children were echoing their own mother's account of her childhood experiences, as well as the reports of a large proportion of the victims of child pornography and sex rings. Children, who are used by adults for sex and pornography, are given money, presents or treats, not only as a reward, which might buy their silence and compliance, but also as an instrument of psychological blackmail—they will feel guilty about collaborating with their abusers, and therefore more reluctant to tell anyone.

A few days later Linda asked Catherine, "Why does Mom tell us it's not true? Mom knows it's true. She's not telling the truth." And, as Catherine recounted this to the court, she exclaimed, "I felt I should tell those suffering little things 'I do believe what you say!' "

Catherine said that Janis used to get very scared when she made these disclosures, and would look behind doors and drapes, and open cupboards to make sure nobody was there: "I thought it was the limit when she opened up the fridge door to see that there was nobody listening who might tell her mother.

"I told them it would never happen here, and it shouldn't happen anywhere. I told them, if it did, they should tell a teacher, the CAS, a Sunday School teacher, the police. I don't know why I told them that, because when I told the police, they wouldn't listen. They didn't believe it," Catherine told the court indignantly.

The note for April 12 read, "The children were having fun today. They played. But, when we went outside they talked about the bird. The story was always the same, almost always word-for-word."

Then, two days later, the foster mother wrote, "It was a quiet day. The girls played school and house. It was unusual that they wouldn't be revealing some dreadful thing that I hadn't heard before." She told the court, "Every day I thought, 'There is nothing more. I have heard the worst.' But there would be more horrors."

Shortly after Janis left for school the next morning, she appeared banging and screaming at the front door. She told Catherine that a car had stopped and someone offered her some candy. Catherine observed that, "If there had been a tiger after her, she couldn't have been more frightened."

For days after this Janis would not go to school alone, and talked constantly about the orange car. Catherine was convinced that Janis knew somebody in the car and that she tried several times to talk about it, but something would stop her. The child told her, "They're going to kill me. I am scared they're going to kill me."

"It was worse than I wanted to absorb somehow," said Catherine as she described more things the children told her about vibrators, bananas stuck in their bum, fruit and a red jelly that they had to lick off their mother's body, and some "red stuff" their mother and Gary put on themselves, that appeared to be different from the red jelly.

"Sometimes Mom puts jelly on her bum, or in her pee-hole, and I get to suck it off," said Linda. "Your Jell-O is good, Catherine, but Mom's jelly looks like pee."

Catherine said she stupidly responded to this by saying, "I see," to which Linda rejoined, "No, you don't see, Catherine. I see. Gary bought me a little flashlight. It's mine, and I get to look up Mom's pee-hole with it and her bum."

For all her horror and disgust at what the girls were telling her, one got a sense from listening to Catherine McInnis's testimony that she really liked these children, that she admired Linda's irrepressible spirit, and loved Janis for her gentleness. The humanity that Catherine displayed in her concern for the children was one of the few elements that gave some solace to those who had to listen to her testimony.

Catherine cried on the witness stand when she had to relate an incident in which the children displayed cruelty to one another. She described how Linda told her, "Mom holds Janis's legs, and I put the battery thing in Janis's poo-hole, and she cries."

"I put in my notes that I have a strong stomach, but I felt sick. Linda kept laughing as she was telling me this story. I felt I had to say something to her. I said, 'You have no right to hurt Janis. It's a dreadful thing to hurt another person, more dreadful to hurt your sister.' Linda said, 'Well, I like watching what they do to Janis.' I said, 'It's not fun, Linda. It's cruel and mean.' Linda said, 'When they've finished, I wipe it off and Mom puts it in the cupboard. I have poo on my hands, and I have to wash them. Then we got a treat. We always get treats.'

"I called the CAS and asked to speak to Lesley. She wasn't there, and that was a good thing. I had reached the end of my rope. I couldn't listen to any more of it, and I was going to ask them to move the children. Then I thought better of it. Just a flash in the pan. I wasn't angry with the children."

Catherine McInnis was finding the situation increasingly hard to accept, and, in their own way, so were the children. Janis and Linda were becoming more urgent in their desire to tell all that happened to them and to have something done about it. Their stay in Catherine's comfortable, normal home had made them realize how much abnormality there was in their previous environment. And Catherine had been telling them that the police and other authorities are meant to stop people treating children so badly. The social workers had explained to them that perhaps their mother was sick, and that by talking about what happened, they could help make their mother better; they could help her to stop harming them, so that they might be able to go back home.

But Linda conceived a more radical solution to their problems. "I wish Dad was a killer, because I want him to kill Gary," she said one day. "He has a knife; I want him to cut Gary's neck. I hate Gary. I want Dad to kill him. Gary puts his fingers in me. I don't want him at my house. I want him out of there."

In relating this conversation, Catherine observed that Linda "had a terrible look on her face. It wasn't just idle chatter. She meant business."

Janis, who had previously been the more reluctant of the two children to talk about what had happened in her home, suddenly launched into a detailed description of what appeared to be pornographic moviemaking sessions. She talked about licking the red jelly and peanut butter off Gary for the TV. She said, "I hate licking Gary's pee thing and all that. I cry, and everybody laughs. I can't remember where the place is. We go there at night. We go to bed, and then get up and go in a car to that place. They laugh. They say 'Channel something TV.' Sometimes we're bare. Sometimes we have some clothes on. They laugh. They have a camera. Mom and Gary and us do these awful things. I cry, and Linda screams, and they take our pictures. And then, after, later at home or at that place, we see all the things we did on TV.

"There is a couch there, and some women and men taking pictures," the child continued. "The next day, it's the same thing. We are hurt again. We both get the fingers and the battery thing. They hurt us, but then they give us lots of treats, and we hold hands and we sing songs. We hold hands, and sing songs, and dance round and round, one leg up and one down. Pictures are taken of everything. Then we go to sleep. Lots of times they wake us at night, and we go to this place for pictures, and we can be on TV. A man talks like in the movies."

Catherine listened to this monologue in silence, and noted down Janis's words soon afterwards, while they were still fresh in her mind. She believed that here, as elsewhere in her notes, she recorded what the children were saying as accurately as possible. She tried to recall all the details, as she felt these might be helpful in investigating Janis's allegations. She explained to the court, "She talked about so much. I couldn't remember it all. But I marked down what I could remember accurately and exactly."

Janis said, "Then we hold hands, and we sing again, twirling and spinning. And then they get the battery thing out. Catherine, it's awful."

"Janis was so eager to talk," Catherine told the court. "But I felt ill, and I couldn't listen another minute. It had to be pretty bad because I'm strong. I went for fresh air. When I came back, she didn't want to say any more. She said, 'Don't tell anyone. It's a secret. It's an ugly secret.'"

Catherine said the child then told her, "You are sweet. You have pretty hands." The foster mother told the court, "I thought, that's strange because I have working hands. I take care of my kids, not my hands."

The next morning Janis told Catherine, "I know where that place is, I think. There is an '11' on the building. I think it's white with some colors."

As Janis described the building and the square sign outside it, Catherine thought she must referring to a CHCH-TV Channel 11 studio in Hamilton, which did have a white sign with a number 11 on it, and a flower-shaped colored logo.

Catherine said the children described "naked bodies and people doing every mortal perverted thing I ever heard tell of, and a lot I didn't." She said she wrote in her diary, "Could there be corruption in high places?" But she hastened to add that this was just her own observation.

She recorded in her notes, "Janis said that the people took all their clothes off. But one man was more modest, because he left his socks on. They were all laughing."

The children drew pictures of the room at Channel 11, describing little mats on the floor, a couch, a camera on a stand with crooked legs, lights hanging on wires. Janis said that, when they were taken there at night, they would go in and turn to the right.

Sgt. David Bowen, the senior investigating officer on the case, later testified, "I was shown Catherine McInnis's notes with the drawings of crosswires over a lamp and mats. I was satisfied those diagrams seemed to reflect portions of the [Channel 11] building. I didn't understand what they meant, until I went in the building. There were spotlights with very thin wires, and a large number of mats shoved up against each other. I accepted that these diagrams showed the inside of the building."

A television company executive later confirmed that if you enter the [Channel 11] building by a side door, you have to turn to the right in order to get to the studio.

Janis told Lesley that her mother had burned down a house at the Channel 11 place. Police reports subsequently obtained by the CAS indicated that there had been a fire, a case of suspected arson, at a building next door to the studio, which was used to store costumes and property. Sgt. Bowen said he was never made aware of Janis's allegation about the fire.

The police began to conduct a surveillance operation at the studio, but soon abandoned it, when they believed that they had discovered that some subsequent allegations made by the children were untrue. Police received conflicting information about the level of security in place at the studio; it was only used occasionally by the television station for certain special productions. A 1984 signout list of people who had access to the studio had been destroyed in January 1985, and Sgt. Bowen was told by commissionaires who guarded the building, that the security was not very sound. But management representatives at the television station responded defensively to the suggestion that anyone could have used the studio for making pornographic movies. They convinced the police that the security was tight enough that no-one could possibly have gained unauthorized entry, and would have had to have great technical skill to operate the equipment.

Subsequent court testimony indicated that some of the equipment could have been operated easily by someone with some basic technical knowledge. It was not necessarily very difficult to beat the security system to gain unauthorized entry into the building. The television company later instituted new security measures as a result of the allegations.

Sgt. Bowen obtained photographs of some, but not all, of the television station employees who had access to the studio. He showed these to Janis, who was frightened and would not look at the pictures. Catherine asked him to go through the pictures with the child again more slowly, but he declined to do this. The Hamilton police also showed pictures of Janis and Linda to a Toronto police task force on pornography, and were told that these children had not appeared in any pornographic material seized by police in the Toronto area. The investigating officers gave no indication that they were aware that this was not a very significant finding, since professionally produced pornography is often sent abroad for processing, and sold in markets as far removed as possible from where it was originally produced.

Authorities in the United States have estimated that the child pornography business is worth from $2 billion to $3 billion a year, and involves more than one million children. The Canadian government's Report on Sexual Offenses Against Children and Youths concluded that there was no reliable evidence on the extent of the pornography trade in Canada. It found that detection mechanisms were beset with "crippling problems," but found that on the basis of evidence available, there appeared to be no commercial production of pornography within the country. However, the report warned that law enforcement agencies would soon face a situation of different proportions, with the increasing availability of videotape equipment facilitating the cheap and easy reproduction of child pornography.

The sophisticated nature of the child pornography trade can be seen from a description of how such material is circulated. A 1984 study of child pornography and sex rings stated: "The mail is a major facilitator for the circulation of child pornography. A laundering process is often used: buyers send their responses to another country; the mail received by the overseas forwarding agent is opened, and cash or checks are placed in a foreign bank account; the order is remailed under a different cover back to the United States. This procedure insures that the subscriber does not know where the operation originates, and law enforcement has difficulty tracing the operation."

The same study noted, "Few law enforcement agencies have investigators trained as child pornography investigators, and few of these agencies believe child pornography exists in their own cities or towns."[6]

Sgt. Bowen concluded, on the basis of what he and his partner had learned, that it was "completely impossible" that the pornographic sessions described by the children had taken place at the Channel 11 studio.

Catherine contacted Staff Sergeant John Gruhl. He was a friend, who said he looked upon Mrs. McInnis "as a pretty special person, because of all the children she has taken into the house and done what looked like miracles within the short time she had them."

She asked the staff sergeant to drive her and Janis past the Channel 11 studio. He agreed to do this and drove them by the studio three times, noting that on each occasion the child fell silent as they drove by. Catherine observed that the child "turned as red as blood, and I noticed something I'd never seen before, because she never perspires, a drop of sweat on her lips. She turned her head and glanced, and turned her head. At that time she didn't say anything about anything."

When they got home, Janis told Catherine, "I saw the place with the '11' and the flower." Catherine asked her why she had not told

Sgt. Gruhl, and Janis replied, "I thought he might take me in there. I thought he might drag me in there. Most people are bad. I thought he might be bad. I was scared."

CHAPTER 7

THE "FLORID" ALLEGATIONS

The children spent a weekend with their father at the beginning of May. After this visit Catherine McInnis began reporting a series of lurid and bizarre allegations of murder and ritual violence. A psychiatrist who subsequently examined the children described these as the "florid allegations"—a term that Judge Beckett later adopted in his final judgement.

It was plain to see, both from her notes and courtroom testimony, that the foster mother was shocked and frightened by these allegations. She had struggled with her own initial disbelief in what seemed to be preposterous stories, and then she became convinced that the children were telling the truth. She now had to struggle with the devastating emotional impact of hearing the girls' daily horror stories of sadistic violence. She also put her own credibility on the line by reporting these stories to skeptical people, whose first response would likely be to question her sanity. Under this stress her note-taking and reporting became more erratic, and her judgement less sound.

During the first two months that the girls had been in the foster home they had made a few references to children being killed, and talked about a strange character, whom they called "the Blob." While

Catherine had found the details about Elizabeth being killed disturbing enough to jot down on a paper bag, though not in her notebook, she had generally not paid much attention to such references. "I played them down in my mind," she said, surmising that "someone had told them stories."

The conversation that led Catherine to begin to take these strange stories seriously took place after she returned from attending a friend's funeral. She told the girls she was at a funeral, and Janis asked her who had been killed. She explained to the child that her friend had died, but had not been killed. She described what a funeral is and talked about going to a graveyard.

Janis picked up on the reference to a graveyard, and said, "That's where Gary and Mom buries the people he and Mom kill. He buries them in the woods. He kills them in the woods, and buries them in a graveyard. Mom kills the boys and Gary kills the girls."

"I said, 'That's sad. Were you sad?' " Catherine testified, quoting Janis's unexpected response to this question: "Sometimes, and sometimes not. Some of them were mean to me too. Sometimes I cried, or else I didn't care."

With a trembling voice, which frequently broke into tears or tones of outraged indignation, the foster mother launched into a detailed description of the girls' allegations about child murders and "sexual orgies with the dead and the living at the graveyard and in the woods.

"They break their hands before. They break them back like that," she said Janis told her, holding her right hand with her left and forcing it backwards with a violent gesture. "They rip their faces too. They rip the faces up. They rip the mouth all up.

"Sometimes the man from 11 is there. He takes pictures of how they do terrible things to the kids. Even when they are dead. They stick lots of big things in them, and they put them in the trunk of the car, and take them to the graveyard. There are stones there. They dig a hole and put them in."

The foster mother described how Janis held up ten fingers and said, "They killed that many that way."

In a somewhat disjointed series of notes, Catherine recorded how the child went on to tell her that some of the kids seemed to know they were going to be killed and were crying when they were in the woods, while others didn't know and were sleeping on the way to the graveyard. Sometimes they are choked, and at other times a knife is stuck in their neck, Janis said. From the child's description, this seemed to have taken place in late summer or autumn, as she spoke of leaves falling from the trees. She said everything was photographed. Catherine noted that when Janis told this, she had a look "of stark, unbelievable horror."

Janis referred to a place in Toronto, much like Channel 11, a place where pictures were taken and things done to children and other people. Janis named children who she thought had been killed. She told Catherine about seeing a dismembered hand on the ground. Sometimes, Janis said, she would have to take a child into the woods, pretending that they were going to play, and then her mother or Gary would kill the child. Catherine said Janis described people who had something stuck in their mouths, or a towel tied around their mouths. She said they would be tied up and would have things stuck in their pee-holes.

"I heard about this every day until they left and how they did terrible and awful things to them, and everything would be photographed," Catherine testified.

Catherine recorded in her notes: "Other children besides Linda and Janis were involved at Channel 11 place. Great baths, lots of people in tubs, lots of soap, lots of water splashing. Janis said both she and Linda were there when Elizabeth was killed. Janis said, 'Some were killed in Hamilton. Some are drived here, or go to Channel 11.' When they were in Toronto, it was a long drive to the woods and the graveyard. It seems by what she said, a number are buried in the same area."

Catherine said Janis snuggled up to her, her face a deep crimson, and told her, "I don't know if I feel well or not. I get so scared when I think about it."

In a conversation recorded in Catherine McInnis's notes, Linda asked Janis one morning to tell Catherine about her dream about a graveyard and a killer.

"I dreamed I was in the graveyard. Mom was sticking her fingers in me," said Janis.

"What graveyard? A real one?" Catherine asked.

"Yes, near the woods. A real graveyard where you bury people. It was terrible. I'm scared."

"Did you see the hand, Jan, did you see the cutoff hand?" Linda prompted.

"Oh, Linda!" Janis exclaimed.

"That's where Elizabeth is, our friend Elizabeth," said Linda. "She got dead by a killer."

Janis said, "Gary said he'd kill me if I told. They'll kill me if I tell. They said that."

"When you tell, the killer gets you," Linda confirmed. "Janis, did you see the hand at the graveyard? Did you see the woods in your dream? That's the killing place."

"Yeah, they tie them up and punch leaves in them, in the belly. They stick knives in them. They cut them. They stick big sticks in them. We have to do things too. I take them in the woods. The man from 11 is there, and so is the lady. Sometimes Mom goes back in Gary's car. Gary has a big shovel. Sometimes they cut the neck, ugh. They stick fingers in us too. They take pictures in the woods and the graveyard," said Janis.

She pointed towards her genital area and said, "They stick knives there too. They cut something off."

"What?" asked Catherine.

Janis and Linda did not answer. Janis told Catherine, "Well, they tear the face sometimes, and Mom likes to break their hands all up. Gary too."

"Elizabeth's mother knew. She went phew. She breathed in when she finded out that Elizabeth was killed," said Linda.

"The man from 11 helps Gary dig the graves. They use a flashlight," Janis said.

When Janis came home from school that evening, both children began to talk again about the same gruesome things. Janis said that parts are sometimes cut off dead children and stuck in her vagina. She tried to describe the graveyard, which, she said, had a crooked path and some kind of grating from which smoke or steam came out. Sometimes it seemed they could smell something off the smoke. She drew a picture of the grate. She told Catherine that you can see the word "Love" on the stones. She would spell it LVOE. She talked about a house in the woods, and two other houses nearby, one of which she thought was red brick with a blue roof. Catherine, who was trying to note down every detail that might lead investigators to the graveyard, also recorded that Janis mentioned the colors yellow and brown as she described the houses.

The notes record that Janis said the brown man and Gary dug graves, while someone else stayed in the car in case they had to get away in a hurry. If a car came or anybody came near, they had to grab their knives and run. There was a reference to a building with a hole in the floor. The children said that the brown man and Gary had cameras, and would use a flashlight, holding an umbrella to shield the light. They described stones shining in the moonlight. They said the graveyard was in the country, and spoke of "the dead place" as being up a little road near the graveyard, with a gate at the end. They said, "It's a home where little kids get killed. Not mothers, not fathers, just kids."

"They spoke of the Blob," Catherine read from her notes to the court. "The Blob is Gary's friend. He is huge, like a giant. The Blob comes from somewhere, when he hears screams. He almost got Janis and Linda before they came to Hamilton. Gary drove hard. Gary's friend wanted to kill them. If they tell, they will be killed. Afterwards the Blob and Gary and Mom were friends again. Linda laughed and sang, 'The Blob does not know where we live in Hamilton now. He doesn't know nothing now.'"

She said the girls told her something was stuffed in the mouths of the victims to stop them screaming, but sometimes you would hear a little mumble. Catherine said, "The children always had to take knives and stick them in whoever was being killed. If they didn't, they would be killed themselves. Both mentioned this numerous times."

Janis drew pictures of the graveyard and the two houses. These simplistic child's drawings showing stick people without some of their limbs were filed as exhibits with the court—eloquent testimony to the severe disturbance of these young children, who had not yet learned to read and write. Catherine testified that while doing one of these simple sketches, Janis told her: "There's ten kids, but I can't make ten kids crying."

Janis told the foster mother that there was a long way, and a shortcut from the parking lot to the graveyard, and if you went the long way, there were lots of holes. She said, "The long way is the sad way."

Catherine said the girls wanted to give her a full description of the houses near the graveyard, where children were killed, so she could "get lots of big men, and the police, and go there and knock them down."

Mrs. McInnis said she reported the girls' allegations to the police that day, and on many other occasions: "They believed that there was probably a little bit of diddling around, but the main things they did not believe." She said Sgt. Bowen once told her, "These poor children are fantasizing. It's beyond believing."

She said she told the sergeant, "It may be beyond believing, but it happened to these children."

The response of the police was a source of extreme frustration to Catherine. The two officers who were supposedly investigating the case never came to her house to talk to her, or to interview the children, and had not looked at her notes. They had apparently not followed up on the sexual abuse allegations, and indicated on several occasions that they did not believe the stories about pornography and murder.

Catherine had told Sgt. Bowen several times about a child called Andy, who the girls said used to live across the street from them and who was involved in the sessions at the television studio. They took no steps to locate this child. Eventually Catherine did her own little investigation by getting her daughter to drive Janis and herself down the street where the children used to live, and asking the child to point out Andy's house to her.

She described the police response to this: "I had called the police. I said, 'There's something terrible that has gone on with these children.' Sgt. Bowen said at one time that the children were fantasizing. I said, 'I'll take Janis myself, and find out where these people live.' Later I went into the police station and showed him my notes and the number of the house. I said to Sgt. Bowen, 'These children aren't lying,' and again he said that they were fantasizing."

The police officers cited the low incidence of missing children in Canada as one reason to be skeptical of the children's stories. This explanation gave Catherine little comfort, especially when she came across an article in the Hamilton Spectator under the headline, "Child Molesters Prove Well Organized Group." This story referred to "an undeclared war on children," stating that child molesters have their own newsletters, and that 50,000 of the 1.5 million missing children in the United States are believed to have been abducted by strangers.

Catherine described a furious argument she had with Lesley Morgan about the lack of police investigation of the case. She said she asked Ms. Morgan if anything was being done about "any of this mess," and the social worker told her, "You'll have to wait. The police will look after it when they're ready. You have to respect the police."

"I said, 'I can't respect people getting paid to do a job and doing nothing.' I told Lesley it was her turn to go to the police station and stand up and be counted. I told her I was going to take all those old notes I made and rip them up. Lesley said, 'If you tear up those notes, the police will put you in jail.' I said, 'They won't come when they are told someone has been murdered. I've spent months without any time for myself or my family.'"

In her diary Catherine wrote: "No more notes ever, in this world or the next one."

Ms. Morgan went to visit the foster mother and persuaded her not to give up. They went for a drive, and when they returned Catherine repaired the notebook from which she had earlier torn out some pages in her rage and frustration.

The disbelief shown by the police was a major disillusionment for Catherine, who had always maintained an idealistic image of the police force. She felt that society was failing her, and that one of her strongest principles had been taken from her.

"When she broke down in tears saying she didn't know what she would do if anything happened to her own children, she apologized for losing control. She is a person who likes to be in control of things," said Dr. Gail Beck, a psychiatrist who subsequently did an assessment of Mrs. McInnis. "When police did not believe the children were telling the truth, she was feeling very frustrated, not knowing what to do. She was preoccupied with the idea that children were being slaughtered and police don't care."

It required great courage for Catherine to continue to listen to the children's stories as they began to describe revolting scenes of cannibalism. Catherine noted that the children talked about eating flesh at the Blob's house, and sometimes eating flesh at the graveyard. As she described the allegations in the notes, "At the Blob's house, or their house, the flesh would be cooked. He cut the flesh off the children, after they are dead and he cooked it. They always shared it around, and people would get the pieces they liked. He would cut off the head and cook it. Gary took pictures. At the graveyard they would cut off the pee thing, and the two things that hang down, and it would be torn apart, and cut apart, and all shared around. Everybody had some of it.

"It was no wonder that when they first came to my home, the girls would leave food on their plates, refuse roast beef, pork and chicken, and ask for bread," said Catherine.

One of the aspects of the children's disclosures that later helped persuade the psychiatrists that they were telling the truth was the way that everyday things seemed to remind the girls of painful memories and bring these to the surface. This tended to show that Janis and Linda were spontaneously recalling buried experiences rather than fabricating or reciting material that had been implanted in them.

For Catherine it meant that her home was a mine field in which innocent familiar objects would suddenly trigger nightmarish descriptions of disgusting practices. A painting or a little ornament could inspire discussions describing horrendous sexual abuse. Flashlights reminded the girls of the vibrators that were used to torment them; candles made them recall satanic rituals; and boxes conjured up images of coffins. Worst of all for Catherine, who loved gardening and the outdoors, was the way that these girls' terrible experiences had perverted their view of nature itself, so that planting seeds would remind them of burying bodies, and animals had become associated with bestiality and degradation.

Catherine described to the court a conversation with the children that took place early in May, when she had gone into the garden to plant beets and had taken some crumbs to feed to the birds. She said some starlings and crows came flapping around, and Janis told her, "Those birds are not as big as the chickens that Mom and Gary take to the graveyard."

When Catherine asked the child if she was talking about real chickens, she said Janis replied, "Yes. Mom sticks her finger in the chicken, and Gary and the Blob and the Channel 11 man, they put their pee things in the chicken. And then they pull the eyes out of the chickens, and pull the neck off, and the head off. And then they have it bleed into this dish, and we share around the blood. And they make that thing, that star, that sign with the circle around it on something with the blood. They pulled all the feathers off the chicken. That's fucking chicken, Catherine."

The foster mother tried to correct the child by telling her she must mean, "plucking chicken."

She said Linda replied, "No, no, no, Catherine, you are stupid. That's fucking chicken. That's what it is."

Linda told her that they had to eat the chicken, and all the stuff inside, and drink the blood: "It's awful. I branged up and branged up but we have to eat it 'cos if we don't they'll kill us."

This was not the only story that Catherine found so personally repugnant that she did not write it out in her notebook. During her court testimony she also explained a note that referred to the possibility that bodies were buried in existing graves. The note had simply stated, "Are bodies being placed in someone's coffin? Are bodies being placed in recent graves? Are they digging in recent graves and tossing in bodies?"

This was in fact a cryptic reference to another conversation with the children, one that was also prompted by an everyday event. Catherine told the court, "I don't want anyone to think I'm cat crazy because I'm not. I can't stand to think of little animals freezing and starving. I put a shelter out for stray cats. Linda saw this and said that she had been in a box away down in the ground. She said, 'I was in a box away down in the ground in the graveyard. I was in the box, and, after we do what we have to do, we can put our hands up, and somebody would help us get out. I was down in that box. It was open. It was slippy in there. There was something wet in there, and my feet went right through it. There was bone in there, and there was hair in there. I was so scared I just shrieked and shrieked. The stink in there was like shit.' "

On another occasion Catherine was planting pansies in her backyard. She said she was shoveling holes to plant flowers in, when Linda started talking about graves and dead children. She referred to an elevator that slants and goes up and down. This made Catherine wonder if the graveyard was near a quarry. Then Linda told her, "When they bury kids, they lie. The Blob mixes a big soup in a big pot with a wooden spoon. It's a lie. It's lye. They say it's lye. The Blob makes a soup to give the dead kids a drink. After he makes the soup, he pours it on the dead kids. Then he takes some white stuff in a bag. It's like sugar. No, it's like salt. He shakes it over the dead kids. Then they throw in the ground and the dirt and they bury them, and they make a little pile of stones."

Catherine described how the constant exposure to these stories threatened her own sanity and peace of mind. She said, "If once in a while I didn't take a 15-minute reprieve away from the children, I'd find myself talking to my cookbook."

As the children's stories got progressively worse, Catherine had obviously become more and more disturbed, and this was evident from the notes she recorded in her book. At the beginning she had simply recorded the children's statements; now she was starting to insert cryptic comments and editorial remarks. At first she tended not to ask the girls many questions and let them tell their stories in their own words. But Catherine began to believe that she had a responsibility to glean all the details she could from the girls so that their allegations could be investigated. When she ceased being a relatively detached reporter, her notes became more difficult to interpret.

Certain things that the children said disturbed her so much that she did not record them at all except through her own coded reference. The reference to the children being lowered into graves was an example of this. The most serious omissions from the notes related to the children's father. On May 11 the children told Catherine that their father was also involved in the killings, and she wrote in her notebook, "I won't hear. I won't remember. And someone helps too.

"I didn't know what on earth to do, who I could go to," she said. "I was getting all this information, finding out that somebody else is killing people. How on earth am I going to bring anybody else into this, when nobody believes."

She was apparently very afraid of Gordon Wells, whom she had met when he came to pick up the children for the weekend visit. The children had described him as a violent and dangerous man. Catherine realized that the police were not taking her reports of the children's allegations seriously, and she was afraid of risking both their added disbelief and Gordon's anger by reporting the girls' statements about their father. Each time the girls talked about their father, Catherine recorded the conversations with notes like, "Surprises, surprises, surprises," "Secrets," or "The news gets worse."

She told the court that she used bad judgement in not recording the girls' allegations about their father, especially as the CAS was allowing the children to visit him on weekends. She explained that the children had been most insistent that they didn't want their father to know they had implicated him. She said, "I couldn't see embarrassing myself by adding more names, telling them someone else was involved. I didn't tell Lesley because I knew she would go to the police, and I couldn't stand the embarrassment of having them think I was crazy."

Dr. Beck, who later examined Mrs. McInnis, did not conclude that she was crazy or had any form of psychiatric disturbance other than an understandable reaction to the stress to which she was being exposed.

The children would later say that their father had killed three people. However, when they first implicated him in murder, it was as an accomplice in the bizarre climax to the story of the Blob and the Channel 11 man, who the children said were killed and mutilated in the basement of their Hamilton home, and then buried in the backyard. The children's story makes sense as the script of a sick, homemade movie, but it apparently did not occur to any of the adults, who were aware of the children's allegations at the time, to view them in that light.

The police lacked the imagination to grasp the concept that, if two very young children had been forced to participate in violent pornography without understanding what was going on, it would not be inconsistent for them to give lurid and detailed reports of violent acts. In this context it would hardly be surprising if the acts that the children described as real events were beyond belief from an adult perspective. The police could not have considered this possibility—or they would not have called off their investigation of the alleged pornography, when they quickly concluded that the murders did not take place.

Linda told Catherine that the Channel 11 man lived in a penthouse apartment in the housing project where they used to live in Toronto. She thought that he was a superintendent there, and said he had a son called Billy. She said Billy was one of the children who was killed: "They hurt him bad. They took pictures of Billy begging not to be killed." The children said the Channel 11 man's wife, or girlfriend, was Elizabeth, the mother of little Elizabeth, who was also killed.

Catherine said the children described how the Blob, the Channel 11 man and big Elizabeth all "got dead at our house." She said that Janis told her that they all had to stick knives in the Channel 11 man and that Gary "got him good in the neck, and his head was half off." The child then told Catherine that Gary "cut off his pee thing and put it in the garbage, the eyes too."

The children told Catherine that they were also forced to help in the killing of the Blob, and that their father helped too because "Dad is fast with the knife."

Catherine said Linda told her, "It was asgusting, Catherine, it was asgusting, when those people were killed. We had to help take those knives and plunge them into the people. It was asgusting. Of course I was scared. We had to do it, or Mom would kill us."

They said three people were buried in the backyard, and somebody was thrown in the water, fastened to something. They said they watched through a window as Gary ran water from a hose on the paving stones in the backyard all night long so that there wouldn't be any clay on the stones. The court was shown one of Janis's drawings, depicting two figures with a rectangular shape beside them. Catherine said Janis told her, "That's where the Blob is buried, and that's the Channel 11 man."

The police found this story so unbelievable that they did not consider it necessary to search for evidence, though they did hop over the fence at 2 A.M. one morning and examine the paving stones in the small backyard. They concluded that the earth beneath the stones had not been disturbed.

Lesley Morgan, who also heard the same story from the children, was asked in court if she believed that the Channel 11 man and the Blob were still interred in the backyard. She said that the children had told her that they thought the bodies were moved somewhere else afterwards. "The evidence is probably long gone," she said, referring to a police occurrence report in which Sgt. Broom noted that he told the social worker on May 28, 1985, "It is apparent that if there was any evidence that could assist in this investigation, it has long since been disposed of."

Ms. Morgan, a very earnest young woman, who was completely convinced of the children's sincerity, told the court, "Something went on and the children should not return [home], whether or not we can prove there were murders." She said that, if they were to go home, "they will continue to be abused by the same people who were abusing them, except for the Channel 11 man and the Blob."

On the day after they told the stories of the murders in the basement the children had a visit with their mother at the Children's Aid Society. Ms. Morgan noted that the girls were almost out of control after that visit, and Catherine recalled them acting strangely when they returned. She said they wouldn't sit down, and later wept profusely. She said Linda told her, "I was scared Mom will take us out to the graveyard and kill us. I'm scared. My stomach feels stuck. It feels twisted. Just hold me. I'm scared."

Ms. Morgan returned to talk to the children that day, and made a tape of their conversations. On the tape the girls talk about their fear that their mother would kill them at the graveyard with a knife. The court heard Linda say on tape, "I was very, very scared, very, very, very, very, very, very, very scared."

Catherine said the children told her that, when they went to the graveyard, they used to drive by Canada's Wonderland, an amusement park just north of Toronto. She said they spoke about witches, the devil and God, and referred to people wearing masks and costumes. They told her that the Blob sometimes dressed up as a clown. He would always take a book to the graveyard and someone would read from it. They said their father would call out the number "666," a number they often referred to, and always seemed to associate with fear.

As the children continued to talk about the graveyard sessions, it seemed clear to Catherine that some kind of satanic ritual was involved. They said their father's friend would go to the graveyard with a mask and that she would be dressed up. Janis said her mask was torn and she had to paint something on her face. They told Catherine that their father had a sign, and a picture of the devil that he kept behind another picture. They said he wore a mask and a scary costume at the graveyard and would look like the devil. Then they said everyone would spin and twirl around and sing queer songs.

They also told Catherine that their father moves his knife very fast; that he once twisted his boot on someone he had killed, and that he ran over someone in Toronto and killed him. Catherine testified that the girls told her they had to pretend their father didn't come to see them in Hamilton, but he would come.

The children often used to draw a five-cornered star with a circle round it. They also drew an eye symbol and a heart, but would never tell Catherine what these meant. She said they would tell her, "It's a secret."

Catherine said Janis's artwork was often colored with a black crayon. When she was questioned in cross-examination about the children's coloring, she said, "Their favorite color was black. They put red in there for blood to brighten it up sometimes.

"Day after day the children drew the same things, talked about the same things, and that was all they talked about. That was their world," Catherine said.

"It was so sad to see a small girl's artwork tell such a gruesome story. Every night it was something similar. Janis wouldn't bring home some lovely little thing with butterflies and bees and pretty things," Catherine said.

Once, while she was drawing at home, Janis asked Catherine, "How do you draw a picture when they don't have any legs and feet, and the pee thing and head are cut off? How do you draw a dead person when you take them out to be buried in a bowl?"

She produced more of the girls' drawings for the court, together with notes she had made of the children's explanations of them. One of Janis's drawings was a stick figure of a girl with a glum face; she said this was little Elizabeth; she was crying because she didn't want to die. Other stick figures had hands or heads missing; there were heads without bodies and faces that were missing an eye. Catherine said Janis explained that one drawing was a picture of her [Janis] standing by a grave with her throat cut, and blood all over the ground, saying, "I have to say, 'I love you, Mom,' or else I end up here."

A picture that attracted a lot of interest from Arthur Brown, the mother's lawyer, showed a house and something standing beside it, which was labeled a knife, but looked as if it could have been a tree. It appeared that someone had crossed out the word tree, and then substituted knife. A psychiatrist later suggested that it might have represented both to a child. Catherine's explanation that the knife was larger than the house was, "It is possible that the knife stood out in her mind much more than the house did. She knew more about knives than she did about homes."

Another strange exhibit was a duplicated arithmetic question sheet that Janis had brought home from school. There was a series of sums on the paper with boxes provided for the answers. Linda had drawn a little human figure in each box. Catherine said she found this sheet and subsequently explained, "I just drew the kids in the graves."

After several days on the witness stand, Catherine McInnis was asked by John Harper, the Children's Aid Society lawyer, if there were any further allegations made by the children that she had not told the court. She said there were some things that she hadn't mentioned, "just revolting things: about things to do with, say, the dog. One morning, early, before I started doing my housework, I was out on the patio with Linda having a cup of tea. We saw a woman walking a dog. Linda said, 'That's different from the dog my mom had in Toronto.' I said, 'I didn't know you had a dog.' Linda said, 'It was a long time ago. My mom had a dog and she stuck her finger in the dog.' I said, 'He would show his teeth.' She said, 'Catherine, you don't know anything. She didn't put her finger in the dog's mouth. She put it in the dog's bum. Gary and another man put their pee thing in the dog's poo-hole. The dog's dead now.' I said, 'Even a dog is lucky sometimes.'

"Janis said things like this to me too. I didn't put it in my notes, because I tried to tell the police things that were less revolting. It's easier to nail water to the wall than to tell something to the police. To save myself from embarrassment and having somebody think I was crazy, I didn't say too much about the really revolting things. I hoped and prayed they would do something about what they already knew."

She described another allegation where the children were forced to eat bananas that had been used in grotesque sexual acts. She said, "I found it so revolting, I couldn't write it down. Their mother made them do it, and, if they didn't, they would feel the cold blade of the knife pressing into their necks. Even when they brang up and brang up and coughed and spat, they would do it, because if they didn't, they would be cut up, and handed around for people to take home on a plate."

Catherine said that sometimes, when Janis was remembering such horrors, her body would shudder, her head would go up a little and her eyes would roll back, half open under thick, swollen lids. She would come out of this state when Catherine wiped her face and wet her lips with a cold cloth. Catherine would cuddle the child and then she would be okay, she said. "These were times when she'd be past tears."

In spite of all the personal difficulty that Mrs. McInnis experienced in listening to the children's disclosures, she was still able to give them the love, care and sympathy that they desperately needed. In this way she was helping to revise the blighted view of human nature that the girls had learned from their harrowing experiences.

SATANIC CULTS

May 16, 1985, was a day of revelation for Catherine McInnis. The revelation came from her television set in the form of a documentary report about the victimization of children by satanic cults. This was the first time that she felt she was not the only person to have heard the kind of horror stories that her foster children had told her. She learned that other people all over North America would be receptive to what these children were saying and sympathetic to her own plight. With this reassurance, however, came the horror of learning that, while there were other similar victims and other similar crimes, what she had been hearing in her living room was possibly part of an evil and powerful conspiracy.

Until then Catherine had never taken any interest in the occult and knew virtually nothing of satanism. From listening to the children she was aware that some kind of ritual had been involved in the gruesome graveyard scenes that they described. From her readings of the Bible she knew that "666" was the number that would identify Satan; this was the mark of the beast according to the Book of Revelation. She noted with concern that the children would write that number in their coloring books, and was also worried by the references to witches and devils, dances, masks and costumes.

Drawing on a wealth of evidence and quoting reputable sources, the program described how links have been found all over North America between satanism and "perverse, hideous acts that defy belief. Suicides, murders and the ritualistic slaughter of children and animals. Yet so far police have been helpless."

The documentary cited records of more than 15,000 animal mutilations and the discovery of ritual sites where satanic paraphernalia were found; these included pictures of the devil, the inverted five-pointed satanic pentagram, the upside-down cross, the evil eye and references to "666."

After discussing a recent revival of interest in satanism in popular culture, referring to films such as Rosemary's Baby and The Exorcist, and the preponderance of satanic symbolism in heavy metal rock music, the program went on to explain that devil worshippers generally fall into three categories. The first was the "self-styled satanists," who are usually teenagers who dabble in satanism with the aid of such popular books as Anton LaVey's Satanic Bible. The second category was "religious satanists," who are members of LaVey's Church of Satan, or similar organizations that claim to eschew any illegal activity. The third group was "satanic cults," which, the program stated, appear to be "highly secretive groups, committing criminal acts, including murder."

With comments from police investigators, a psychiatrist, alleged victims and relatives of victims, the television report examined some of the characteristics of the kind of abuse that the cults allegedly inflict on children, who have a central role in their rituals. Sexual abuse, pornography and forcing children to eat feces and drink urine were described as key elements in the cults' systematic assault on children's morale and moral values, encouraging them to accept evil and degradation as natural. Child murders were described and it was said that children were forced to stick knives in the victims, and also forced to help kidnap victims by pretending to play with other children in order to lure them away. There were descriptions of cannibalism, and it was said that this and drinking human blood were integral parts of the rituals.

Police officers interviewed on the program said there was ample evidence that such groups exist and engage in these shocking practices. But they are so secretive and well-organized that they have so far defied any police attempts to gather concrete evidence of these activities. One former police chief said, "When you get into one of these groups, there's only a couple of ways you can get out. One is death. The other is mental institutions. Or third, you can't get out."

Enlightened, comforted and alarmed by all this, Catherine immediately phoned the local police. She testified that she talked to "one of the police officers working on the case, or not working on the case, and told him, 'Maybe the children got places mixed up, but I believe them, or I would not repeat what they said.'"

While the Hamilton police were apparently no more impressed with the information contained in the television program than they were with anything else that Mrs. McInnis had reported to them, background knowledge of satanic ritual abuse gleaned from this and many other sources did have a significant influence on social workers and psychiatrists who subsequently dealt with the children. It made them less inclined to dismiss the children's allegations as aberrant fantasies or weird distortions of some sordid but more mundane reality. What the children were saying fell squarely within the framework of the rapidly expanding knowledge of this new, disturbing phenomenon of ritual abuse. While such allegations may be extremely difficult to believe, and are even harder to accept, professionals working in the field of child abuse were beginning to find it impossible not to take them seriously. They were hearing about similar cases all over the continent, and many were encountering them in their own work.

In 1986 Catherine Gould, a clinical psychologist, published a list of symptoms of satanic ritual abuse that she observed in her work with abused preschool-age children in the Los Angeles area. This list of 29 symptoms included several that were relevant to Janis's and Linda's allegations and behavior. Dr. Gould notes that such children have a preoccupation with feces and urine, will talk about feces or urine on the face or in the mouth, will refer to it being smeared in the bathroom and frequently discuss these things at mealtimes. She said a consequent fear of the bathroom may make it difficult to toilet train such children. The list includes aggressive play, in which a child appears to enjoy hurting other children, a fear of ghosts and monsters and a fear of bad people taking the child away, breaking into the house or burning it down, or killing the child.

The symptoms also included references to mutilation, in which the child acts out severing, sawing off, twisting or pulling off body parts. Dr. Gould said these children will talk about animals being hurt or killed. They may also be preoccupied with death, sometimes asking if dead people are eaten, or if their death will occur at the age of six. The psychologist noted: "Questions are distinguishable from normal curiosity about death by their bizarre quality." She also referred to bizarre songs or chants, or ones that follow the "you-better-not-tell theme," numbers or letters always written backwards in the devil's alphabet, discussions about films or photographs being taken. She said children will also talk about scary costumes, and refer to television characters as real people, "because perpetrators take on names like Fred Flintstone so a child's disclosures will be dismissed as television-inspired fantasies."

Roland Summit, a California psychiatrist whose theories on how children disclose sexual abuse are world-renowned in the field and were referred to during the wardship hearing, has studied more than 40 cases that involve these ritual elements. He has noted that "another hallmark of whatever this is, or wherever it comes from, is the insertion of instruments such as sticks into bodies, and the use of narcotics and sedatives, usually used as a liquid, a pink liquid."

Dr. Summit, like several other child abuse experts who have become concerned by these reports, has been careful to avoid coming to any categorical conclusions—although many children in different places have said the same things, this does not prove the existence of satanic cults that are engaged in this kind of abuse. He has cautioned that as long as there is no concrete evidence of the existence of such groups, and no-one has come forward to say that they belonged to cults that committed such atrocities, one must keep an open mind and accept that there may be other explanations.

Although Dr. Summit has expressed an inclination to believe that there is truth in the numerous "dismally consistent" allegations, he has also warned that it may do a disservice to children to slavishly believe that everything they say is true. His concern has been that children's sincerity should be respected, that their disclosures should be heard without prejudice and that they should get the protection and therapy they need. Too often this does not happen, he said, because "these cases throw people into irrational kinds of prejudice. Some people believe it is true, and the world is going to be taken over by satanists. Other says 'It's too spooky, and it can't happen in this country.' They are likely to abandon the children, dismiss the case, and throw it out."

Many therapists in Canada and the United States have also reported detailed accounts of satanic rituals from a different source—adult survivors of child sexual abuse, who, during therapy sessions, remember details of past ritual abuse. Therapists who report such accounts are usually not child psychiatrists, and are therefore not necessarily familiar with the kinds of allegations that children have been making. However, the adults' accounts of abuse inflicted on them a generation ago often contain details of ritual, symbolism and abusive acts that are identical to those reported by children today.

One such survivor, a woman from Victoria, British Columbia, described in a 1980 book, Michelle Remembers, how she was subjected to abuse involving a dead bird, and forced to eat what she believed was human flesh during satanic ceremonies. She also remembered being put into a grave, and witnessing the sacrifice of children and the dismemberment of dead bodies. Lawrence Pazder, the psychiatrist who treated her and coauthored the book, has said that he has since worked with eight similar cases.

Victims of child abuse often deal with their traumatic memories by trying to shut them away in a separate compartment in their minds. In some extreme cases this attempt to seal off painful emotions and responses can lead to the development of a split personality. Psychiatrists who treat patients with multiple personality disorders frequently find that the illness is associated with a history of child abuse. A Chicago psychiatrist who noticed a high preponderance of reports of ritual abuse in the history of such patients conducted a survey in 1986 of 250 therapists working in this field, and discovered that about 25 percent of them had patients who said they were exposed to satanic rituals during childhood.

In Hamilton, Ontario, while the wardship hearing was in progress, at least four adults were involved in therapy sessions at which they discussed their memories of satanic ritual abuse. A former police matron in Kamloops, British Columbia, now working as a sexual assault counselor and involved with her tenth ritual abuse case, followed the Hamilton case with great interest and stated, "It is my belief that as more and more therapists acquire the skills to hear children and adults who have been sexually and physically abused, the more they will hear about the happenings of the cult-related assaults, which have a different set of problems for patients and therapists. I am grateful for the case in Hamilton getting out in the open, so that others, who have been assaulted as children in this manner, can get the courage to tell and not fear that they will be killed for doing so."

The many therapists and a handful of police investigators who have become convinced of the existence of secret and sadistic satanic cults tend to see this as a phenomenon that has existed in society since the Middle Ages. History is also invoked by those who maintain that the belief in satanic ritual abuse is a manifestation of a mass hysteria that was spread by gullible people obsessed with children's fantasies. They say that the recent spate of court cases dealing with children's allegations of ritual abuse resemble the witch-hunts of the 16th and 17th centuries in Europe and New England.

No matter what point of view one takes, the historical comparisons reveal striking similarities between the current concerns and the preoccupations of the past. According to historian Jeffrey Russell[7], the ritual murder of children, often accompanied by cannibalism, was one of the most common charges leveled against witches. Just as children were most often seen as the victims of witchcraft, they were also the source of many of the accusations against witches. A case in Salem, Massachusetts, in 1692 was a famous example of this: two small girls, who began exhibiting nervous symptoms after experimenting with divination, were subjected to intense questioning by doctors and other adults, and eventually made accusations against three women.

While many of the so-called confessions of witches were extracted under torture, and merely conformed to a formula predetermined by the inquisitors, there was evidence of some serious judicial attempts to discover the truth about witchcraft. One such hearing was a late 17th-century inquiry at the French court regarding allegations that Black Masses were being performed in aristocratic circles. Evidence was heard at this inquiry about the sexual abuse of children and the brutal murder of newborn babies, whose entrails were used in rituals that also involved cutting a bird's throat and collecting its blood in a goblet.[8]

To some people all this is evidence of the survival through the centuries of child-murdering satanic cults; to others it all represents archetypal human fantasies. Historian Norman Cohn maintains that scholars who consider that witchcraft allegations are indicative of the existence of some such cult are "grosslly underestimating the capacities of the human imagination."[9]

Sigmund Freud, before he discovered or invented the concept of such subconscious urges, recognized what he considered clear evidence of child sexual abuse that had been suffered by his female patients. He was also struck by the similarity between what these women told him and the accounts of the witchcraft confessions of the 16th century. He wrote in a January, 1897, letter to a colleague, "But why did the devil who took possession of the poor things invariably abuse them sexually and in a loathsome manner? Why are their confessions under torture so like the communications made by my patients in psychological treatment?"[10]

In the last few years, there has been a rash of cases all over North America in which adults have been prosecuted or children removed from their homes as a result of allegations from children. These allegations often include bizarre descriptions of murder, mutilation, bestiality, cannibalism and satanic ritual. In at least 40 places in the U.S., authorities have been grappling with children's allegations of ritual abuse. In California and Minnesota, in particular, a spate of highly controversial cases has sharply polarized public opinion.

In Manhattan Beach, California, in 1984, friends of the seven people accused in the notorious McMartin Preschool case took out newspaper advertisements that compared this case with the Salem witch trials; in this case there were accusations against the preschool operators and staff involving the alleged molestation of hundreds of children. The same comparison has been made in connection with a spate of cases in Bakersfield, California, and in Jordan, Minnesota, where 24 people were accused. Bizarre stories of rituals, murder, cannibalism, bestiality, pornography, eating feces and drinking urine, as well as extreme sexual abuse, were recurring themes in these cases, as they were in the other cases in different parts of the United States, and in the Hamilton case. One theory adopted by defense lawyers in most of these cases, and also advanced in Hamilton, is that child abuse professionals all over the continent are in the grip of a kind of mass hysteria that inspires them to coach children into making allegations—allegations that become more and more fantastic under the pressures of intensive questioning.

Ralph Underwager, a psychologist who has testified as an expert witness on behalf of defendants in many such cases in the United States, was sought as a witness by defense lawyers in the Hamilton case. However, he was not available until after the defense case was closed, and Judge Beckett refused to delay the trial in order to wait for his evidence. Dr. Underwager said in an interview that he has been involved in 28 cases where there was a similar progression in the development of allegations over time: "a pattern beginning with an initial statement from young children that somebody touched them, progressing to allegations of fondling, to penetration, to oral-genital contact, to monsters and strange bizarre behaviors, sometimes drug use, ritual behavior and murder of animals. It gets put together in allegations that children were murdered in cultic behavior."

This kind of material is present in the fantasy world of children, Underwager said, and comes out when gullible adults, predisposed to belief in a satanic conspiracy theory, delve into the children's fantasies, producing more and more allegations that they reinforce with their belief: "So you get police officers digging in backyards for bodies, looking for pornography, cultic objects. They have never been found. No empirical data for any of this material has ever been discovered." Mentioning the similarities between the cases in Jordan, Minnesota, and Salem, Massachusetts, Underwager said, "What we are trying to fight is stupidity on such a massive scale." He maintains that "adults who are true believers victimize children by subjecting them to pressure."

What this view fails to explain, however, is why the allegations that children are making in these circumstances are so strikingly similar in so many different and unrelated cases. In Salem the children had indeed been exposed to some voodoo practices by a Haitian nurse, who was the first person they accused, and the 17th-century religious and cultural climate was such that everyone was quite ready to accept that they had been involved in devil worship. But satanism is not a phenomenon that one would expect social workers and psychiatrists to readily give credence to in the late 20th century. It is also hard to understand why they would coach children to make allegations that would heap massive skepticism on their allegations of sexual abuse. Dr. Underwager and others who advance this theory make reference to the richness of children's fantasy world, but have so far failed to provide any detailed explanation of how young children can conjure up, from their imaginations, graphic and detailed accounts of ritual violence, accompanied by sexually explicit descriptions of abuse.

An alternative explanation that is advanced by some people who vigorously support the prosecution of cases like those in California and Minnesota is very disturbing. This theory is that groups of people in society either practice ritual child abuse or use the trappings of ritual to terrorize children, while forcing them to participate in pornography or group sex. This theory has been endorsed by police investigators in many parts of North America. Apart from the allegations of many hundreds of children and adult survivors of sexual abuse, the evidence is slim for any link between child abuse and satanic cult activities. The history and literature of satanic worship does, however, point to a tradition of child sacrifice, and a preoccupation with corrupting and degrading the innocence that children represent.

In recent years there has been considerable evidence of a burgeoning of interest in satanic worship in North America. It has been inspired perhaps by the decline in traditional belief and the need felt by many people for magic solutions to personal problems in an increasingly alienating and materialistic society. There has been a steady growth of such legal and ostensibly harmless groups as The Church of Satan, which boasted more than 10,000 members by the late 1970s. This is the largest of several satanic organizations in North America, and has chapters in Toronto and British Columbia. It was founded in San Francisco by Anton LaVey, a former lion trainer who played the part of the devil in the film Rosemary's Baby, one of a number of films that fostered popular interest in satanism during the past 20 years.

While The Church of Satan claims to have no involvement in any illegal activity, another satanic group, The Process, the Church of the Final Judgement, has enjoyed a less savory reputation. This cult made Toronto one of its headquarters in the mid-1970s, and its members occupied a house in the same inner-city neighborhood where Sharon, her brothers and sisters and Gordon Wells grew up. The Process achieved brief notoriety in Canada in 1971 when a Toronto newspaper revealed that this satanist group had been awarded a federal government Local Initiatives Program grant for a social service project in the city. It has since been disbanded, though former members in Toronto have recently been meeting again under the name New Cycle, and there is also believed to be a group of cult members living in Hamilton.

On a religious level The Process was an attempt to reconcile Christianity with satanism; it worshiped four deities, including Christ and Satan. It had an apocalyptic vision of the Last Judgement, and saw motorcycle gangs as an instrument that would bring about this plan of ultimate annihilation. A recent history of the cult, written by a sociologist who was a friend of its leaders, describes it as only indulging in violence at a rhetorical or philosophical level. This study conceded that the cult tended to recruit and appeal to very alienated and disturbed young people, and often had problems with its more sociopathic fringe members.[11] One person who said he was influenced by The Process was Charles Manson, who shared with this cult a preoccupation with the Book of Revelation and the satanic number 666, which was scrawled on the wall at the scene of the murder of Sharon Tate in California in 1969.

Satanic beliefs and practices have nothing in common with traditional pagan witchcraft, which has also seen a revival in the last 30 years, and is now being espoused by many feminists and radicals as a new ecological religion. The Encyclopedia of American Religions makes the point that there is distinction to be made between the public groups that adopt a satanist theology and "what are frequently termed the 'sickies.' There are disconnected groups of occultists who employ satan worship to cover a variety of sexual, sadomasochistic, clandestine, psychopathic and illegal activities. From these groups come grave robberies, sexual assaults and bloodletting (both animal and human). These groups are characterized by lack of theology, disconnectedness and short life, and informality of meetings. Usually they are discovered only in the incident which destroys them."[12]

Heavy metal rock music and videos by bands such as Ozzy Osbourne, Motley Crüe, Venom and Slayer celebrate violence and frequently use satanist symbolism. They have helped spur the current high level of interest among teenagers in this aspect of the occult. Richard Ramirez, a 25-year-old serial killer known as the Night Stalker and a self-styled satanist, was heavily influenced by an album called Highway to Hell, by AC/DC, a band whose name is seen by its satanist followers as meaning Antichrist/Devil Child. In July, 1984, a Long Island teenager was fatally stabbed 17 times in what his murderers admitted was a satanic cult ritual, and one of the killers, also a teenager, subsequently hung himself in jail.

Paperback copies of LaVey's Satanic Bible and Satanic Rituals have been found on the shelves of many recent teen suicides. In April, 1987, there were media reports of two such cases, one in Sackville, Nova Scotia, and one in Kitchener, Ontario. The father of the boy in the Kitchener case was quoted as saying that he was told that there are satanist followers in almost every school in the Kitchener area. Charles McLeod, of the Cult Project in Montreal, said in an interview that such a claim is quite realistic and would probably be true of any urban center in Canada. "LaVey's book has probably done far more harm than he has," said McLeod.

A teenager who killed three people in Toronto in 1985 was preoccupied with satanism, and, in the same year, police in Chatham, Ontario, reported concern about the presence of satanist material at the home of a young man suspected of murder in that city. In 1985 in Valleyfield, Quebec, satanic literature was found at the home of a man who killed, dismembered and burned a pregnant woman. A Halifax prostitute was killed in 1986 with a knife on which the number 666 was displayed. Many similar cases have been documented in the United States. Throughout Canada and the U.S. there have been persistent reports in recent years of animal mutilations and vandalism, especially at graves and mausoleums, that have been interpreted as being connected with satanic rituals. In 1986 the small country town of Delhi, Ontario, was put into a panic by some teenagers' disclosures that they had participated in satanic rituals allegedly involving animal sacrifices in a barn. A local priest counseled the youths, who had been frightened by their own experiments in the occult, and the barn was subsequently burned down by an arsonist.

Early in 1987 police in Verdun, Quebec, investigated reports of a satanic gang that, according to McLeod, "supposedly uses a lot of satanist insignia (tattoos, etc.), uses ten-year-old girls in Black Masses and recruits them into child prostitution." McLeod said local people who had publicly protested the activities of this gang were subsequently harassed by someone who painted the number 666 on their houses. The police investigation was inconclusive. McLeod said he was also concerned about a Montreal-based organization called Continental Association of Satan's Hope (CASH), which mails out material promising that satanic magic can bring financial success.

Santeria, a Cuban cult derived from voodoo, has also been associated with the use of children in violent rituals. There have been reports in the Toronto area of rituals involving chickens, which are said to resemble the practices of this cult. A gruesome discovery made at Chicago's O'Hare airport in October, 1984, was drawn to the attention of people investigating the Hamilton case. Police at the airport becamse suspicious of a package that had arrived on a freight flight from Miami. The package was opened and contained what was apparently a dead fetus, a human skull, wooden sticks, some dead birds and two Halloween masks. Miami police were consulted about this discovery and a specialist from Miami told the Chicago police that these were things usually used in Santeria rituals.

There have been some successful prosecutions in the United States of child sexual abuse cases involving ritual elements. In Malden, Massachusetts, there were allegations of sex in "magic" secret rooms—adults dressed as clowns, still and video photography (of which no evidence was found), and stories of ritual slayings of small animals. A jury, however, convicted a day-care center operator, largely on the evidence of sexual abuse, after hearing the testimony of nine children. Jurors subsequently said in interviews with John Novak, of the Malden Evening News, that they believed the kids were telling the truth, and that they couldn't have been describing oral sex out of thin air. In Miles, Michigan, the proprietor of a preschool was convicted of abuse involving satanic activity.

The most notable of the successful prosecutions was in Miami, Florida, where the owners of a baby-sitting service in an exclusive suburban neighborhood were accused of multiple counts of child molestation. As in the Hamilton case, there had been allegations of pornography, but a van load of material was spirited away just before a search warrant was executed, and no evidence of pornography was found. Children alleged that they had been drugged and then forced to drink urine and eat feces. They also said they had been sexually abused. Allegations involving costumes and incantations were downplayed at the trial, which resulted in a sentence of six consecutive life imprisonment terms against the male proprietor, and a light sentence for his young wife, who testified against him. It is interesting to note that psychiatrist Lee Coleman, who testified for the defense in this trial, still maintains that there was no evidence against the accused. This is in spite of the fact that the court was overwhelmingly convinced by the testimony of the proprietor's wife, evidence of allegations made by anguished and fearful children and the fact that the proprietor's eight-year-old son suffered from gonorrhea of the throat.[13]

Dr. Coleman, one of the leading lights of the campaign against such prosecutions, challenges the interviewing techniques employed by child sexual abuse specialists. He claims that these techniques are leading and manipulative. This raises a crucial issue—one that the courts are continually forced to grapple with. Roland Summit, who advocates passionately on behalf of sexually abused children, and is often called as a prosecution witness in such cases, maintains that it is necessary to reassure the children that it is good to tell the truth and that they have nothing to fear from doing so. The kind of positive reinforcement that he considers necessary to gain the confidence of a child is seen by Dr. Coleman as a kind of emotional blackmail.

This debate often focuses on two issues, both of which were referred to frequently in the Hamilton case. The first is the myth that children never lie about sexual abuse. Dr. Coleman maintains that this is Dr. Summit's position, and takes every opportunity to ridicule it. Summit has stated that very few children, perhaps two or three in a thousand, have ever been found to exaggerate or to invent claims of sexual molestation. He says he is not advocating slavish belief in children's allegations, but rather that their statements be taken seriously and not automatically dismissed as fantasy as has often happened in the past.

The second of these issues is Summit's child sexual abuse accommodation syndrome, a theory that accounts for the pressures on children not to disclose abuse suffered from a family member, and often retract their truthful disclosures because of feelings of fear or helplessness. Coleman sees this as a "Catch 22": when children disclose, they are telling the truth and when they later say that it was not true, they are lying. Summit's observations about the difficulty that children have in disclosing abuse explain the gradual process by which a child will begin with a relatively simple and minor revelation, and gradually work up to taking about the more extreme and traumatic forms of abuse that they have suffered. This progression, which is present in nearly all sexual abuse cases, is often cited by defense lawyers as further evidence that allegations have been drawn out of children by manipulative interviewers.

All these issues came into play in Minnesota and California. The extravagance of many of the children's allegations, the almost fanatical zeal with which the prosecutions were undertaken, the almost total absence of corroborating evidence, and a polarized and hysterical public reaction to the cases, all contributed to making the cases spectacular disasters that wreaked havoc on the lives of everyone involved in them. In the McMartin case hundreds of children became embroiled in an investigation that became completely unhinged as children started to make more and more bizarre claims—they talked about being taken to exotic locations, caverns, tunnels and, in one case, a house where there were lions in the basement. The children's allegations, which had previously concentrated on sexual abuse at the preschool, had also included ingestion of feces and urine and the murder of babies.

The investigation appeared to have been hopelessly compromised from the very beginning because police had sent out a letter to all parents with children at the school asking them if their children had complained of abuse. A judge had found enough evidence, however, to commit five people for trial after a lengthy preliminary hearing. However, the case had also become the subject of a political controversy. A newly elected Los Angeles district attorney withdrew most of the charges, blaming social workers and their suggestive questioning of children for the collapse of the case.

A similar sequence of events unfolded in Bakersfield, California, where children and parents have continued to make allegations about satanic sacrifices after a series of court cases in which four defendants were convicted and sentenced to a combined 1,000 years in jail. Another related case was dismissed, and charges were dropped against several other defendants. The judge who dismissed the second case, involving 130 molestation counts, took this step after learning that the children, who had alleged satanist human sacrifices as well as sexual abuse, had not been allowed to be examined by defense doctors. This issue surfaced in the Hamilton case when defense lawyers were denied access to the children for psychiatric examination, and their motion for a further independent assessment of the girls was denied. In Bakersfield a 1986 grand jury expressed concern about what they considered obvious mishandling of the children, who were denied interaction with members of their family and had excessive exposure to law enforcement investigators.

In Sacramento, California, allegations of sadistic child pornography were heard when two groups of children testified that they watched other children killed and multilated while cameras were moving. One of these children said he was forced to participate in the murders. But a judge dismissed charges at a preliminary hearing, ruling that a grandmother had, through persistent questioning, led two girls to believe they had been molested. The judge described the grandmother as "totally obsessed with matters sexual." Connections were inevitably made in the media between this finding and attacks made by defense lawyers and witnesses in one of the Bakersfield cases against another grandmother, who had been one of the people who instigated police investigations. This woman had previously been labeled as obsessive about molestation, and was placed in a locked psychiatric ward after threatening to kill her husband. A defense psychiatrist maintained that she "seems to have presented her own time bomb of psychological explosions in response to every real or imagined revelation by the minors."

In Jordan, Minnesota, sexual abuse charges against 22 people were dropped after an investigation failed to find evidence of ritual murder and pornography. The case, which had begun with sexual abuse charges against one man who had a prior criminal record for sexual assault, had expanded to place 15 families under a cloud of suspicion, and remove 25 children from their homes. Children's allegations included sexual games in concert with adults and other children, killing of animals, eating of feces and the murder of children. Investigators had been horrified by the realistic detail of the children's stories; they were considered so striking that police officers concluded that the descriptions of murders must be authentic.

Once again no evidence was found. Some children retracted or changed their stories, and conflicts arose between different agencies that became involved in the case. A report by Minnesota's attorney general concluded that, because of inadequacies in the way the cases were investigated and prosecuted, "it is impossible to determine whether such abuse actually occurred, and if it did, who may have done these acts." The report stated that children were questioned too often, by too many people, with insufficient reporting and exchange of information on the part of investigators. It noted that suspects were seldom interviewed, or their backgrounds investigated prior to charges being laid, and concluded, "The haste with which charges were brought often precluded a search for corroborating physical evidence. Surveillance techniques were not utilized. Search warrants were rarely obtained."

While no-one accused the Hamilton police of proceeding too hastily with their investigation, they were criticized, like their counterparts in Minnesota, for a lack of surveillance, a failure to obtain search warrants in order to interview people at the earliest opportunity and failure to check into the background of alleged perpetrators. Defense lawyers attempted unsuccessfully to suggest that the way the children were interviewed in the Hamilton case was leading and suggestive and the methods used were similar to those used in the American cases.

The failure of many of the ritual abuse cases in the United States not only tended to discredit investigators and child abuse specialists who believe children's accounts of such abuse, but also caused massive disruptions in the lives of the children, whom the authorities had set out to protect. In the light of these experiences, Roland Summit, who has followed these cases more closely than any other expert in the child abuse field, has become wary of the criminal justice system as an avenue for pursuing such potentially explosive allegations. He advised child care workers attending a conference on sexual abuse in Toronto in March, 1987, that it may be better not to reveal allegations of ritual abuse until very thorough investigation and surveillance has been undertaken. He added that such bizarre, though convincing, allegations leave child care workers like the protagonist in a science fiction novel who wants to put the town under guard because of an alien threat: "We may think there's an urgent need for the children to be protected, but we can't promise to provide it."

The Hamilton wardship hearing perhaps provides an answer to Dr. Summit's fears, by showing that it is possible to respond to bizarre stories of ritual abuse in a way that can protect the children while subjecting their allegations to public scrutiny. The allegations made by Janis and Linda were strikingly similar in many ways to those made by other children thousands of miles away. The response of authorities to their story was similar in many respects, but the court case that resulted from all this was fundamentally different. It centered around what solution would be in the best interests of the children, and it provided a forum for a detailed examination of all the facts of the case, without either suppressing the more bizarre aspects of the children's story or chasing off after them into some tangent, where the basic issues of child abuse and neglect could get lost. The 18-month-long hearing was widely criticized for its length and exorbitant cost. It did not provide all the answers to the questions it posed, but it could serve as a model for a cool and levelheaded approach to a volatile issue.

The Hamilton case had the advantage of being a family court hearing, where the emphasis was directed less towards proving or disproving the strange allegations than to deciding what custody and access arrangements would be in the best interests of the children. The Ontario Child Welfare Act and the rules of the Unified Family Court, where a district court judge presided over a variety of family and juvenile cases, also allowed for plenty of latitude in dealing with such material as hearsay evidence of children's statements, videotapes of interviews and therapy sessions and expert opinions. With a presiding judge who was clearly personally distressed by the trauma that the children appeared to be suffering and deeply committed to the pursuit of truth in the matter, the hearing soon turned into perhaps the most careful and comprehensive examination of a case of ritual abuse ever undertaken.

CHAPTER 9

THE "PLAN" AND ITS AFTERMATH

It was just after Victoria Day, Firecracker Day as the children called it, that life in the McInnis home was disrupted with an explosion of fear.

The children had spent the holiday weekend with their father. Catherine McInnis admitted when she testified in court that she had used very poor judgement in allowing the children to go off on this visit; she had not informed the Children's Aid Society of all that the children had told her about their father. She had explained her reasons for withholding this information, but could not justify continuing to do so when she knew they were going to be spending three days with a man whom she believed to be a murderer and a satanist.

Gordon Wells had promised to bring his daughters back to the foster home at about 6 P.M. on the Monday evening, and Catherine had begun to worry about them when they had still not appeared by nine o'clock. Their father, however, did phone soon after nine to say that he would have them home in about an hour. Both Catherine and her daughter testified that they felt there was something a little disturbing about his behavior when he arrived with the girls at about 10 P.M. They said he came into the kitchen with a package of sparklers and a bag of cereal he had brought for the children, and then paced nervously about, peering through the door into the living room. Catherine offered him some tea, which he declined, saying he had a toothache. She said she then looked casually out of the door, which he left open, and, as soon as she did this, the man left hurriedly.

After their father left the girls mentioned something about a plan, and then began crying. Catherine said the children said strange things to her that night like, "I love you. I love you. I wish I had a thousand dollars. I don't know what I'd buy you. I love you. You're so good."

Catherine said the girls made similar comments the next morning, and talked to one another about a plan while they were waiting for a visit from Lesley Morgan, the social worker. The foster mother observed that they seemed reluctant to talk to Lesley and acted strangely while she was there. They told Ms. Morgan that they were soon going to live with their father in Toronto. Catherine noted that, while they had previously expressed hatred when they spoke of Gary, their mother's boyfriend, that morning they kept saying things like, "I like Gary. Gary is a nice boy."

When Ms. Morgan left, the children started screaming and crying and holding on to Catherine. She said they asked loudly, "Why does Mom think you're so bad? Why does she hate you? Nobody was ever so good to us. This is such a safe place. Your kids are so nice. Why does Mom hate you?"

Then, to the foster mother's great surprise and consternation, they told her that Gary and their mother and father had all come to Catherine's house a week or ten days before, while Catherine's daughter Mary was having a party. They had come and listened at the windows, the girls said, and Sharon had actually slipped into the house. Catherine said she recalled getting up one morning, at about that time, and thinking it rather strange that the double windows and the screen were wide open.

Catherine testified about the girls' description of this incident, and was unable to resist injecting a little sarcasm into her account: "She came in the bedroom, and she had a big knife. She held it at Linda's neck—something that, by now, Linda should have been used to. She said, 'You have a big mouth. You tell Catherine everything.

You tell one more word, and I will stick this through your neck.' She stuck pins in a Cabbage Patch doll, and said 'That is what I'm going to do to Catherine with the knife.' She took the box that the Cabbage Patch doll came in, and, with a pencil, poked out the eyes and made holes in it. 'That's what I'm going to do to Catherine with the knife. You don't tell anybody about what I do. It's none of your business.'"

The court was shown a green box with a picture of a doll printed on it. The box was punctured by a series of holes on the face and body of the printed doll. Catherine testified that the girls produced this box from their bedroom, and told her again how their mother had threatened, "I'll poke her all over with the knife, where she'll never talk again." Catherine said Linda demonstrated by poking two holes in the leg of the printed outline of the doll.

Catherine testified that as Linda did this she said, "We will have to help kill you. We always have to stick knives in people they kill. We'll just stick a knife in your foot. I don't know why Mom says you're so bad. She said she is going to cut out your mouth, dig out your eyes. I couldn't dig out your eyes, Catherine, but we will have to stick knives in you."

The foster mother said the children then told her about the plan that they had heard their mother, Gary and their father making over the weekend. Their mother was not supposed to be present when they were on an access visit with their father, but they assured Catherine that she had been there, and had made soft chocolate cookies. They told Catherine that the three adults had talked about killing Catherine and her whole family. The girls said the plan was that, when their dad brought them back to Catherine's house after the weekend, Gary and their mother would be hiding in the car. Catherine said the girls told her that everyone in the house was to be killed "and then they'll cut you all up and they'll set fire to the house."

Catherine said that the children warned everyone in the house not to go outside, because they were afraid their father would run them over with his car. The foster mother's own children testified that they had never seen the girls so terrified. Impressed by this show of fear, and knowing much of what the girls had said already, the whole family believed that they were indeed under an imminent threat.

When Catherine was later cross-examined by Arthur Brown, Sharon's lawyer, she explained that some details of what happened that day had escaped her memory: "A plan to carve, and cook, and hand you and your family out to cannibals, doesn't do a lot for your memory. I shook for days. I couldn't write what I wanted to put down."

Mr. Brown ridiculed this fear, noting that there were six people in the house, which was located in a well-populated suburban neighborhood. He said the foster mother should have realized that what the girls described to her was "a completely fantastic childlike scheme."

"I did not see it as a childlike scheme," said Catherine. "Nor did those terrified, shaking children. They were well aware what their mother and father and Gary could do. Six people wouldn't be any match against three people very good with knives."

When Mr. Brown questioned her skeptically about the story of Sharon appearing in the children's bedroom, Catherine responded with heavy sarcasm. Mr. Brown asked how Catherine thought the children's mother might have gained entry to the house, and the foster mother replied: "I think she came in the window. Unless she slithered under the door."

After hearing the girls' story about the plan, Catherine called the Children's Aid Society. Ms. Morgan was not there, and, not wanting to have to tell anyone else about what was happening, Catherine decided to wait until Ms. Morgan was able to come to the house in the evening. She said she didn't call the police because she didn't think they would believe her. When Ms. Morgan arrived, Catherine and the children were so relieved that they ran up the driveway to meet her. When she had been told about the plan, Lesley phoned her supervisor, who then called the police. Eventually a police officer, Sergeant Bruce Elwood, came to the house. Catherine said, "I remember I was so thrilled to think somebody came, and I had a chance to tell someone."

Sgt. Elwood, who was the first police officer to actually interview the children, had not been involved in the case before. He was an experienced officer of the old school, clean-cut, conservative and mild-mannered. He told the court that he responded to the call he received from the Children's Aid Society, but "I found all that I was being told very hard to believe. I was very skeptical of what was being said—children being killed, cannibalism—I found it very hard to believe."

He asked to talk to the children separately, and testified that Linda told him she overheard her mother and father talking about killing the McInnis family. He said, "She kept referring to it as 'the plan.' At one point she saw my notebook, and said, 'My daddy has a notebook like that, and he put the plan into it.' She was talking of friends of hers that had been killed, that were gone.

"I felt I should stay there until I had a better grasp of the situation. They had towels over the sheer [drapes]. Mrs. McInnis said she was not going to bed. It looked like a household where everyone was going to stay up all night. I felt, under the circumstances, I should stay."

He interviewed Janis and he said, "After much coaxing suddenly she seemed to relax, and she began speaking of a graveyard where ten kids were buried, about her father having a mask and a picture of the devil. I was shown a picture that Janis had drawn of a graveyard. She said, 'You pulled into a parking area. You have to go over the bridge through a wooded area. Kids are buried in a circle.' I asked her who the kids were. She said she could write down one of the names. She wrote 'Billy.'"

Janis wrote on an envelope, which she gave to Sgt. Elwood, "Dad kild Karen." The policeman asked her to draw him a sad picture and a happy picture. She drew a picture of a man with one of his hands between the legs of a smaller person. She told him that it showed her dad putting his fingers in her. She had drawn smiles on the faces but then changed them into glum faces, saying, "It's not a happy picture. It's a sad picture."

Sgt. Elwood stayed for several hours talking to the children and Mrs. McInnis. He told the court, "After speaking with the children, I cannot explain or understand how both tell such details of bizarre happenings. I find it very difficult to understand how a young child could be so consistent with the same stories. What impressed me more than anything was how normal childhood conversations would lapse into other subjects without prompting. I find it hard to understand how these children were not telling the truth."

He phoned Sgt. Bowen at about 11:30 that evening and strongly suggested that he should come to the house. He said that Bowen stated that there was nothing he could do that Elwood had not already done, and refused to come. Bowen then phoned Lesley Morgan and told her that he didn't believe anything the children were saying.

Sgt. Elwood phoned Sgt. Gruhl. He said that the McInnises were very level-headed people, who were not known to be alarmist. Sgt. Elwood was not able to stay any longer. Before he left the house, however, he requested that Sgt. Gruhl order the officers on the beat to do some additional patrols of the area that night. He later wrote a strongly worded report in which he recommended further police investigation, and that the children's father and mother and Gary Evans all be advised that the police had been informed of the allegations.

Sgt. Bowen responded sarcastically in his report: "Suddenly now the children report that their father is involved in the mass killing of babies. They prove they are telling the truth by urinating in fear as they tell the story. We do not believe what they say, because of the stories they have told us that are untrue."

He later explained to the court that the untrue stories he was referring to related to the murder of children, and to the man with a son called Billy, who was supposed to be the superintendent of the apartment building where the girls used to live. The police had checked at the building and discovered that the superintendent was not dead, and did not have a son named Billy. They also ran a computer check on missing persons; there were no missing children who had names similar to those mentioned by the girls, and who the girls had claimed were dead. He said he was also skeptical about the alleged plot because "from what we knew about the relationship between Gary Evans and Gordon Wells, we didn't for a minute suspect they would join forces to do anything."

Sgt. Bowen agreed that if he had gone to the McInnis home the night "the plan" was reported, he might have obtained some first-hand information from the children—but he said that he had other priorities that night. He said he and his partner did drive by the McInnis home several times during the night, and saw nothing suspicious. He said he had been busy investigating an assault on a witness in a murder case.

Judge Beckett questioned Sgt. David Broom closely, asking why the girls' father was not interviewed immediately when these new allegations surfaced. "I am curious to know," he said, "why you took from May 23 to July 5 to interview an accused person in a sexual abuse case."

The sergeant replied, "We were required to work on other duties. Maybe the frustration of investigation was dwelling on us at this point."

The judge pursued the issue: "You had a brand-new lead: allegations of sexual abuse, wearing a mask, a picture of the devil. All those allegations are extremely serious, if true. They were made to Sgt. Elwood, an experienced officer whose opinion you would rely upon."

Sgt. Broom responded, "Our superiors told us to stop the investigation for a while."

Catherine told the court: "When Sgt. Elwood left, we just cuddled together in the kitchen like scared rabbits. I had the same feeling as if we were in some remote area like New Guinea, where you don't have protection of any kind."

The next day the Children's Aid Society decided to move the whole family to the Holiday Inn for a few days to insure their protection. Before they left, there was a phone call from Gordon Wells. Catherine said she told him, "Your wife and her boyfriend were in my house last week." She said the girls' father replied, "Oh my wife would never do that." She let Linda talk to her father but had to cut her off when the child started to say, "We're going away on a trip."

The McInnis family stayed in the hotel until they could make arrangements for new security measures at their home. When they returned, however, it would be without the foster children.

At the hotel the girls continued to talk about the murder and cannibalism and the plot to kill the McInnis family. One day in the restaurant Linda had a steak-on-a-bun meal. Catherine and Grace both described how the child took a bit of the meat and then said, "I can't eat her. I can't eat this because she's sad, her face is so sad. She didn't want to die. She is crying. She didn't want to just be meat. They killed her. They'll kill us too. When they feel like it, they'll kill everyone."

On the children's menu at the restaurant there was a cartoon with a picture of someone holding a shovel. Catherine said the children told her, "That's the shovel they take to the graveyard."

Catherine heard from neighbors that a suspicious car had been seen around her house after they left. The police were asked to check this out, but did not find anything that caused them to be concerned.

While they were at the hotel, Catherine came to a painful decision. Her whole family had been badly shaken by the threat on their lives. She was afraid that as long as the children remained in her home they were all in danger, and she felt that the worry would prevent her giving the children the care and attention that they needed. After consulting with her husband and daughters and CAS representatives, Catherine decided that she had to ask that the children be moved to another foster home. She sat down with Linda and Janis and told them, "You know we love you, and we really like you. But because of the danger, and because of the plan you told us about, you have to be moved so that you can be safe somewhere."

Catherine sadly explained to the court how "Janis kept saying, 'I thought you would never tell anyone the things we told you.' I said, 'I have to tell, to make the world safer so that all of those things won't happen to little children.' She seemed to block out the real reason. She was angry at me. She said you just don't want us."

Janis and Linda were moved to a new foster home on May 24, 1985. Catherine never saw them or talked to them again. The girls never subsequently spoke ill of their first foster mother, although they continued to harbor a deep resentment over what they considered a rejection and a betrayal from the only person they had ever trusted.

After they were moved to their new foster home, the children continued to make disturbing disclosures. Their new foster parents, Helen and Stanley Kovaks, were down-to-earth country people, who started off being extremely skeptical of the girls' stories and usually tried to discourage them from talking about such things. For a long time they were afraid to take Linda to visit their friends and acquaintances, fearing that the child would blurt out, "My mom put her finger in me."

The Kovakses wanted to believe that their simple way of life and the caring environment they provided for the girls would soon dispel what they thought were morbid fantasies. But they soon found that, in spite of their disbelief, they were having to wrestle with the suspicion that the children were telling the truth. They were concerned by Linda's lack of modesty, the way she would often lie on the floor and spread her legs widely. One day they were disturbed to discover Janis lying on top of Linda, kissing her younger sister on the mouth and neck.

The foster parents were mystified by the way the younger child associated her father with the devil. She told them, "When he dies he will go to the devil." They were alarmed one day when Linda watched Mr. Kovaks use a knife to cut a melon and remarked, "That's smaller than the knife my dad used to kill little Elizabeth. She's buried in a never-ending graveyard." On another occasion the foster parents were out with the children and they drove by a graveyard. Janis started talking about skeletons, and asked Mrs. Kovaks if she had ever seen bones on shelves.

The incident that convinced Stan Kovaks that the girls might be telling the truth also involved a knife. It was a big curved knife that he used for cutting bush. Janis saw it lying around one day and said, "You wouldn't kill us with that, Uncle Stan?" Mr. Kovaks later testified that he saw sincerity and real terror in the child's face that day. "I knew then they had really gone through something," he told the court. "I figure now a lot of it has happened. It's awful hard to believe."

Stanley Kovaks said Janis had a way of staring that looked as if "someone has scared her half to death, or she's thinking of something that happened." He said Linda did the same thing sometimes: "Her face will screw up. She opens her mouth. Her tongue hangs out, and, if she's eating, she'll have food fall out of her mouth."

Just before she was due to testify at the wardship hearing, several months after the court case began, Mrs. Kovaks sat down with the girls individually and asked them to tell her what they could remember about what had happened to them before. Linda told her that her dad had killed two people and her mom had killed seven people. She spoke about the abuse with the bird, and the killing of Elizabeth. She said that her mom killed children in the basement of their house in Hamilton, laid them on the floor and would then clean up the blood with a cloth. There was a space under the basement steps where Linda said she used to keep her bike so it wouldn't get blood on it. She repeated the allegations of pornography at Channel 11 and talked about the Blob, saying that "he's dead now," and that Daddy killed him.

Janis also talked about the bird and the other sexual abuse allegations. She said her father had killed five girls and her mother had killed five boys. She said, "They took their heads off." She talked about the killing of Elizabeth and murders in the apartment in Toronto, where she said her mother would clean up the mess with paper towels and then throw them in the garbage. Like her sister, Janis spoke about the Blob and the Channel 11 allegations. She drew a picture of the graveyard, and talked about going there with bodies in the back of Gary's car.

"I thought it was hard to believe. But, when a little child tells you the same thing over and over, I believe she has experienced some of it or seen it," Mrs. Kovaks said.

Mrs. McInnis's ordeal was not over when she reluctantly concluded that Janis and Linda should be moved out of her home. A cruel trick of fate embroiled her in a similar case that led the court to conduct a further probe into her sanity and credibility. For several months after she parted with Janis and Linda, Mrs. McInnis had not felt able to take any new foster children. However, when a CAS social worker appealed to her in November, 1985, to take in some very difficult children who were in a state of great distress, she agreed to do so.

The two children, Lorne and Mary, were slightly older than Janis and Linda, but both under ten years old. They had apparently suffered a lifetime of abuse in a transient family that was involved with motorcycle gangs. They had come to the attention of the Children's Aid Society as the family moved from one community to another. Their father, who had served a prison term for assault with a deadly weapon, once threatened the CAS with his biker connections. The Hamilton-Wentworth CAS sent the children to Catherine McInnis because she was particularly adept at dealing with problem children. No-one at the agency could possibly have foreseen that these children would begin to relate, to the foster mother, stories of sexual abuse, murder, cannibalism, sodomy and bestiality that were similar to the allegations made by Janis and Linda.

The startling revelation that the same foster mother was reporting similar bizarre statements from a second pair of children seemed, at first, to present the easy solution that defense lawyers and many observers were hoping for—that the foster mother was obviously crazy. Although the allegations of Lorne and Mary were to be the subject of a separate Crown wardship hearing, some of the evidence in their case was presented to Judge Beckett during the Wells hearing in order to shed light on Mrs. McInnis's credibility.

This trial within a trial showed that the second pair of children made similar statements, sometimes with more detail, to several people besides Mrs. McInnis. Judge Beckett said that after hearing this evidence he was "satisfied Mrs. McInnis was truthful in her evidence concerning this other case." The court did not probe further into the new allegations, to answer the question of whether or not this was another disturbing case of satanic ritual abuse. If it were, it would clearly give credence to Janis's and Linda's stories, and would corroborate, to an alarming degree, the suggestion that there is some kind of satanic cult practicing murder and violent ritual in southern Ontario. However, evidence from an unrelated case was only admissible insofar as it shed light on the credibility of a witness.

There was also another quite feasible explanation for Lorne's and Mary's stories—that these disturbed children had somehow found out about Mrs. McInnis's involvement in the case of Janis and Linda, which was at that time already being publicized by the media, and had engaged in a very sick joke. After Mrs. McInnis had testified about the new foster children's stories, Judge Beckett asked if it had ever occurred to her that she had been set up. She replied that she had wondered about this, but came to believe the children's stories of satanic ritual. "In my wildest imagination I would have never thought that in a lifetime I would have been connected with it again," she said. The judge later told defense lawyers that the issue was Mrs. McInnis's credibility, not her gullibility.

While the allegations that gave rise to these speculations were, in many respects, similar to those of Janis and Linda, there were many crucial differences. The children themselves were very different. For all the dreadful experiences they had to relate, Janis and Linda had maintained a quality of innocence. They seemed to be basically sweet little children, deeply traumatized, but sensitive and sincere. Mrs. McInnis said she also came to like Lorne and Mary, but they were definitely street-wise kids.

Lorne and Mary talked about other children being killed, tortured and cut up with a saw. They spoke about eating raw chicken and drinking its blood, going to a graveyard, wearing masks and costumes, dancing, singing, killing people and sharing out flesh to eat and take home in bowls. They talked about a man with a camera, and described going across the U.S. border from Windsor, Ontario, where they used to live, to find victims. They said the man with the camera liked to kill and eat people, and was called "Camera Man." The children said they had to help lure children into being kidnapped by playing games with them. They also described bestiality and went into graphic details about "sex and slaughter sessions," which, Mrs. McInnis said, contained "brutality beyond description." She said the children told her things "that would curl the paint off the walls."

Catherine observed that, unlike Janis and Linda, these new children "never cried and never showed emotion. They would laugh a rather nervous laugh when they spoke about people begging for their lives, and how scared the children are when they see the saw."

These children did not seem to have anything like the same reticence as Janis and Linda when disclosing the alleged atrocities. Some of the things that Lorne and Mary said appeared glib and childish; however, they contained some grotesque elements that had never surfaced in the Wells children's allegations. Some of the more believable details in Lorne's and Mary's stories were related in a subsequent interview with a police officer. This helped the court reach the conclusion that, whether or not the children were telling the truth, they had indeed told Mrs. McInnis what she said they had told her. Defense lawyers who tried to challenge the foster mother's evidence on this did not later question her credibility in their final submissions to the judge.

Catherine McInnis described to the court the turmoil that these new children's allegations put her in. She said she told her husband one night, "I'm in an awful mess. I don't know what to do. I'm certainly not going to tell everybody this happened to me again." She said her husband told her, "You have to do what's right." She said she consulted Ms. Morgan and explained to her that she was afraid, because "I felt people thought I was crazy for the first time." She asked that Lorne and Mary be removed as soon as possible so they could make their disclosures to somebody else. She asked Ms. Morgan to be discreet about her involvement, because "I didn't want anybody to know that I had children telling me anything as bizarre as this again. I was afraid what people would think."

Lorne's and Mary's allegations were more detailed and specific than those of Janis and Linda in their references to satanism and ritual. In describing what happened at the graveyard, Mary said, "We twirl and dance. Big people swing each other. We sing, 'The devil is good.' We sing how nice Satan is, that he's so good and smart."

They talked about people dressing up as devils and witches, and spoke of the Prince of Power. They described burning candles, and putting needles in a doll before burying it. They said they were made to drink a mixture of blood, wine and urine; this is a known satanist ritual that parodies the Christian Eucharist. The children told the foster mother that a teenage girl involved in these rituals said, "God is a dumbbell, stupid and I hate his guts." They described another person singing, "Jesus humps everyone, poisons everyone." One of the children once told Catherine, "I hate Jesus 'cause I know he's bad. Jesus is ugly."

While it was hard to believe all that these children said, it seemed quite likely that they had been exposed to some quite bizarre practices. In a statement that ominously echoed comments made by Janis and Linda, Mary quoted a man, who, from her descriptions, appeared to be the leader of the group of people engaging in these rituals: "Mike says nobody will ever catch them. They know what they are doing."

Mike may well have been right. It was certainly not the job of Judge Beckett's court to try to catch them. Once the judge had decided that Mrs. McInnis's credibility had not been impugned in any way, the parallel story of Lorne and Mary would no longer play a part in the case of Janis and Linda. However, when Mr. Wells later mentioned that his wife had once taken Janis and Linda to visit an uncle in Windsor, the scene of the other children's alleged abuse, several people involved in the case began to speculate, albeit with flimsy evidence, that there may be some link between these two similar accounts of savage rituals.

PART THREE

THE INVESTIGATIONS

CHAPTER 10

POLICE INVOLVEMENT

The investigation of child sexual abuse involves many sensitive and complex problems, and requires the involvement of specialists in several different fields. It can be seen as a social problem, a crime, a disease, or all three at once. Depending on how the situation is perceived, the goal of an investigation might be protecting the children, preserving the family, punishing the offender or getting medical treatment for the perpetrator and the victim. Usually these goals coalesce, but sometimes they come into conflict. This is why it is generally recognized that good communication and teamwork between social agencies, doctors, police and prosecutors is essential in sexual abuse cases.

Rather than co-operating with one another in investigating the allegations of Janis and Linda, the Hamilton-Wentworth Regional Police and the Children's Aid Society pursued separate goals, reached completely different conclusions and ended up openly hostile to one another. Part of the reason for this lay in the different assumptions and predispositions the investigators each took to the case. Behind such assumptions one can see a difference in training, methods and philosophy. One cause for conflict was that the police only felt responsible for investigating the matter if it could lead to criminal charges, while the CAS had the goal of protecting the children. The social workers and psychiatrists listened to the children's story, analyzed its credibility and assessed it in relation to the girls' history and that of other family members. The police officers looked for physical evidence. They did not find the type of evidence they were looking for, and therefore concluded that the children were not telling the truth. The child care professionals concluded that the children were telling the truth, and were frustrated that the police did not take the children's allegations seriously.

The police and the CAS began their investigations of the Wells case with the best of intentions. A protocol had recently been agreed to in Hamilton-Wentworth that was supposed to insure co-operation and a free exchange of information in such cases. In accordance with that protocol, police were present when the children were first interviewed by the agency's child abuse specialist, and social workers were there when the mother was confronted with the girls' allegations. Information was passed back and forth about the further disclosures that were made in the foster home, and the police responded to these when they were called upon to do so.

At the beginning of the case after attending the specialist's interviews with the children, Sgt. Broom believed that the girls had been sexually abused. But when the mother denied the allegations, Sgt. Broom was in a position where the only evidence to support his belief was the statements of two young girls whose testimony would probably not be accepted in a criminal court, given the rules of evidence that applied at that time. Some questions were raised at the hearing as to whether better police work, even at this early stage in the investigation, might have resulted in evidence being uncovered. Sgt. Broom missed his best opportunity to confront Gary Evans about the children's statements on the day Sharon Wells was first confronted at the CAS.

On March 8, 1985, about nine days after they were first informed of the children's allegations of abuse, police executed a search warrant at Sharon's home. Sgt. Broom went with Sgt. David Bowen, his partner, who had been away the previous week. Bowen was slightly older than Broom, and the senior officer on their two-man team. Although they worked well together, the difference in style and character between the two men was as great as the contrast between Broom's thick dark hair and Bowen's partially bald head. While Broom was reserved and reticent, Bowen was aggressive and opinionated. The older man was perhaps sharper and better educated, but he was not always a good listener and was prone to sarcasm.

According to Sgt. Bowen's testimony at the hearing, the search, which was conducted while Sharon and Gary were absent from the house, produced no evidence. Lesley Morgan, the social worker, testified that police told her they removed some towels, which they thought might be stained with semen, during the raid, but neither of the officers mentioned this in their evidence or referred to it in their written reports.

In his testimony before the court, Sgt. Bowen agreed with lawyers' suggestions that the best course of action on hearing the allegations would have been to move quickly to search the house, so there was no time to dispose of evidence. But he said that Broom did not know that the girls had mentioned being abused with a vibrator until after the March 7 interview, and it was only after that disclosure that a search was deemed necessary. He also agreed that it is normally desirable, where there are two alleged perpetrators, to interview them separately and early on in the investigation.

On March 11 the police closed their investigation of the case, stating in a report that "it is quite evident that both of these children have been sexually assaulted, yet because of their age their evidence in court would be unsworn. Since neither of the suspects have admitted to this offense and there is no corroboration to prove what these children are saying is true, there is not enough evidence at this time to lay any charges."

When the children began making their more serious allegations of pornography and ritual violence, the CAS urged the police to reopen their investigation. Although they did so, it is clear from the statements made to the foster mother and social worker and in police reports that Sgt. Bowen, the senior officer on the investigating team, quickly concluded that the children's stories were "beyond belief." He reached this conclusion without talking to the children, whom his partner had found believable when they made their earlier disclosures.

Judge Beckett stated in his final judgement, "The reluctance of the police who investigated the case to believe more than sexual abuse allegations was understandable—they reflected the natural abhorrence of any normal person at the very thought that children in our community could possibly be involved in such matters."

If natural abhorrence to the alleged crime was the basis for closing a case, few police investigations would ever be undertaken. The police clearly had a duty to investigate any allegation, however bizarre, so Sgt. Bowen and Sgt. Broom did reopen the case. They opened it and closed it five times between March 11 and July 26, on each occasion following up on additional information provided by the CAS and each time failing to find evidence that they considered significant.

As police officers became more incredulous of the children's strange stories, social workers and psychiatrists became more convinced that the children were telling the truth, and began complaining about inadequacies in the police investigation. These complaints were explored during the hearing. The police explained that they had begun a massive surveillance operation when the allegations of pornography were first made but abandoned it when the children's stories got more bizarre and further investigation showed that some of the information provided by the girls was false. The CAS representatives responded that the police officers had not taken the trouble to find out the exact contents of the children's statements. It was not a case of the girls giving wrong information, but the police misunderstanding what they had said.

The exchange of information between the police and the CAS degenerated to the point where the Children's Aid Society had to obtain a court order to obtain police reports on the case, and, when police wanted access to the agency's files, they were told they would have to get a search warrant. The conflict between the two groups was so pronounced that, during the Crown wardship hearing, the CAS lawyer, John Harper, attempted to have the investigating police officers declared as hostile witnesses. He also tried to have senior police representatives cited for contempt of court in connection with an alleged attempt to persuade a court official to disclose what he might have overheard lawyers saying about the case. When Lesley Morgan reported a break-and-entry at her home soon after the police testified in the case, CAS representatives accused the Hamilton-Wentworth police of conducting the break-in to search for compromising material about her or the foster mother. An Ontario Provincial Police investigation of this allegation concluded that it was without foundation, and a private investigator working for the CAS was charged with public mischief.

This grotesque breakdown in communication and co-operation was epitomized by a somewhat comic episode in July, 1985, when police took the children and Lesley Morgan on a trip to Toronto in a quixotic search for evidence of ritual burials. The excursion ended with an exaggerated version of the intense frustration well known to parents who have to take young children for long car rides in hot weather. The children refused to help look for the graveyard where they said the rituals took place, because they were not allowed to go on the rides at Canada's Wonderland. Although the police promised them ice cream cones, and, according to Sgt. Bowen, Ms. Morgan pleaded on her hands and knees with Janis, the girls maintained this hard bargaining position. When the police threatened that they would not be allowed to go home until they found the graveyard, Linda began to identify several unlikely places as the scene of the bloody rituals. A psychiatrist who saw a transcript of a tape recording made by police that day later told the court: "For the last third of this interview I don't think anybody in the car was in their right mind."

Sgt. Bowen and Sgt. Broom taped conversations in the car that day without informing Lesley Morgan. This infuriated the social worker and her superiors at the Children's Aid Society, particularly as the police officers did not tape record a conversation with the children's father on the same day. It seemed to underline CAS workers' suspicions that the police were more intent on trying to catch the children in a lie, or the social worker in some attempt to manipulate the children, than they were in challenging the people the girls had accused.

Sgt. Bowen said the conversations were taped because he doubted the accuracy of Ms. Morgan's perceptions. He said he and his partner forgot to tell her they were making a tape. When he was asked in court if the social worker was under suspicion, he said she was not, but added "she came under suspicion for something else, which has nothing to do with this case." He did not explain to the court that the "crime" of which the police subsequently suspected Ms. Morgan was painting shadows on a city sidewalk to commemorate the anniversary of the bombing of Hiroshima, and that the reason that they suspected her of this offense was that she openly acknowledged that she had done it.

Sgt. Broom was more diplomatic in his explanation to Judge Beckett, who was obviously disturbed by the notion that police should secretly record conversations with a professional person with whom they were supposed to be collaborating, but not bother to do so when they talked to a suspect. "It was a long day. There was no intent to deceive. It was only meant to assist as an investigative tool. I don't know why it was not on with Gordon Wells," Sgt. Broom said.

It was, as Sgt. Broom said, a long day. On the way to Toronto the children began complaining of the heat in the back of the car, and the police officers explained to Ms. Morgan, who sat in the back with the girls, that the air-conditioning was not working. When told that they would be going to stop by their father's house before they went looking for the graveyard, Janis said, "I don't want to go to my dad's home." A little while later she complained, "I'm sick and tired. I don't want to go anywhere." Her sister echoed her sentiments by responding to a question, "I'm not telling you. I'm sick and tired." The irrepressible Linda did start talking to the policemen eventually, and Janis told her to "shut up." Janis was told that her help was needed to find the graveyard, and she replied, "I ain't gonna show anybody nothing, and I don't have to."

The first stop in Toronto was in the center of the city, where the police were looking for an occult store that had a bad reputation, according to an Ontario Provincial Police officer who specialized in cult investigations. They parked in front of where the store should have been, but found that it was no longer in existence. While the two policemen were out of the car looking up and down the street, Janis looked up towards the empty storefront and said, "Oh, 666." Ms.

Morgan could not see the number written anywhere, and asked Janis if she had seen it, but the child changed the subject.

The next stop in an excursion that was becoming quite a frightening ordeal for the children was the housing project where they used to live in Toronto. There the police questioned the children about the character to whom Sgt. Bowen referred as "the infamous Blob." This was a rather confused conversation, because the police officers were under the impression that the Blob and the Channel 11 man were the same person, and that the children had said that the Blob used to be the superintendent in their building. The police had established to their satisfaction that nobody answering the description of the Blob or the Channel 11 man had been superintendent of the building. They were not aware that several different people had acted as assistant superintendents at the project while the children lived there. They were also convinced, as a result of their earlier investigations, that children who Janis and Linda had said were dead were in fact alive, and were in the children's classes at school. But it emerged from the interrogation of the children that day that the police officers did not have a clear grasp of many of the details of the children's allegations.

They drove to the house where the girls' father, Gordon Wells, was living. When the girls saw their father, they ran up to him and hugged him, saying, "We love you, Daddy." The police officers later mentioned to Ms. Morgan that they were surprised at this reaction, but the social worker indicated that it is common for abused children to continue to express love towards an abusing parent.

This was the girls' first contact with their father since the Victoria Day weekend. His access rights had been abruptly withdrawn after the girls' story about the plan to kill the foster parents. Ms. Morgan had talked to him on the phone a few days later. He had denied the allegations and told the social worker, "I'll sue the shit out of you." He was very angry and went on to exclaim, "Gary and her in that goddamn house. Sharon has those kid so screwed up. The kids are mentally unbalanced. They are treating them like a bag of dirt. Of course they're going to have imaginations."

The police had never seen Gordon until they arrived with Ms. Morgan and the children on July 5. He told the police officers that he would not allow them into his house without a search warrant. They attempted to obtain one later in the day, but were unsuccessful. They spoke to Gordon outside the house and asked him about the devil picture. He produced a drawing, which he said he had done ten or fifteen years before, of a sinister face with long dark hair and a black beard. He said that Sharon's sister, whom he described as a Jesus freak, thought it was a picture of the devil. The police officers did not see it that way, but Ms. Morgan said it reminded her of pictures of Satan that she had seen in books. Sgt. Bowen later noted in a report: "Like everything else in this case, horror is in the eye of the beholder."

The police officer noticed that the man had a tattoo on his arm of "a chubby little devil." He told them he was not a satanist and denied the alleged plot to kill the McInnis family on the Victoria Day weekend. Sgt. Bowen later described Gordon Wells as "a bit of a rounder, somewhat violent and short tempered." Although the man did not have a criminal record, Sgt. Bowen said, "I would argue he fits my definition of a criminal: the way he talks, his attitude, his associates, the way he talked about Sharon, very vehement about how much he hated her. He insists he's not a kiddy diddler, and that he was very upset about what happened to his children. He talked in language that you often hear from people from perhaps his social background that he looks down strongly on kiddy diddlers. I don't believe for a minute that he is a satanist. I find no evidence to support this. I believed that he didn't plan to kill the McInnises with his ex-wife and Gary Evans."

Gordon Wells did not seem very smart, Sgt. Bowen observed. When he was asked in court how he came to that conclusion, he said, "By his talking. Smart people don't talk to police."

Sgt. Bowen's view of what happened during the rest of the day was quite different from what the social worker reported. The tape recording, which the police had made because they did not trust the social worker's perceptions, proved to be a considerable embarrassment to them, as it clearly showed that their version of the conversations with the children was incorrect.

Sgt. Bowen said the children emphatically denied the allegations "often and throughout the day," even though Lesley Morgan "produced many and various inducements to get them to talk." He told the court, "Janis specifically said there were no dead children and I believed her. I asked her if the stories of the dead children were true. She asked, 'What happens if it's not true?' I said, 'Nothing.' She said, 'It's all a big story.'"

He told the court that Lesley Morgan subsequently pleaded with the child to tell the truth, falling on her hands and knees and shaking her, saying, "It's very important for other children." Ms. Morgan denied this scene, Sgt. Broom did not see it and Sgt. Bowen did not record it either in his reports or his notes.

Sgt. Bowen also told the court, "When Janis wanted to go to Canada's Wonderland, I wouldn't promise her anything, quite properly so. It was my impression Morgan was saying they could see Wonderland later on." When challenged on this, he was not able to find the relevant quote in the transcript of the tape. Asked to give another example of the social worker's inducement to get the children to talk, he referred to a line in the transcript where Ms. Morgan was quoted as saying, "We're not going home until . . . [inaudible]." He said she had gone on to say something about finding the graveyard.

"We believe, when taking statements from accused or witnesses, you have to let them tell their stories. The CAS, in dealing with children, accept that you manipulate and oppress them until they tell you what you want to hear," said Sgt. Bowen.

The tape recording, which John Harper played to the court during his cross-examination of Sgt. Bowen, showed that the children were upset about not being allowed to go to Canada's Wonderland, and very reluctant to talk about the graveyard. Janis said, "I know, but I don't want to tell you, because I don't want to go there." The older child did begin to talk about the murder allegations: "I know why they killed the Blob, because he's too mean." She started to talk about the graveyard, but Sgt. Bowen interrupted her with a challenging question based on his confusion of the Blob and the Channel 11 man.

Sgt. Bowen had to agree when Mr. Harper suggested, "You didn't let them tell their story?

"You were obviously giving them the wrong facts," said Harper, quoting a passage from the transcript where the sergeant said to Janis, "'You told Catherine that the Blob was the superintendent,' and the child replied, 'No I did not. I didn't tell her that.'"

Referring to another section of the transcript where Janis talked about seeing "the dead kids," Harper said to Bowen, quoting from the transcript, "You directly challenged Janis. 'Did you make up the story about the dead kids?' Janis said, 'No.' Linda suggests that, 'Maybe Mom did.' Janis said, 'No.' When Janis said, 'We went to Channel 11. Mom and Gary and Andy's mom stuck fingers in us,' you challenged them again. Janis said, 'She did. It did happen at Channel 11.' I suggest to you that in spite of persistent and many challenges, and wrong facts put to the children, the children were telling you what they had told others up to this point."

Sgt. Bowen was again forced to agree, and was then further embarrassed by the next quotations from the transcript, which showed him telling the children, "Just show me where the cemetery is, and we'll go straight home," and then saying, "I'll help get you guys up to Wonderland some other time. You can come some other day, and they'll bring you."

"I suggest it wasn't Lesley Morgan who suggested that the children would get to Canada's Wonderland. It was you," said Harper.

Sgt. Bowen replied, "I was trying to leave it as vague as possible, but I understand. I agree I was the first to give in."

"I'm suggesting to you that you purposefully misled this court the other day," the lawyer went on, "indicating many and various inducements, citing Canada's Wonderland when the evidence clearly shows it was you. After the children stood up to many of your challenges, I suggest, Sergeant, on this long hot day, you finally got your denial."

The denial came after a meandering excursion through the countryside with Linda, who scarcely knew left from right, gallantly but quite arbitrarily directing the two policemen on a wild-goose chase in search of the graveyard to which the children had said they were driven at night more than six months before. Janis steadfastly refused to give directions, but did start to draw a picture of the graveyard for the police. She drew the house where she said the Blob lived, but scribbled it out when Sgt. Bowen aggressively told her that she had previously said that the Blob lived in an apartment in Toronto, and asked her, "Are you lying now, or were you lying before?"

In a report the following day, Sgt. Bowen wrote: "We have reached that stage when we've got a denial and they don't believe it. We can't prove or disprove it." He said the children's stories "are probably based on some fact, then exaggerated beyond all truth. But the CAS believe what they said, and have the psychiatrists swearing that children never lie."

One of the psychiatrists who later assessed the credibility of the children's statements said after reviewing the transcript of the police tape recording, "They were asking kids questions there is no way kids of that age could answer, dangling the bribe of a trip to Canada's Wonderland and ice cream cones, then becoming frustrated, and alternating between putting the kids down and putting pressure on them."

INVESTIGATION RESUMED

Hamilton-Wentworth Crown Attorney Dean Paquette was concerned. His review of Sgt. Broom's and Sgt. Bowen's investigation indicated that there were many unanswered questions. "Further investigation is warranted," he said in a letter to the police that listed 40 specific items that he wanted them to check into. He described the allegations as "bizarre and difficult to believe," and went on to state, "The fact that something such as this could take place in this jurisdiction is hard to accept for anyone. All steps should be taken to determine whether or not what the children allege is true, and if true can it be presented in a criminal court of law. To successfully investigate this matter will require innovative police investigation by individuals committed to the task. . . . It is hoped that through full exchange of information between the Children's Aid Society and the Hamilton-Wentworth Regional Police the truthfulness of these allegations can be determined."

Hugh Atwood, the lawyer representing the Ontario Official Guardian at the wardship hearing, referred to this letter in his final submissions when he argued that the court should not consider Sgt. Bowen and Sgt. Broom to be credible witnesses: "The fact that the Crown Attorney for Hamilton-Wentworth had to send a letter to the police outlining the responsibilities in the investigation speaks volumes to Sgt. Bowen's and Sgt. Broom's lack of effort on this case."

In fact, the first item on the list of matters for further investigation exposed what would appear to be a glaring hole in the police work. On August 9, 1985, five months after the police heard convincing allegations from the children that they had been grossly sexually abused by Gary Evans, they were asked to find out where Evans lived and worked and whether he had a criminal record. The police had previously received confusing information from Sharon about where her boyfriend was working, because he was working at two different jobs, one of which required him to travel. She had been vague about where he lived, claiming she did not know his parents' address although she had visited their home, which was also Gary's official residence, many times.

When police officers had tried to talk to Gary at Sharon's home, he told them they were putting his life in jeopardy and that they should investigate the matter further, but refused to say any more to them. As the police officers made no attempt to probe Gary's strange statement, one can only speculate about what kind of involvement this man had that caused him to feel his life was threatened and what it was that he thought they should investigate further. Sgt. Broom told the court that he was mildly surprised that Gary had refused to talk to the police. "I found that unusual, considering the severity of the situation. But in 17 years of dealing with people I've found a lot of odd people on the street."

In response to Paquette's letter, the police officers stated that Gary Evans had no criminal record and gave Paquette the other information requested, noting that Gary's family was very protective. The Crown attorney had also requested that the police do some research on voodoo and examine any possible connection that Evans might have with this Caribbean sect. The police reported that the literature on voodoo contains references to the sacrifice of children and animals, but no references to eating feces, drinking urine or performing sexual acts. They said that Evans left the Caribbean region in early childhood, and that his family was Christian. A warrant to search his room at his family home near Toronto was obtained, and in order to execute it the police said they had to fight their way into the house amidst much screaming and obstruction. They said they found no evidence of pornographic, voodoo or satanist material. They did find several hours of videotape recordings of Christian religious services or lectures, Sgt. Bowen said.

The Crown attorney's list included checks of medical records, further investigations of opinions of doctors and psychiatrists, investigations of people who may have been named in the children's stories and research on the backgrounds of the children's parents and their relationship. The police were asked to question Gordon Wells about whether he had been threatening his ex-wife. They reported that Wells denied any threats, but admitted that he was "ready to kill her" when he found out she was moving to Hamilton.

Gordon Wells admitted to police when they interviewed him on August 13 that he kept a machete in the back of his car. He also told the police that he did not see the children for several months after they moved to Hamilton. This conflicted with information Lesley Morgan had about visits the girls' mother made to Toronto, but, as a result of the breakdown in communication between the police and the CAS, the social worker and the police never exchanged notes on such details. The girls' father also mentioned to the police officers that his ex-wife had a videocassette recorder while she was living in Toronto. No VCR had been found when her Hamilton home was searched in March, 1985. Judge Beckett asked Sgt. Broom at the hearing if he had ever questioned Sharon Wells about the VCR, and the sergeant replied, "I'm not sure we ever covered that."

Paquette asked the police to obtain pictures of all the employees of the television station, in order that they could be shown to the children by "someone with whom they are comfortable and not the police." CHCH television would not comply with this request. Lesley Morgan would later testify that she formed the impression that the television station was more anxious about avoiding being implicated in a scandal than about helping a full investigation of the children's allegations.

The Crown attorney also asked the police to obtain a list of cemeteries around the northern section of Toronto, and to visit these in order to compare them with the diagram made by the foster mother when she listened to the children's stories. Sgt. Bowen and Sgt. Broom subsequently did a quick check on every cemetery they could identify in the area, and found nothing that matched the children's description. They explained in court that they had rushed from one cemetery to another, only stopping for a few moments at each one. They did not include private cemeteries in their search, though there are several in the area.

The police did some research on satanic ritual. Sgt. Broom told the court, "Other people came to us saying there is such a thing. I must believe there is some type of satanic cult that is available on the streets today." Harper had suggested he contact a San Francisco policewoman who specializes in occult investigations, and a sheriff in Toledo, Ohio, where police were attempting to unearth bodies that were supposedly interred by a satanic cult. But, Sgt. Broom said, "that proved to be erroneous."

Sgt. Broom was correct that the Spencer Township, Ohio, investigation into alleged satanic ritual murders of children did not succeed in unearthing bodies, but posts were found that could have been used for binding people, together with a headless doll with a small pentagram ornament nailed to a board, an eight-inch dagger with blood on it and a crucifix mounted upside down. This finding is typical of the kind of tantalizing, but ultimately inconclusive, evidence that has been encountered in attempts to corroborate allegations of satanic ritual crimes.

Ritual crimes pose a peculiar dilemma for law enforcement officers. Dale Griffis, the former police chief from Tiffin, Ohio, says that satanic allegations "put a lot of law enforcement people in limbo. They get nailed either way." If police appear to fail to take allegations seriously, they can be severely criticized, as the Hamilton police have been, but they can also very easily be made to look foolish if they go on a fruitless search for bodies in unlikely places. A sheriff who was convinced that children in Bakersfield, California, were telling the truth was subjected to considerable public ridicule when his attempts to dig for bodies were unsuccessful.

"We are all trying to figure out how to deal with this new element," Larry Dunn, a sheriff's deputy from Port Angeles, Washington, who specializes in training police officers in child sexual abuse investigations, said in an interview. He said the bizarreness of the cases makes them more difficult, as do the fear and control exercised on children to prevent them from talking and the skill that the cult groups seem to have at covering their tracks. He explained that the lack of evidence is often misleading, since children's perceptions can easily be distorted by drugs or by illusions created by adults. He said these cases require more investigation, because "you are dealing with a lot of information that doesn't bear out. It doesn't mean that what the kids are telling you is not true. We're feeling our way right now. It's so different and we just don't have the training.

"We're swimming. A lot of agencies are treading water. We're trying to assess what we're dealing with. I feel that if these groups exist they're way ahead of the game," said Dan Clarke, a police detective from San Bernardino, California. Detective Clarke is one of a small but steadily increasing number of law enforcement police officers across North America who have looked at the alarmingly consistent hallmarks of ritual abuse and concluded that there is a clear possibility that there might be an organized network of satanic cults engaging in torturing and molesting children. He says he is persuaded by "the number of reports coming in, the number of victims, the consistency, that somewhere out there is such a group of people doing that sort of thing." Yet, he admits, it is so hard to believe: "We can accept a person being involved in mass homicide. But, for some reason or other, this is hard to accept.

"It seems to be based on behavior modification of children, a brainwashing type of abuse that takes away anything the children identify with or have faith in," Detective Clarke said in an interview. "There are small indications that it might be an organized movement. We're trying to determine if it's valid. I don't think there is a Crimes Against Children Unit that hasn't run into it." His speculations about the motives for such a group "sound pretty bizarre," the detective admits. "There are people who do it to appease a deity of some sort. Some are really religious. There are other people who are just seeking power and sexual gratification. Behind the whole thing there may be a motive of people trying to change the thinking of youth for a future generation."

All this is completely beyond the experience of traditional criminal investigators, who expect perpetrators to be motivated by greed or passion, and are certainly not used to dealing with crimes where the physical evidence is scarce, the witnesses are confused and frightened children, and the prime resources are psychiatrists and experts in the occult. In the past, when ritual elements have been found in a child abuse case, that aspect of the crime has generally been ignored and suppressed as police concentrated on a prosecution for sexual abuse. The criminal cases in the United States that have concentrated on the more bizarre ritual aspects of children's allegations have usually floundered in a sea of controversy, while the more successful prosecutions of this type of case have tended to downplay the ritual aspects, and often have completely excluded such elements from the evidence presented to the court.

When police officers do believe these strange allegations of ritual abuse, they often find themselves in conflict with their peers, their superiors and prosecutors, and vulnerable to ridicule and attack from defense lawyers, the media and members of the public. Child sexual abuse expert Roland Summit said in an interview, "We have a poor history of dealing with the cases. Once the issue of murder comes up and there are no bodies, it is used to ridicule the investigation and intimidate the kids."

The conflicting views that such allegations inspire among law enforcement officers was illustrated in an ambiguous but disturbing report that came over the Canadian Press wire just a few weeks before Judge Beckett delivered his final judgement in the Hamilton wardship hearing. The report from Edmonton, Alberta, stated:

> Devil worshippers may have been involved in several unsolved child abduction cases in Alberta, says an RCMP constable who has studied satanic cults for the past four years.
> "Children have a strong significance in satanic rituals and there are suggestions they may be used," Constable Jim Brown wrote in a report on the subject.

He said satanists are believed to have been involved in an attempted child kidnapping in Red Deer in the summer of 1985 on one of 13 annual satanic "holy days."

Spokesmen for Edmonton police and for the RCMP's Alberta headquarters in Edmonton discounted the possibility of a cult connection with well-known missing children cases.

There is no evidence to substantiate that a satanic cult was connected with the January 1983 disappearance of six-year-old Tania Murrell, said city police spokesman Lori Nagy.

RCMP Sgt. Wayne Gesy said Tania Murrell is one of five children the police have wanted to find for years.

"I'm not aware of any specific investigation towards any cult," he said.

Brown wrote that satanic cults are likely responsible not only for some child abductions but for a string of other crimes in the Calgary and Red Deer areas since 1982. The other cases include assaults, extortions, animal mutilations, grave robberies and "ritualistic sacrifice of hitchhikers," he said.

His report said satanists are rarely prosecuted in Canada because they go to great lengths to avoid detection.

"You can't get much evidence because satanic cults are so clandestine and cover themselves up well."

Rena Kirkham of Childfind Alberta, a group which tries to locate missing children, said she knows there is a suspected connection between abductions and satanic cults.

"It's definitely possible," she said in an interview. "If you look at the dates some of the children went missing there's a pattern."

Of the five most mysterious disappearances investigated by Childfind, she said, two took place on the day of satanic festivals and two occurred during the same week as satanic festivals.

> Brown, who started probing satanism while investigating animal mutilations in the Red Deer area, said the biggest obstacle in nabbing devil worshippers is that most police officers "think it is all hocus-pocus."
> Red Deer RCMP Insp. Larry Pearson said he supports Brown's investigations. "There are lots of things that happen and I don't think they could all be coincidences," he said. "I think the satanists are real. I know they're out there."

The Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) had one intelligence officer who specializes in following up on reports of occult involvement in criminal activity. He does not consider himself an expert in the field, and referred a reporter who was seeking background information on satanic cults to Dale Griffis. Griffis visited Toronto to give a lecture to a university group in the fall of 1986, and said that police in Ontario are increasingly concerned about cult involvement in crime.

Sgt. Bowen contacted the OPP occult specialist in July, 1985, and later testified, "He told me there is no concrete proof of a satanic cult operating in Ontario, although there are a lot of suspicions. He told me that there should be reports of naked people at any satanic rites and the sound of ringing bells. There are no such reports from the children." Sgt. Bowen noted in a police report, "He mentioned some incidents during satanic rites such as killing of a child that should occur and the children are obviously not relating them. It is quite clear no satanic cult is operating here."

The police continued to follow up all the leads that the Crown attorney had asked them to pursue in order to conclude an investigation that Harper said was largely a matter of "going through the motions." Sgt. Bowen and Sgt. Broom talked to many people who claimed to have information on satanists in the Hamilton area. One of these people had what had seemed to be a promising lead about Gary, but that turned out to be a case of mistaken identity. Most of these informants were not very credible. One man talked to the police about his belief that black witchcraft had been involved in a child murder in Hamilton in the early 1980s. This informant, who called himself The Ambassador, also tried to interest local television reporters in his story, but did little to enhance his credibility with them when he phoned to cancel an appointment because he had been unavoidably detained in the psychiatric hospital. A man who called himself Mickey Mouse was also anxious to help anyone who would listen to him. One reporter felt he had a hot lead when an informant promised to direct him to the site of a cult meeting, but was unable to follow up on this as the informant had multiple personalities, and the reporter was never again able to reach the right personality over the phone.

The police replied to the Crown attorney's letter on September 12, 1985: "For a number of reasons we have reached the conclusion that the children are mixing up reality and fiction. This case highlights some of the inherent conflicts between the social welfare philosophy and legal requirements necessary for a criminal conviction. The children's revelations result from leading questions made in the presence of each other. In a treatment atmosphere this may be appropriate, but not in a legal forum. We are drawn to the irresistible conclusion that the children have been assaulted, probably by Sharon and Gary Evans. The only evidence to support this is the vague ramblings of the two girls. They obviously cannot testify. Even if they did so, in a formal court setting in the presence of the abusers, they most likely would deny it happened. In the absence of any other evidence, we find that there is no evidence to support criminal charges."

PSYCHOLOGICAL ASSESSMENTS

It was not enough for the social workers to say they believed the children. They had to show that it was a belief based on professional judgement rather than simple credulity. Then they had to present the evidence on which this judgement was based—the children's allegations—in a way that would convince a court that the children were telling the truth.

A team of two psychiatrists and a social worker from the Hospital for Sick Children played a crucial role in this process. They conducted an analysis of the children's statements that they believed was the most comprehensive of its kind ever undertaken. They concluded that the children were indeed telling the truth. Although Judge Beckett finally decided not to rely on the psychiatrists' conclusions, their report did lay out very clearly the basis upon which a reasonable person might decide that the children should be believed.

This conclusion was reinforced by assessments of the adults involved in the case carried out on behalf of the Children's Aid Society in the summer of 1985 by psychiatrists from Hamilton's Chedoke-McMaster Hospital. Social workers also gathered information on the family's background, attempting to contact day-care staff, teachers and other professionals who had dealt with the children.

Soon after the children were placed in their first foster home, the Children's Aid Society sent them to Dr. Alice Oliviera, a well-respected child psychiatrist, for therapy. After 26 play therapy sessions with the children, Dr. Oliviera concluded that Janis and Linda were describing their own experiences when they talked about sexual abuse, being forced to eat excrement and drink urine and witnessing events that they interpreted as murders. Dr. Oliviera said she did not think it possible that Janis and Linda were fantasizing in making these statements because they were peculiarly unimaginative children.

This opinion was underscored by the findings of a psychologist who conducted a series of personality tests with the children in the summer of 1985. Mani van der Spuy reported that he was struck by their lack of imagination. Janis particularly responded in a very uncreative way to a test in which she was asked to make up a story on the basis of pictures shown to her. Her stories were mostly extraordinarily detailed descriptions of what she saw in the pictures.

Dr. van der Spuy said he formed the impression from Janis's response to the tests that "there is a lot of darkness and sadness in her situation. She feels quite immobilized. She feels everything she has may be taken or destroyed by forces beyond her control." He said Linda's performance in the tests indicated a fragile hold on reality, and a poverty in relationships, feelings and thinking. "I almost get the idea that she experiences life, not in terms of cause and effect, but as a mine field, with here and there an explosion."

Dr. van der Spuy concluded, "I do not believe what they have reported about the past could be taken as fantasy. Their inner fantasy is too poorly developed to have fabricated those reports. Children who are inclined to confabulate may have somewhat pathological fantasies, but have a rich fantasy life."

While the emotional scars left by child sexual abuse are easily discernible on its victims, there is often no physical evidence, or, if there is, it is ambiguous and hard to detect. This seemed to be the case with Janis and Linda. The symptoms of psychological distress were clear for anyone to see, and the accounts of abuse so graphic, detailed and consistent that it was hard to come to any other conclusion but that they had been grossly abused. But a medical examination uncovered no conclusive evidence of physical damage. This lack of definitive medical proof of injury was another factor that made the police reluctant to lay criminal charges in the case.

To the lay person it sounds inconceivable that the kind of sexual assaults that the children described, involving numerous occurrences of abuse with vibrators and other foreign objects, could leave them physically unmarked and intact. Sgt. Broom told the court he believed that sexual abuse occurred because "[although] being a family man I know that children sometimes will lie, what they were saying appeared fairly graphic. They had to have some firsthand knowledge. But I find it difficult to believe the dildo wouldn't leave lasting telltale marks. I also found it difficult that there was no medical evidence of the blackbird's head being inserted."

But this lay understanding of the issue is incorrect, according to medical evidence heard by the court. The commonly held belief that doctors can determine whether or not a child has been sexually abused is a myth that, like the mistaken notion that such abuse is usually inflicted by strangers rather than friends or family members, stands in the way of understanding the nature of child sexual abuse. Unfortunately the fact that it is possible to inflict all kinds of sexual abuse on children without leaving any physical evidence is well known to many pedophiles, which can give them the edge over people who are seeking to protect children.

Angus MacMillan, an expert pediatrician from the Chedoke-McMaster Hospital, explained this to the court. When a child is being molested, he said, she is not necessarily aware of what part of her genitalia is being touched. Any touching in that area can cause intense pain and trauma. Fingers or objects may be inserted into the vaginal opening without penetrating beyond the hymen, and would cause great pain if they touched the hymen. Dr. MacMillan also explained that the hymen is an elastic membrane that is normally perforated with small holes of up to 4 millimeters in diameter. He said research has indicated that it is possible to insert an object with a diameter of up to 20 millimeters through one of these holes without tearing the membrane, thus leaving no physical evidence.

The most important aspect of any examination to determine if children have been sexually abused is, therefore, what the children themselves have to say, Dr. MacMillan explained. Here he endorsed the CAS child abuse specialist's comments by telling the court, "We know that children rarely, if ever, lie about things of this nature. The Journal of Child Abuse will accept an article if you can show in detail how children lied about sexual abuse."

However, in the case of Janis and Linda there were also physical indications that they may have been abused, Dr. MacMillan said. He had first examined the children before they went into foster care, because of difficulties they were having at school as a result of Linda's hyperactivity and Janis's emotional problems. At that time he was not looking for any signs of sexual abuse, but rather was concerned that Linda's medical record indicated that she had suffered from a vaginal yeast infection five months earlier. At her age such an infection was, he said, an extreme rarity, and would lead one to consider the possibility of a foreign body being introduced to the vaginal area.

Dr. MacMillan found no physical evidence of recent abuse when he examined Linda at the request of the Children's Aid Society soon after the children had made their allegations of abuse. But his examination of Janis at that time revealed that the child had a particularly wide vaginal orifice. The holes that perforate the hymen are normally no wider than 4 millimeters, but Janis's were 7 millimeters in diameter. It would be possible to insert an index finger, he said, while leaving the hymen intact. This suggested that the orifice had in fact been expanded by perforation by a finger or some other object, he said, but the evidence was not conclusive.

In reviewing the medical history of the two children, Dr. MacMillan noted several injuries and illnesses that he said were warning signs of child abuse. He said he had never seen a child with a history of as many head injuries as Janis, who was treated five times in one year for bruises or cuts on the head. Dr. MacMillan said he also would be very concerned about the fact that Linda was treated for trauma on three occasions in three different hospitals between the ages of 20 months and two years.

Arthur Brown, the mother's lawyer, who usually questioned experts at length, started to quiz the doctor about the allegations concerning the bird. The foster mother had mentioned that she had the impression from the children's descriptions that the bird they were referring to was a grackle. Mr. Brown asked Dr. MacMillan if he was at all familiar with a bird known as a grackle, suggesting that it was quite a large bird and unlikely to be inserted into the girls without causing injury. After asking the lawyer if he was referring to the Common Grackle or some other species, the doctor displayed a fund of ornithological knowledge, and explained with the help of drawings how the grackle, which has a relatively small head, could well be inserted a little way into a child's external genitalia, causing pain and trauma but no injuries.

Dr. MacMillan said his physical findings were compatible with the children being abused by hand, with bananas and with birds. Asked if he found such allegations of bizarre abuse difficult to accept, the doctor somberly told the court, "I have been quite disillusioned by what I find human beings capable of doing. Anything living or dead has been put into the sexual parts of children. I find it all hard to accept."

Other psychiatric professionals called by the CAS were Dr. Gail Beck, who examined the foster mother, and two other psychiatrists who contributed assessments of Sharon and Gordon Wells. Dr. Eva Gede, who examined Sharon, was a small, efficient woman with a somewhat abrupt and aggressive manner. She was asked to do the assessment because she was a specialist in the psychosocial disorders of women, and had a special interest in multiple personality disorders, a problem that it had been felt Sharon might be suffering from. She did not in fact find that Sharon had multiple personalities, but did conclude that she was suffering from another form of mental illness, a borderline personality disorder.

In interviews with the psychiatrist Sharon said the allegations were gross, that she had never heard of such stuff or even imagined it in her wildest dreams. Sharon said she thought it must all have come from the foster mother, and that Mrs. McInnis must be "sick." She said, "I want to get my kids back and find out what the hell went on with them, who did what with them and why. I know it's not me."

Sharon confided in the psychiatrist that she didn't trust adults, felt safe with kids and dreamed of opening a day-care center. She said, "All men have ever done in my life is complicate it." She admitted that she was not the best housekeeper in the world, or the most stable of people, but said she tried to be strong and do what was right for her children. She said the allegations had destroyed her relationship with Gary Evans. "He loved kids, that's what attracted me to him," she said. "It's destroyed something so beautiful and wonderful that we all had, all of us. It hurts because I know how much love there was. He blames me for what's happened, because I got weak and I wasn't strong. He says if I would have been stronger this would not have happened. And he's right. He says I wrecked his life. I think that this has destroyed a perfectly happy family that we could have been."

"It sounds as if he wants your kids more than he wants you," said Dr. Gede.

"We love each other a lot and there was a great family reunion in love between all of us," Sharon said.

Dr. Gede confronted Sharon in her interviews, suggesting that the woman's life was moving from crisis to crisis, that she wasn't able to cope with her problems and that she was looking to her children to give her the kind of nurture and emotional support that she was unable to give them herself. She said that the mother did not know what it takes to be independent: "You wouldn't be here if you did."

"I wouldn't be here if the damn CAS didn't have my kids," Sharon replied.

The psychiatrist told Sharon that she seemed to have made the same mistakes over and over again in her life, to which the young woman replied, "I never made the same mistakes. They were always different mistakes.

"My kids give me a lot of security because my life is dedicated to them," Sharon said. "They're why I'm going on. They're why I'm facing things."

She said she had learned through her experience with the CAS to be stronger, and that they will never get another chance to take her kids again. She pointed out that she had put the children in foster care in the first place: "I could have kept them home. I could have beat them. Who the hell would have known what I did to my kids?

"I just feel like all my life I have had to defend myself," Sharon told the psychiatrist. "This is not a problem. This is a major catastrophe. This could wreck so many lives. I'm accused of child molesting, killing. You tell me what company is going to hire me if this ever gets out, and it's getting out like wildfire. So many people are finding out. If you were a day-care-center person and you found out about these allegations, are you going to hire me? No. Do you see what this has done? I wanted to go back to school. I wanted to work with kids."

Dr. Gede said, "You need a lot from your children."

"Is that so wrong?" Sharon asked passionately.

"A parent is not supposed to need," said the psychiatrist.

"Who says that? It's not as if I sit there and cry every detail out to them. It's just that I feel strong when they're there like that. I don't think it's wrong."

The mother said she felt betrayed because she had thought that the psychiatrist was just going to be determining whether or not she was crazy, not analyzing her whole life. Dr. Gede told her, "You're definitely not crazy. You're not psychotic."

"You've got to be psycho or crazy to be in a cult to kill children," Sharon said, repeating that she had no idea how her children could be saying such things about her.

"There's no smoke where there's no fire. That's the problem," said Dr. Gede.

Dr. Gede observed as a result of this interview that Sharon's "insight into emotionally threatening issues is limited." She said, "I have a gut feeling that Mrs. Wells thinks that, if she gets her children back, Gary will return to her. Their relationship was very much inclusive of the children. She regards competent parenting as providing the absolute basics. She openly admits she needs children, from whom she derives strength, comfort, et cetera. . . . Her dream to own a day-care center, where she would never run out of children, I think, was quite unrealistic. When asked about emotionally uncomfortable or conflicting material, her memory gets hazy. It's also possible that she may be trying to withhold information that would put her in a bad light."

Sharon was asked to undergo a psychological test, which consisted of a long multiple-choice questionnaire known as the Minnesota Multiphasic Personality Inventory (MMPI). This is a standard tool psychologists use to evaluate personality. The psychologist who analyzed Sharon Wells's test results noted that the woman "was capable of some pretty bizarre behavior." The psychologist said, "Traditional psychotherapies with persons with a similar profile is extremely difficult because of their almost total inability to accept responsibility for their actions. This is not a healthy profile, and this person is in need of major psychosocial intervention, but it is unlikely she would agree."

Dr. Gede also analyzed Sharon's hospital records, noting that she had apparently been treated three times for drug overdoses. The psychiatrist put some stress on the fact that during one of these hospital admissions she was described as hostile and paranoid and was treated with an antipsychotic drug. Psychosis is a more serious stage of mental illness where a patient loses contact with reality, and has delusions and, sometimes, hallucinations. Dr. Gede did not conclude that Sharon was psychotic, however, but that she suffered from a borderline personality disorder.

"Her knowledge of stability and security is limited. Her ability to relate to adults is seriously impaired. She is dependent and very needy and unable to have her needs met. She can be impulsive in a destructive and self-destructive manner. She can probably control people who back off from her anger fairly effectively because she is not easy to take on. Her ability to understand children's emotional needs is limited, her relationship with them is self-centered and self-serving. She exploits children emotionally, and does not even know it," said the psychiatrist.

Dr. Gede concluded, "Her capacity for insight and judgement into her own problems is poor. Her psychological defenses include denial, projection and distortion. These defenses are characteristic of the psychotic mental illness and of the most severe personality disorders. . . . She does have a mental disorder that can, at times, produce brief periods of psychosis. With lots of support and counseling she may be able to get by, somehow, from crisis to crisis, as she has done in the past. Since she doesn't have insight into what her problems are, her prognosis is very guarded."

Another assessment of Sharon was done by a psychiatrist hired on her behalf and called as a defense witness. His conclusions about her mental state were similar to Dr. Gede's, though he tried to present them in a better light and was more optimistic about the prospects of successful therapy.

Dr. Naomi Rae-Grant did an assessment of Gordon Wells and concluded that he showed no evidence of a psychotic or neurotic disorder. A psychologist said the father's personality profile was "not a particularly healthy profile." Tests revealed mild disturbance in thinking, with poor concentration, vagueness and some difficulty in relations with authority figures.

Dr. Rae-Grant stated in her report, "His description of his interaction with his estranged wife suggests a pathological relationship in terms of the degree of anger and dyscontrol which he feels Sharon was able to arouse in him. The history of violent, aggressive episodes suggests the possibility of an intermittent, explosive disorder, but further assessment would be necessary to confirm this impression. Mr. Wells's description of his interactions with Janis and Linda suggests genuine concern for and attachment to the children."

The father told the psychiatrist that he had left school at 15 because "they weren't teaching me anything." He said he did not associate much with his family because he had too many arguments with them, and too many things had gone wrong. He said he had a job, and spent his time working, partying and fending for himself: "When you get street-wise, you get out there and take care of things." He said his hobbies were martial arts, weight lifting, art and photography.

Gordon described himself as a man who likes to resolve problems simply: "I should walk in there, bang, bang, bang, get the right answer. I hate problems that drag on. It starts to irritate me. Sometimes I get up and go. I can be in a rotten mood, and don't like to be around anybody. I sit in my room, draw or write until something's done about it, or I can solve it myself."

With Sharon, Gordon said, "I would say, 'Quit bothering me, or something's going to happen.' I lost control a couple of times, quite a few times. She used to bait me all the time, until I would turn around with no warning and do something. She used to say, 'You don't like fighting,' and call me chicken. She would call me a maniac. I used to warn her, 'Don't do it,' or I would be out of control. I didn't want to hit her. I would rather hit the wall than hit her. If somebody bugs me too much, I warn them. Then it's in their own hands. Everyone knows to leave me alone. Don't bait me. Just back off."

Dr. Rae-Grant did not take the confrontational approach that Dr. Gede had adopted in her interview with Sharon.

Gordon said he was now glad to be away from his ex-wife. He said she would not back down in confrontations with him and "used to get a thrill out of seeing me explode." He said, "She could be pleasant as hell, a great actor when she wants to be . . . I seen her in action, lying, she does a good job. I don't trust her. She's too crafty for what she wants."

He described a conversation with Sharon after he heard about the children's allegations. "I've told my wife, 'If it's true, God help you,' 'cause I told her a long time ago that I put the kids on earth to turn around and raise them up and have a life of their own, not for two screwballs to come along and screw it up. And she said, 'Do you think I could do that?' I said, 'I really don't know.' I said, 'Between you and Gary, I don't know. You've gone so far, now, because of your relationship with him, that half the time I don't think you care about the kids.'

"She put so much junk into their heads," he told the psychiatrist. "As far as I'm concerned I'm glad it's all coming out.

"The kids said I was supposed to eliminate the foster mother. I laughed at that one. The kids are so bollixed up because of being pumped too much. I said, 'I'm trying to fight for my kids, not screw them up.'"

Gordon described Sharon before her first psychiatric hospital admission. He said he found her "in the storage closet with the lights turned out, curled up. She said, 'I don't want to hurt the kids.' It was like she was a six-year-old again. Fast forward picture. She went through her whole childhood. You could see the stages she was going through, coming back up to when she was 22."

He said his ex-wife was always a very lousy housekeeper. He said the relationship was "okay till the end. It sort of went downhill. When I switched over to not hitting the kids, she started hitting them for every little thing going."

The children, he said, were looking better when he saw them in May: "They were getting fed better. Linda filled out more. I don't like the fact Sharon put them in there, but they were looking better."

The psychiatrist asked him why he had threatened Lesley Morgan when he talked to her on the phone, and he said he had merely responded to a question she asked by saying, "Do yourself a favor. It will be the first and last time you ask me that question, if you value anything [meaning her job]."

Asked about the so-called picture of the devil, Gordon said, "I drew a picture ten to fifteen years ago as the devil. I went to a show one night, seen it and re-created it. It meant nothing, just something I drew. I'm an artist and I drew it. Everybody's been calling it the devil. Call it what you want. The cop thought it was a big joke. People want to destroy it, and all it is is a picture. It's got nothing to do with satanism or anything else."

Dr. Rae-Grant noted that, during Mr. Wells's videotaped visit with the children, Linda frequently clung to him, hugged him and kissed him, while Janis was ambivalent, extremely angry and resentful, but with some warm feelings. She said the child punched him, pummeled him and took his car keys, but he maintained a calm, caring attitude.

Gordon told the psychiatrist that his children "need to be back with me and a normal home life."

Gary Evans was given an opportunity to be assessed by either Dr. Gede or Dr. Rae-Grant. He talked to them both, but did not show up for the assessments. He later claimed that this was because he thought they would be biased against him. Gary was subsequently assessed by Dr. Clive Chamberlain, a psychiatrist commissioned by Gary's lawyer. Dr. Chamberlain testified as a defense witness. Although Dr. Gede and Dr. Rae-Grant were called as CAS witnesses at the hearing, there was no suggestion that their assessments of the two parents were in any way biased or unprofessional.

As the CAS began to piece together the results of all these assessments, the children's allegations of abuse appeared more credible than the parents' total denial that anything untoward had ever taken place.

THE ASSESSMENT TEAM

The analysis of the children's credibility conducted by the assessment team from the Hospital for Sick Children was an important new development in child sexual abuse investigation. Their report presented a technique for analyzing the credibility of children's prior statements without conducting further interviews with the children. Since it is generally recognized that it is bad for children to have to repeat allegations several times to different people, this method provided a useful new analytical tool. Its use in a court case where the children were not going to be required to testify also promised to open up new possibilities in child welfare law.

This ground-breaking study was first conceived in a meeting on June 25, 1985, at which the case was discussed and Catherine McInnis was asked to read some excerpts from her notes. In attendance were the CAS representatives, Sgt. Broom and two psychiatrists and a social worker from the Hospital for Sick Children. After discussing the case with CAS representatives and hearing Mrs. McInnis's presentation, the hospital team decided not to interview Janis and Linda. They felt they had sufficient data in the notes of the foster mother and transcripts of other interviews with the children. They concluded that further interviews could be disruptive to the girls' therapy, and might be counterproductive, as they could frighten the children into recanting their allegations.

Halina Klajner-Diamond, the social worker from the Toronto hospital, had been involved in about 550 cases of child abuse during her four years at the hospital's Suspected Child Abuse and Neglect Unit. Describing the meeting to the court she said, "Mrs. McInnis came across as very sincere, committed, credible and concerned about the welfare of the children. She was upset and talked about the pressure she was under. She said that people would think she was a kook. My own feelings were, 'This is incredible. I don't want to believe this. I can't believe it.' I kept listening to the details, and became really prepared to believe we should look into this. It shouldn't be dismissed just because I don't want to listen to it."

Dr. Paul Steinhauer, senior staff psychiatrist at the Hospital for Sick Children, said that he went to the meeting with "a bias that this couldn't be true." He described himself as being highly suspicious of the claims of some of his colleagues in the profession, who seem to maintain that anything children say is true.

"At first I was reluctant to listen. It was extremely hard to take, very upsetting," said Dr. Steinhauer. "We have a natural human tendency not to believe those things could go on, to think, 'It can't be true. Nobody could treat children in this way. Things this horrendous couldn't have happened.' I went in with the feeling that, if it did go on, we have a responsibility to help the kids, and not to support the allegations if they are untrue. As the meeting went on I became increasingly sure that there was substantial truth and I spent part of the meeting trying to figure out where that feeling was coming from. So, I was partly listening and I was partly trying to analyze this new thing, what it was that was making me think that this is truthful."

At the end of the meeting Dr. Steinhauer told the CAS representatives, "I think I can analyze those notes in a way that will demonstrate that there are enough factors supporting validity and reliability that I think they may be of some support to your case."

The defense lawyers would later point to this statement as evidence that the hospital team did not approach their analysis of the children's statements from an objective scientific standpoint, but began by believing that the children were telling the truth, and then tried to find evidence to support this belief. This criticism perhaps failed to do justice to the rigor of the analysis that Dr. Steinhauer subsequently undertook. It also displayed some misunderstanding of the scientific method, as even the most objective study must begin with theories and observations.

The argument turned out to be irrelevant to the judge's final decision, as Judge Beckett neatly defused what might have become the most controversial legal issue to arise from the case by stating in his judgement that he gave no weight to the psychiatrists' report. The judge said he was impressed by the report, and did not question the credibility or thoroughness of the psychiatrists' evidence. But he said it was his job, not that of expert witnesses, to decide whether or not the children were telling the truth. This was a shrewd decision because the defense lawyers had vigorously tried to introduce evidence from witnesses who would challenge this report. Judge Beckett had deemed the evidence they wished to call inadmissible because he didn't consider their witnesses to be expert enough to testify. By saying that he was not considering the hospital report, Judge Beckett removed one very strong basis on which his final ruling might be appealed.

In coming to the same conclusion as the assessment team, Judge Beckett gave strikingly similar reasons. He simply observed that analyzing credibility may be a new field for psychiatrists but judges have been doing it for generations and using the same criteria: consistency, detail, inappropriate knowledge of sexual matters and emotional and physical reactions while witnesses related their stories. What the report and the psychiatrists' evidence did for the judge was organize the children's allegations and the factors supporting their credibility in such a way that it was possible for him to examine them for himself and reach the same conclusion about the girls' sincerity.

While the assessment of credibility is an age-old responsibility for judges, it is a comparatively new task for psychiatrists. In treatment situations psychiatrists generally do not concern themselves with whether or not their patients are telling the truth, since their concern is more with the individual's subjective interpretation of reality. What patients have to say is often seen as a symptom of their disturbance, rather than as a description of what has happened to them. According to many child abuse experts, the tendency of psychiatrists not to take what their patients say at face value has prevented the high incidence of incest from being recognized in the past because complaints have always been dismissed as father fixations and infantile sexual fantasies.

The recognition that child sexual abuse is a widespread problem, and the fact that children's disclosures are often the only evidence for this abuse, has made it necessary for psychiatrists and child care workers to find ways of determining when children should be believed. In reaction to the centuries of disbelief in this phenomenon, some professionals maintain that children never lie about parental sexual abuse, but studies and court cases have shown this not to be the case. In all the public controversy that has surrounded the recent increase in concern and litigation about child sexual abuse, how to determine when children are telling the truth is one of the most central and sensitive issues.

The study that the team from the Hospital for Sick Children conducted on the allegations of Janis and Linda has since been discussed in workshops, conferences and articles submitted for publication in psychiatric journals. The study and the subsequent research that came out of it are expected to have a lasting impact on the development of methods for the assessment of children's credibility.

Dr. Steinhauer told the court, "I can't conceive of a case that has been looked at more thoroughly than this one has. We went beyond anything anyone else has done to develop criteria to allow us to look critically at what children were saying." He said the study applied "the most rigorous set of criteria that we know of."

Although the judge felt the criteria were similar to those normally used in court cases, they also involved the application of psychiatric insights into children's behavior. All of the information was subjected to a more scientific analysis than that usually undertaken by a court. Various repeated elements of the children's statements, such as the references to the bird, or eating "poo," were isolated and codified. Then each reference was recorded in a way that details of the girls' accounts and accompanying symptoms could be compared.

Ms. Klajner-Diamond told the court that the team concluded on the basis of the study that "there is no doubt sexual abuse occurred, probably much as depicted. Despite some confusion due to insufficient detail, lack of clarity, there is enough likelihood that the murders and cannibalism have basis in fact that a vigorous investigation should be undertaken. On the basis of this we believe that Linda and Janis were talking to Mrs. McInnis of experiences they have been participants in or observed, that there is no other credible explanation for what the girls have been saying and for their associated behaviors."

When the social worker and the two psychiatrists were later presented with further evidence of additional statements made by the children, they said they became more confident that the murders and rituals actually took place as the girls described them. Dr. Steinhauer testified, "There is no way these kids were not involved in rituals along the lines of those described. I am convinced people were being killed, that they were forced to stick knives in victims. As to whether the flesh they ate was human or not, there is a possibility for error. We found nothing that allowed me to draw any conclusion other than the fact that what the children described was actually experienced."

Dr. William Wehrspann, the second psychiatrist on the team, explained that the psychiatric symptoms of distress that the children displayed when telling their stories were particularly convincing: "There's no way to coach this. In cases proven to be fictitious, they are not present. We're talking real primitive stuff here. These kids literally had the crap scared out of them."

Dr. Steinhauer said the children's stories were consistent with one another over a long period of time, and contained the kind of detail, described from a child's eye view, "that they just couldn't have imagined, or couldn't have been led to say by too-aggressive questioning." He said he was also convinced by the "embedded responses," by which some external stimulus reminded the children of something that their memories had suppressed. Dr. Wehrspann elaborated on this phenomenon by saying, "Nobody's setting this up. They go to a funeral and ask if someone's been killed. They've got killing on the brain."

The psychiatrists noted that the conversations between the children, where Janis tried to get Linda to retract her statements, also served to confirm that the allegations were true. "There is not one denial by Janis where the reader does not end up being more convinced of the truth of material being denied," Dr. Steinhauer observed. He added that the children's apparent ambivalence in their feelings towards their parents and the extreme conflict they showed in making their disclosures are not seen in children who are confabulating: "There's a real conflict going on in the souls of these little girls."

The team from the Hospital for Sick Children did consider in their report the possibility that Mrs. McInnis might have fabricated her accounts of the children's conversations and concluded that she had not.

Dr. Wehrspann, an American who often entertained the court with his colorful turn of phrase, said, "If Catherine McInnis is making this up she's Tennessee Williams, she's Shakespeare. The characters are wonderful.

"This woman is a really good reporter, a very good observer. It's very good quality description. I was impressed with the way she delivered under pressure. When I read over Catherine McInnis's notes, I sat there nauseated with a headache. I don't think you can be human and not read through these notes and have a violent reaction," said Dr. Wehrspann.

The psychiatrist observed that this kind of material would be particularly hard for someone to listen to once they became convinced that what was being described was something that really happened. He explained that it is only to be expected that the foster mother should have started to show symptoms of distress, and that her reports should become blemished with such things as editorial comments and coded references: "Nobody wants to see this, and it's hard to look at this. This weird stuff is really bothering her. She gets a threat to her life and family. She doesn't think the police are willing to support and protect her. It is a very, very traumatic experience. It would be traumatic for any of us. It's important to realize the magnitude of this event in someone's life. We thought she was real upset for legitimate reasons."

Dr. Steinhauer said he was impressed by the foster mother's vigilance, perceptivity and sensitivity to subverbal communication. "Her natural reserve causes considerable discomfort with lurid outpourings of sexual data," he said. "Her indignation and repugnance made it difficult to cope with material which clearly she found morally repulsive. She struggled to overcome a tendency to be judgemental. Basically I find her a very fine foster mother. I have enormous respect for her compassion and strength."

In his court testimony, Dr. Steinhauer said, "I am repelled and discomforted by this material. It was difficult for me. Just the reopening of the thing [in preparation for his testimony] was sufficiently upsetting that I woke up at 3 A.M. and couldn't get back to sleep. She was dealing with this repugnant material on a daily basis. At the Hospital for Sick Kids' meeting I was feeling a bit nauseous at the end of the meeting."

After reviewing the evidence about the second pair of children that Mrs. McInnis had in her home, Dr. Wehrspann said, "Catherine McInnis has overinvested in those stories being true. The children deliver their stories to other people in the same style, with the same characters, giving references to details of where they live, who their friends were. It would be difficult for Catherine McInnis to know these things."

He said he was satisfied that the children were not parroting what Mrs. McInnis had told them, or being coached by her, in making these other reports. He added, "I am very sensitive about how hard it is to get people to change. If people could get people to behave in a way they want so easily, being a psychiatrist or parent would be much easier."

The Sick Children's Hospital report also considered whether the details in the story could be based on a dream or an extended fantasy shared by Janis and Linda, or an attempt to please adults with material they suspected that the adults wanted to hear. The team concluded that, although the children sometimes tried to disguise their descriptions as a dream, the detail and their physical and emotional reactions indicated that they were talking about real experiences. A lack of motive on the part of either the children or the foster mother to fabricate material, and the apparent authenticity of the material, as indicated by their structural analysis, led the team to conclude that it was unlikely that the foster mother had done anything but faithfully record what the children had said. This was also the conclusion that Judge Beckett would eventually reach.

Dr. Steinhauer noted that the conversation about plucking or fucking a chicken was "the sort of thing that people don't make up." He said the girls' descriptions were replete with details that normal children would not make up. For example, he said the description of being lowered into an open grave had "a quality of detail, a quality of horror. You get it from what she sees and what she smells.

"Either these girls have the most unbelievable imaginations, an unbelievable ability to make up these incredibly lurid stories, or they are talking about something that happened to them," said Dr. Steinhauer.

When Arthur Brown cross-examined Dr. Steinhauer about some inconsistencies in the children's stories, such as a certain ambiguity about whether it was their father or mother who had murdered little Elizabeth, the psychiatrist replied, "If you happen to be a small child, and are exposed to multiple murders in the middle of the night, and tell a dozen different people, and people are wearing masks and costumes, you may be confused as to who murdered whom.

"Regardless of what happened," Dr. Steinhauer added, "these are very disturbed girls, and the relationship with their parents and Gary is very much related to the source of their disturbance." He said it would be disastrous to allow these people to have access to the children, when they deny the allegations and inspire the girls with fear. Seeing these people would be "upsetting and traumatic, beyond these children's ability to cope," he said. "One of the biggest tragedies, often worse than abuse, is the efforts by parents in a position of trust to distort children's reality by denying what happened. As long as that much fear is associated with the parents, as long as parents continue to take no responsibility for anything that has happened, it undermines any chance of anyone working successfully with them to change anything."

On the future of the children, Dr. Wehrspann said, "Can you imagine what these children would have to go through before they can trust somebody else? It's going to take a big effort on some adult's part to stick with these children. They started trusting Catherine, and then the threat came and they never saw Catherine again."

Observing that Sharon Wells did at times seek help for herself and her children, Dr. Steinhauer said, "It is possible that this woman is very torn, one part of her wanting the girls to re-experience what she went through, the other part trying to protect them. I would have great concern about Mrs. Wells being any more able to parent another infant more successfully than she has those two children. There is nothing here to suggest optimism that it wouldn't just be a repeat of the same thing."

Michael O'Neail, Gary Evans's lawyer, asked Dr. Steinhauer, "Other than allegations of sexual abuse, have you a basis for assessing the parenting capacity of Gary?"

The doctor responded, "That's like saying 'Other than cancer, what's wrong with the patient?' "

At a meeting on July 29, 1985, the Hospital for Sick Children team presented their preliminary report, which indicated that they believed the sexual abuse allegations and felt that there was enough credibility to the murder allegations to warrant a vigorous investigation. Sgt. Broom and Sgt. Bowen were present but did not appear to be impressed with these findings.

Dr. Steinhauer told the court, "In the first interview, the younger man was reasonably open and hadn't reached any conclusions. In the second meeting the young man didn't open his mouth. The older man seemed to have his mind made up. He was radiating disbelief and disrespect. He took no part in the meeting, except to mutter under his breath. He wasn't interested in what we had to say. I had the feeling that, because these were children, the police tended to dismiss what they were saying as inconsequential. We were giving a highly technical, state-of-the-art analysis, adding to it confirmation from a number of other sources. Bowen was saying, 'We're really not interested in what you are saying.' The police had never seen any of our material at all."

Sgt. Bowen testified that he had tried not to "show an attitude" at the meeting, but was very tired because he had been on night duty. He said he was bothered by a comment made by Dr. Wehrspann, who had told him, he said, that lots of charges had been laid with less evidence than this. Sgt. Bowen said that the psychiatrist suggested that the CAS should see the judge in chambers before the defense lawyers were involved, and try to make him sympathetic to the case.

Dr. Steinhauer contrasted the police unwillingness to believe the children, or to even listen to people who did believe their stories, with the courage displayed by Mrs. McInnis in speaking up on the children's behalf even though she was afraid of ridicule, and eventually began to be afraid for her safety. He was asked if he felt the foster mother was being paranoid in her response to the alleged plot to kill her family, and he responded, "There are times when we, perhaps inappropriately, have felt anxiety about our involvement in so terrible a business.

"I wonder whether in the past things like this have gone on, where people haven't had the courage to bring the information forward," Dr. Steinhauer said.

PART FOUR

THE TRIAL

CHAPTER 14

CHILD WELFARE AND THE COURTS

There is perhaps no subject on which so many people in our society would agree as the need to protect and care for children. While there may be bitter disputes about issues such as abortion, day-care and education, the basic premise that children should receive adequate care and be protected from injury and molestation is universally accepted, irrespective of other social, political or religious beliefs. Even among the most hardened criminals, the child abuser is an object of hatred and contempt.

This universal respect for the basic rights of children is something comparatively new in society. The notion that children are more than the property of their parents, have a distinct status and need special protection in law developed in the 19th century. It was inspired in part by the Romantic movement, which tended to sanctify and sometimes sentimentalize the child, placing particular emphasis on education and the spiritual or emotional growth of the individual. Industrial development began to require an educated workforce and public education programs constituted a first step towards recognizing that the state should play a role in children's lives. The brutal excesses of early industrial society and the breakup of traditional communities led to flagrant cases of cruelty and exploitation of children, and more humane and progressive elements in society responded to this by shaping new child welfare laws and institutions.

While criminal and most civil law has evolved through decrees, statutes and precedents for more than a thousand years, child welfare law is mostly new, and still in a state of flux. When it first developed in the 19th century, the emphasis was on saving children from unsavory backgrounds by placing them in institutions. Institutions were eventually found to be inadequate to serve children's emotional needs, and foster care was seen as a more desirable alternative. Now it is recognized, and in fact stated as a principle in Ontario's new Child and Family Services Act, that the best place for a child to be, if at all possible, is in his or her own home. Instead of saving children from the unfit home, social agencies now devote a lot of energy to trying to make the home fit for the child, giving support to the family through therapy, public health nurses, homemakers and other social or educational programs.

The first principle of Ontario's child welfare laws remains, however, the best interests and protection of children. The law provides that, when it is found that children cannot be protected in their own homes, they can be made wards of the Crown, their parents can, if necessary, be deprived of access and all other parental rights, and the children can be kept in foster care, institutional care or put out for adoption. To make such an order, a judge must be satisfied through a hearing that the children are in need of protection, and that this protection can only be insured by separating them from their parents or guardians.

Child welfare proceedings, which are directed to the protection of children, are not governed by the same rules as criminal trials. There is no question here of guilt or innocence, and the judge is mandated to achieve a solution that is in the best interests of the child. Society has decided that in criminal cases the risk of punishing an innocent person is far graver than that of letting a guilty one go free, and has therefore evolved very stringent standards of proof and a series of laws and precedents that protect individual rights and freedoms. But the risk of leaving children unprotected in an abusive home is considered just as serious as that of unjustly depriving parents of their rights.

The judge in a child welfare hearing does not have to make a finding that is beyond any reasonable doubt, but must weigh the evidence and make a ruling based on the balance of probabilities. In a criminal trial, hearsay evidence, secondhand reports of what other people said, is generally excluded. Hearsay evidence, and even expert opinion based on such hearsay, may be admitted in a child welfare hearing, where the children are often considered too young to testify. The emphasis is not on proving that certain specific acts were perpetrated, but on making a decision based on all the circumstances affecting a child's life.

The Hamilton-Wentworth Children's Aid Society was anxious that the police do a full investigation of Janis's and Linda's allegations, and was clearly anticipating some kind of criminal prosecution. Having failed to find strong corroborating evidence that they could take to court, the police and the Crown attorney decided not to lay any charges. In a criminal trial it would have been necessary to rely on the children's evidence. Even if it had been decided that the children were fit to endure the traumatic experience of testifying in court, under legislation in place in 1985 it would have been necessary first to prove that they were competent to testify, and then have additional corroborating evidence, since the law did not consider a child's testimony to be as reliable as that of an adult.

Legislation passed in 1987 has made it easier for children to testify and have their evidence given the same consideration as adult witnesses'. This involves removing the requirements that children face a special competency test, and that their evidence must be corroborated. They still have to satisfy a judge and jury that they can communicate, and that they understand that they have to tell the truth. Child welfare advocates are hoping that the courts will liberally interpret the meaning of the word "communicate" so that Anatomically Correct dolls and other such aids can be used by very young witnesses. The most important consequence of these changes is that children will not face an initial predisposition, which has hitherto been enshrined in law, not to trust children's evidence.

The peculiar problem that children present to the justice system is illustrated by the fact that, while there is a movement towards giving the same credibility to children's evidence as that of adults', it is also being recognized that it is necessary to make special arrangements, such as the use of videotapes or closed circuit television, to save children from the ordeal of actually appearing in a courtroom. Although some jurisdictions in the United States do allow hearsay evidence in special circumstances, this is not accepted in criminal proceedings in Canada. In criminal trials in Canada children, who are easily intimidated and usually have conflicting feelings about disclosing parental abuse, must still face cross-examination from lawyers representing their parents, the people they usually most love and most fear.

The new criminal legislation allows the use in court of statements made by children before the trial, providing these were videotaped and made within a reasonable time after the alleged abuse occurred. This is only permitted if the child is to be available in court for cross-examination. Child welfare advocates are hoping that this will avoid the necessity of children testifying in many cases, and that in practice defense lawyers will often refrain from cross-examining the children.

Judge Beckett was most insistent that Janis and Linda should not be forced to testify or be cross-examined at the Crown wardship hearing. Their therapist stated that it would be extremely damaging for them to be forced to dredge up their traumatic memories again. When Arthur Brown, the mother's lawyer, suggested calling the girls as witnesses, the judge flew into a rage and told the lawyer that taking such a step would be tantamount to subjecting the children to "ritual torture."

In the Hamilton case videotapes were shown to avoid calling the children as witnesses. These videotapes were of therapy sessions rather than investigative interviews and by viewing that kind of material the court was breaking new ground. The judge used the tapes to see for himself what the emotional state of the children was and to have a better basis on which to assess the opinions of their therapist.

The main problem encountered in this novel use of videotapes was that it took a long time for the court to view them. Almost a month at the beginning of the trial was occupied with the court watching play-therapy sessions. It was not until the therapist testified nine months later that the judge was given an insight on the significance of the interactions he had observed on tape.

Another reason for the extreme length of the Hamilton hearing was that the approach the Children's Aid Society took to the case involved presenting every piece of evidence that could conceivably be relevant. The CAS feared that defense lawyers would make a determined effort to discredit the more bizarre and less substantial aspects of the children's stories. The agency therefore sought to prove that, even if the children's allegations were found to be lacking in credibility, there were grounds for making them wards of the Crown on the basis of the violence, abuse and neglect that they had been exposed to in their home environment. Arthur Brown, Sharon's lawyer, consented to the admission of most of the evidence that the CAS proposed to call, on the condition that all other evidence that could have a bearing on the case be introduced. Sixty-one people were called as witnesses.

By the time Mrs. McInnis completed her testimony it was the end of January, 1986, and the hearing had been underway for four months. Some of that time had been taken up with preliminary matters, delays while reports were filed and studied, and short recesses caused by holidays and scheduling problems. The court had heard the evidence of social workers, teachers and day-care staff, as well as that of the foster mother.

Sharon Wells, who had been more than four months pregnant when the hearing began, was due to give birth at the beginning of February, so the court went into recess to await this event. Just days after her baby girl was born, the Children's Aid Society obtained a warrant to apprehend the infant and take her into care. The agency sought to have the baby declared a ward of the Crown on the basis of the abuse and neglect suffered by her two halfsisters. Sharon instructed her lawyer, Arthur Brown, to oppose this. The baby's father, Gary Evans, who had left Sharon shortly after he made her pregnant, retained Michael O'Neail to oppose the wardship application on his behalf.

Since the CAS was relying on the allegations regarding the older children to make its case for guardianship of the baby, it was agreed by all lawyers that the best way to proceed would be to join the trial of the baby's case to the hearing that was already underway. The addition of the new baby to the case complicated the proceedings somewhat from a legal point of view, as new legislation had come into effect since the case of Janis and Linda began. Fortunately for all concerned, although there are several significant differences between the old Child Welfare Act and the new Child and Family Services Act, they did not have much bearing on the conduct of this case. The new act states as a matter of principle that, while the best interest of children is its paramount objective, support should be given where possible to the autonomy and integrity of the family unit, and that the course of action chosen to protect the child should be the least disruptive one available.

The new statute also leaves less to the discretion of the judge by defining more clearly the grounds that can be used to find that children are in need of protection. The basis for deciding whether or not Janis and Linda were judged to be "children in need of protection" was the Child Welfare Act of Ontario, 1980, section 19 (b) xi: "a child whose life, health or morals may be endangered by the conduct of the person whose charge the child is." The Child and Family Services Act, 1984, spells out the circumstances under which such a finding can be made. It cites physical harm and sexual abuse, or the risk that either of these will happen in the future, as possible grounds for finding that the children need protection. It also states that a judge may base a finding on the child having suffered or being at risk of suffering "emotional harm, demonstrated by severe anxiety, depression, withdrawal, or self-destructive or aggressive behavior." To make a finding on the basis of emotional harm, the judge must be satisfied that the child's parent or caretaker does not provide, refuses or is unable to consent to services or treatment to remedy or alleviate the harm.

Also spelled out in the act are some of the things that the judge may take into consideration when deciding what is in the best interests of the child. These considerations include the child's physical, mental and emotional needs, and the appropriate care or treatment to meet those needs. The statute cites: "The importance for the child's development of a positive relationship with a parent and a secure place as a member of a family.

"The child's views and wishes, if they can be reasonably ascertained," is another item to be considered by the judge. This was a controversial issue at the trial, as the children clearly indicated that, in spite of all the harm they said they had suffered, they wanted to go home. The lawyers representing the children argued, however, that in spite of this natural, though unrealistic, desire, the children should be made wards of the Crown without any access from their parents.

Although much of the evidence at the hearing and the interest that surrounded it focused on the allegations of ritual abuse, it was by no means solely on this sensational material that the judge's final decision was to be reached. Judge Beckett underlined that point by stating in his final judgement, "It must not be forgotten that this is not a murder case, nor is it a case about cannibalism or satanic cults. It is a case about child abuse and whether these children were subjected to abuse or neglect such as to support a finding that they are in need of protection."

THE CHILDREN'S "TESTIMONY" IN COURT

Watching the children on videotape was a haunting experience. More than 20 hours of taped therapy sessions were shown to the court in order to give the judge an opportunity to see the children without putting them through the ordeal of testifying in court. For day after day, the small group of people who crowded into the stuffy courtroom strained their eyes and their necks as they concentrated on a television screen on a stand beside the judge's bench, just a little too far away for anyone but Judge Beckett to watch with any degree of comfort. Not that anyone could feel at all comfortable watching two very likable little girls display their intense anguish in tormented play, as they struggled with their nightmarish memories. Judge Beckett certainly was not at ease as he leaned forward on the bench and peered at the screen with an intensely pained expression on his pale face.

The children's psychiatrist, Alice Oliviera, had chosen to use a technique known as play-therapy. As Dr. Oliviera later explained, this type of therapy involves letting children play, sometimes joining in their games, and using the themes that come out of this play to help them revise any disturbed and distorted mental constructs they might have about how life is, or how people are. Since the defense lawyers had insisted that the tapes be viewed in full or not at all, the court spent many tedious hours watching the children playing with Play-Doh, dancing, screaming and running around the hospital playroom, or engaging their patient, gentle therapist in games of make-believe.

Janis and Linda appeared on the videotapes as neatly dressed, well-groomed children, boisterous and sometimes unruly, but considerate and affectionate, both to one another and to Dr. Oliviera, with whom they gradually developed a warm relationship. This bond with the therapist was a curious one, at the same time loving, guarded and formal. They never called her by her first name, and clearly regarded her as a figure of authority, yet one who was exceptionally tolerant and permissive. She was a slim, refined-looking middle-aged woman, with a warm rich voice, who entered the children's games without inhibition, and clearly had an easy knack of juggling her attention between the two girls.

They sometimes competed quite strongly for her affection, and would often want to be hugged. Like any normal girl they loved to play house, but the themes of these games were a frightening departure from domesticity. They would pretend that people in the household were being kidnapped and killed. Games that began with pretending to cook a family meal would end in enactments of death and destruction. They liked to pretend to be babies, which gave them an opportunity to cling to Dr. Oliviera and cry despondently. Then they would tell her that the babies were in danger of being killed or kidnapped, scream for her to rescue them and sob hysterically in her arms.

In one session, the girls pretended to be babies who were being cooked in ovens. They climbed into cupboards and screamed for Dr. Oliviera to rescue them. Janis said, "I got cooked up." As the court was shown the tape of the children screaming and swinging on a metal bar inside the cupboard, Sharon Wells watched, anxiously shaking her head and reaching out with her hands as if to try to catch her children. Later in the same session, Janis pretended to phone the police to tell them, "There's this lady that stabs people. This is so impossible I can't even believe it." She smashed the toy phone down and began banging it against the furniture, screaming, "The cop said I don't want to talk to you again." Then she picked up the phone again and shouted, "When are you coming, you stupid cop."

Linda told Dr. Oliviera that her mother and father and Gary had stuck their fingers in her. Janis interrupted to say that her dad didn't do it. She said it was awful and didn't want to talk about it. The girls both evaded any attempt that the therapist made to get them to talk about the bad things that had happened to them. She later testified, "The children only spoke of traumatic events by blurting them out, or in response to a demand perceived from me, always with intense conflict."

Dr. Oliviera noted that Janis was attached to her mother and wished to return to her. The doctor thought it unusual that Linda did not seem to want to go home to her mother. The psychiatrist said, "Janis was carrying a constant conflict between wanting to deal with these terrible events, and knowing that to talk about them would jeopardize her chance of returning to her mother."

These conflicts became particularly acute when the children had supervised visits from both parents. The girls seemed ambivalent during these sessions, which were conducted as part of an assessment of Sharon's and Gordon's parenting capacities. Eight days after the visit with their mother, Janis made her first statements in therapy concerning the allegations she had earlier made to other people. "Okay, I'll talk now," she said. "My mom sticked her finger in us. How's that? That's enough."

The therapist said she understood that this was a hard thing to say, as she understood how much Janis loved her mother. She explained to the child that she was worried that it might happen again.

"That's why you're not taking us home, right?" said Janis, who then told the therapist, "Well, we went to Channel 11 and they stuck their fingers in us."

Dr. Oliviera asked the child if she had seen the people sticking their fingers in at Channel 11. Janis responded, "If you guys understand one little bit, it would be nice and easy for us."

"Little by little, we'll try to figure it out," the therapist told the child.

"No, you gotta figure it out by tomorrow, or today," Janis demanded. When she was later asked if there were other bad things that happened to her, Janis said, "We saw everything that we can . . . I feel like crying right now, but I can't cry."

Janis continued to talk to Dr. Oliviera until she was interrupted by Linda, who said, "Something's going to happen to somebody if you don't stop talking. . . . Somebody will come in this room and take somebody away from somebody else."

"Nobody will do that," said Janis.

"Yes, they will," insisted Linda. "We need all of us in the family. We don't need somebody taken away." The child began to shout angrily, and said she was mad, "because I realize everything . . . everything is happening . . . I'm in trouble . . . everything is wrong."

After another little argument with Janis, Linda said, "And my mom sticked her fingers in us and our dad sticked a couple of fingers in us."

"Dad did? And what about Gary?" asked Dr. Oliviera.

"He did too. And my mommy did it. But nothing is wrong. But something is wrong."

During the next session Dr. Oliviera and Lesley Morgan questioned the children more about their stories, and Janis told them, "It's sad all the things that happened. But you guys never saw it. So that's why you're asking us. You guys should already know by now."

"But, Janis, one of the things that I wondered is how often does it come into your mind now, the bad things that happened?" said the psychiatrist.

"Really often."

"Really often? Like every day, or every week, or . . ."

"Maybe every Saturday or Sunday, but the only thing I want to know is . . . how did it happen?" said Janis. When Dr. Oliviera questioned her further on this concern, she said, "Okay. Now I'll tell you once more. Okay? Okay, I am really apositive that some of these things I should have said no, but they would still do it. And now, what we really want to know is how they done it, and how they started it."

Dr. Oliviera asked Janis if she ever thought of saying no. "I think I said no. Okay," Janis snapped testily, "but we can't stop it, from doing it."

Linda said, "My dad can stop it. He can get his knife out and stick it up."

"And say, 'I am the power of Greyskull,'" said Janis.

"Yeah, with the knife. He can say 'The power of Greyskull.'"

"And do you think that might stop Mom and Gary from doing bad things to you girls?" asked Dr. Oliviera.

"No," said Janis.

"No, it wouldn't stop them?" the therapist repeated.

"Yes, that would," insisted Linda.

"Yes, I think it would, yeah," said Janis.

"Did Daddy know about the bad things?" Dr. Oliviera asked.

"Yes, 'cause he saw," Linda replied, but Janis interrupted saying that this was not true. She told her sister, "We better not say that he done it, 'cause we're not going to talk about it."

In distress, Linda talked about things that were happening to her that were "rude." Dr. Oliviera told her reassuringly, "Sometimes little girls think it's their own fault, what's happened."

"It ain't our fault, dingbat," Linda replied.

"I felt my hypothesis about Linda's feeling guilty was disconfirmed," Dr. Oliviera later testified.

Janis, who had been appearing increasingly disturbed during this exchange, climbed into the closet they had gone into when they played at babies being cooked in ovens. "My mom sticked her fingers in us, but I think that she never knowed us," she said in an hysterical voice, which changed into something like a song or a chant, as she added, "My dad done it too. My dad done it too. My dad, dad done it too."

"Janis, we can't blame our dad," said Linda urgently.

"Why not?" asked Dr. Oliviera.

"And Gary done it too," intoned Janis, still in the cupboard.

"He didn't do it. He didn't. Dad didn't do it, Janis," screamed Linda.

Linda began to sing, "Something's going on. It won't happen. I mean something's going on, and it won't happen. Something's going on and it will happen."

"But Mom sticked her fingers in us," said Janis.

"I'm making cookies. I'm making cookies," said Linda, picking up the Play-Doh, and engaging in one of her favorite make-believe games.

The psychiatrist and the social worker had agreed in a meeting before this session that they should give the children some explanation that they could understand about why their mother might have done what she did to them. They agreed that the best way to explain it was to say that the girls' mother was sick, which they believed was the case. Lesley Morgan spoke to Janis, who was still hiding in the cupboard, "Remember, Janis, when you first came into foster care, and we said Mommy was sick?"

"Yeah."

"Do you remember you said, at one time, I think you said that she was getting better?"

"Yeah."

"Well, we sort of think that maybe Mommy is still sick, and that's why she did those things to you and Linda."

As this videotape was played in court, Sharon had been looking more and more despondent. She had been shaking her head and muttering to herself. At one point, she said, "Shit," dropped her head to her knees with a violent movement and sat for a long time with her head in her hands. When she heard the social worker tell the child she was sick, Sharon got up, waving her hands and shouting at the court, "I wasn't sick like that. She's making it all up. I don't want to listen to that. She's saying to my kids that I'm sick."

Sharon stormed out of the courtroom, and the tape was wound back to Lesley Morgan's explanation, and Janis's response, which was quite similar to her mother's. "I'm not going to listen to any more. Okay? That's enough, okay?" the child said.

"You don't like to hear that your mommy's sick," said Dr. Oliviera.

"She's better," said Janis.

"She's better, is she?" asked Lesley Morgan.

"Yes," Janis replied.

"No, she isn't," said Linda. "She isn't. She's not better."

"If she says she won't do it, can we go home?" asked Janis.

Dr. Oliviera replied, "It's a very hard decision because we know you love her very much."

"Yeah, but if I just told her not to do it, can we?"

"Mommy won't say that she did all those bad things to you, and I think it's hard for us to know that she won't do them again," said the therapist.

"She will. She will," screamed Linda.

"Yeah, we think she will, too," said Dr. Oliviera.

"I wish we can go home, but we can't," said Linda, hugging Dr. Oliviera, who then realized that the child had wet herself in her distress.

Linda looked very upset when the girls arrived for their next session with Dr. Oliviera a week later. "Can we talk?" she asked the doctor.

As was so often the case when one child wanted to talk, her sister tried to disrupt. "I'm going to be the baby, but we're not going to talk about anything right yet," said Janis. She played at being a very unhappy, demanding baby until Lesley took her out of the room, so that Linda would have a chance to talk to Dr. Oliviera alone.

"Something was bothering you on the way here. What were you thinking about, when you were coming here? Were you worrying about your mommy?" Dr. Oliviera asked. The child did not answer and the psychiatrist continued, "Last time we were talking about how hard it is to understand that Mommy loves you and you love Mommy, but Mommy did some bad things."

"She didn't. It was a lie," said Linda.

"Is that right? When did you decide that, Linda? Did someone tell you to say that? Who told you to say it was a lie?"

"My mom."

"Oh, when did she tell you that?"

"When we were with her the other day."

"Did she say you mustn't talk to me?"

"That's right."

"Did Mom say that something bad would happen if you talked to me about all these things?"

"Yeah, something really bad."

"What would happen? What did she say would happen if you talked to me about all these things?"

"Really bad," Linda repeated.

"Yeah?"

"She'll stick another one in us. Another birdie."

"Into you?"

"That's what I said. A black birdie."

"She said she'd stick another black birdie into you?"

"Yeah, and its white wings, and its black head," said Linda, whose fear seemed to subside somewhat until she suddenly pointed to a picture of a bird on the wall of the playroom, and said in a state of extreme agitation, "See that thing, that bird right there. That's what she's gonna stick in us, if I tell you."

It was a very somber group of people who watched these videos in the court. Journalists who are used to encountering all kinds of horror with professional detachment would sit brooding over their coffee during the breaks, and would find the image of these tormented children returning to them at night. For the women, particularly, the references to the bird conjured up unbearably painful images, and it was almost impossible not to identify with these little girls, who tried to drown their traumatic memories in old familiar childhood games.

Arthur Brown, in his closing arguments at the hearing, noted that people who saw the children tended to believe their stories, while people who did not see them remained skeptical. This was an odd argument for the mother's lawyer to advance, and it would appear that the point that he was trying to make was that it was easy to be taken in by these little girls. But Harper, the CAS lawyer, saw this observation as simply underscoring a point that he also had wanted to make, that one only had to see the children on video to realize that the trauma and anguish they showed when they talked about what had happened to them were not things that could be either fabricated or coached.

Lee Coleman, the psychiatrist who has challenged the techniques of therapists and interviewers in many of the American child abuse cases, has stated that one only has to look at tapes of therapy sessions to see how children are manipulated. He said that if the media had been allowed to see these tapes they would have instantly recognized that the children's allegations were phony. All of the journalists who saw the tapes in the Hamilton case, which were shown early in the hearing, started out being highly skeptical of the children's allegations. After watching the children through 20 hours of therapy sessions, they were all prepared to accept that the children could be telling the truth, and that certainly there had been some horrendous disturbance in these young girls' lives.

In the next session that was shown to the court, Linda again talked about the bird, and about being forced to eat "poo" and drink "pee." She said Gary had told her "it was good, when it wasn't." She went on to say, "My dad killed three people, Elizabeth, little Elizabeth." The therapist asked her who the other people were, and Linda said, "They're little children like us, like Janis and me."

Linda appeared relieved that she had talked about these things, but Janis was extremely upset and did everything she could to disrupt her little sister's communications. Dr. Oliviera did not press the children after this session to disclose more of what was obviously so painful and difficult for them to talk about. She concentrated more on helping them to work on their feelings through play and their interaction with her.

In a session on November 1, Dr. Oliviera saw each child separately, and asked them, "What's Halloween like for kids?" Linda talked about kidnapping, and Janis talked about murder.

While Janis played she would occasionally let out what Dr. Oliviera described as "blood-curdling screams, ear-shattering screams." The therapist said she had never heard a child scream like that before, and it suggested to her that "this little girl has a lot inside to scream about."

Dr. Oliviera noted that, although Janis had evidently been exposed to a horrendous family interaction, she was still very attached to her father and mother, and that is what one would expect to see, even in badly physically, sexually and mentally abused children. She testified that the children were told that their father and mother would visit them over the Christmas holiday, and Janis said, "Please, pretty please, I want to go stay one night with Mom and Dad because I miss them. I'll give you a house. First I want to see Daddy and then Mommy. I want to stay one night."

The Christmas visits by the parents were authorized by Judge Beckett. A court order of May 28, 1985, terminated the parents' access rights and since then they had been allowed to see the children only once, shortly before the trial commenced. The purpose of that earlier visit was to allow the psychiatrists who were assessing them to make some observations about their behavior with the children.

The psychiatrist said she found it unusual that Linda didn't want to see her father. She said Linda told her that her father had forbidden her to speak, and she was afraid he would kill her with a knife to the neck because she had seen her father make that threat to her mother.

When Sharon visited with them she demonstrated that she was able to play well with them, and showed a lot of love for them, but was also quite manipulative. When she talked to the girls about visiting their relatives, the children started talking about death and showed a great dislike of all their relatives. Linda said, "I don't like Uncle Fred, because he says you got to eat poo."

"Do you eat poo?" Sharon asked, in a theatrical tone.

Linda and Janis laughed as they gave the negative answer that was clearly expected of them.

Sharon pointed to the bird picture on the wall, to which Linda had referred in the taped therapy session, which Sharon had already seen in court. "Pretty bird, isn't it," the mother remarked. When Linda did not assent to this, Sharon said, "You don't like that bird? Dull colors, eh?"

Sharon told a story about a movie character who shot his eye out. She said this wouldn't have happened if he had listened to his mother, because "mothers always know."

When the therapy sessions resumed after Christmas, Janis told Dr. Oliviera that the visits had been confusing and scary, but added, "My mom didn't hurt me."

In the next session, Dr. Oliviera showed the children a videotape called Feeling Yes, Feeling No, designed to help school children deal with sexual advances and assaults by adults. Janis was enthralled and watched it avidly with her mouth open. She wanted to see it a second time and then re-enacted two of the scenes. She said, "This is very important to me."

When she arrived for the next meeting a week later, Janis went straight to the video and put it on. As she watched it she said, "What if someone is touching you and you like it?" Dr. Oliviera told her it is wrong, and Janis replied, "If this happens, children are put in a foster home."

Linda said she was afraid it would happen again if she returned home. The two girls argued about whether it would happen again. Janis was very sad, and sang, "Yucky things in the home, but everything is alright, and God will look after you."

Although she did not feel that her therapeutic goals had been achieved with the children, Dr. Oliviera decided to put their therapy on hold because she thought that the degree of pain and conflict that they were experiencing was irresolvable. Janis knew perfectly well that if she talked, she confirmed reasons not to go home to her mother. The therapist felt it was too difficult for the child to deal with this issue while her fate was in limbo.

Dr. Oliviera told the court that she concluded from the 26 therapy sessions she had with the children that they were describing things that they had experienced, and that they witnessed events that they interpreted as murders. She said the children's stories could not be interpreted as fantasies. She noted that Janis and Linda were "unusually unimaginative children," and said that, even when children have very active, rich fantasy lives, they are generally able to distinguish between what is fantasy and what is reality.

The psychiatrist said she could draw some conclusions on the nature of the children's relationships with their parents and Gary Evans on the basis of the fact that the children made these allegations, irrespective of whether or not they were true: "For children to make these statements about their caretaking figures, the relationships must be grotesquely and bizarrely distorted. It just doesn't happen otherwise that children would say these things about their principal caretakers.

"I feel these children have some very disturbed mental constructs. Our responsibility as a society is to help them revise them so they can lead healthy lives. I feel strongly they should have more therapy," Dr. Oliviera told the court.

She said that such therapy would be impossible as long as the children have any contact with their mother and father or Gary Evans: "The children described experiencing sexual abuse at the hands of these three parenting figures, but had never received any acknowledgment or confirmation from these people that validated their own experience or enabled them to deal with it or understand why it happened, or have any reassurance that it would not happen again, which both had some doubts about; Janis hoping it wouldn't and Linda feeling surely it would. They both understood that there was a prohibition from either mother or father against discussing these issues, and so it was impossible for me to see how they could reach any resolution on these extraordinarily difficult things for a young child to integrate, and move on in their development while in either continual or intermittent contact with people who deny their having happened and prohibit their dealing with these issues."

Michael Hartrick, Gordon Wells's lawyer, asked the therapist if these comments meant that "the father has either got to say, 'Yes, I killed three children,' or he is not going to see his children. If it didn't happen, he's not going to see the children again."

Dr. Oliviera responded, "Something happened. These children believe they saw their father kill children. No explanation at all has been offered which helps the children make sense of their reality. He would have to explain to me why the children would think these things. Either it happened, or something happened, which I could understand that the children could interpret as those events."

Arthur Brown, cross-examining on behalf of the mother, asked whether the children were fit to appear in court to testify. Dr. Oliviera replied, "It is clear that what they said to me was reported in the midst of enormous internal conflict on their part. To have the children in court would be a very frightening experience."

Dr. Oliviera said the children needed a decision on their future soon. The court in fact failed to meet their needs in this respect, as it would be another nine months before Judge Beckett was finally able to deliver his judgement. The therapist said, "The children need as soon as possible to be in a stable living situation which they see as stretching into the future. They need to be able to integrate, and make sense of, the anxiety-provoking, difficult experiences that they report. They need to make sense of the bizarre events in their lives, and to integrate them into a view of themselves as good and lovable children. They have to learn to make sense of the world, its predictability, its benignness."

She warned that if they do not deal with these issues they would have to "seal off an area of experience which had a major impact on them, and is impossible to deal with." She said that in later life these experiences would break through in flashbacks. The consequences of these unresolved childhood traumas would emerge in their own parenting behavior, in an inappropriate interest in sexual experience at too early an age. Their self-esteem, and their sexual and marital relationships would be affected, and young people with such problems are more likely than other people to become prostitutes, Dr. Oliviera said.

Even with treatment, Dr. Oliviera said she was not completely confident that the children would flourish. She told the court: "In the best of circumstances, it is a chillingly large therapeutic task. I still don't know if they will turn out to be okay young women, okay young mothers."

THE MOTHER'S TESTIMONY

In spite of all the shocking and unusual testimony heard during the first 12 months of the trial, no-one in the court was prepared for Sharon's dramatic courtroom breakdown while under cross-examination in October, 1986. The scene stunned everyone who saw it, and aroused widespread sympathy and concern among those who read or saw the sensational media accounts. The image of a young mother being wheeled, strapped to a stretcher, from a court where she had spent more than a year fighting for the return of her children became a sharp focus for public debate about the strange process that was unfolding in the Hamilton court, and the bizarre and disturbing phenomenon that it represented.

On the 114th day of the hearing Sharon Wells began her testimony. She looked like a frightened child as she took her place in the chair beside the judge's bench. Her eyes darted around the courtroom. Her whole body was shaking, and her breathing accelerated to the point where she obviously had difficulty speaking. "I waited for this day, and now I'm scared," she said in a tremulous voice.

"Take your time. Catch your breath," Judge Beckett said soothingly.

Sharon seemed to have difficulty remembering where she lived when Arthur Brown asked his first, very basic question. As the lawyer gently led her into an account of her horrific childhood, the woman seemed to lose her self-consciousness, and began to give very moving and vivid testimony about the consequences of abuse and deprivation. At one point she hesitated to answer a question about her mother and looked over at the reporters, who were writing furiously. "Me and my mom are on good terms right now, and if I start cackling about the way she kept her place she might pounce on me. Are they allowed to print everything?" she asked.

"Try to forget the media are here," Brown told her.

She did seem to forget as she went on with her harrowing story, and seemed sometimes to be reliving the anguish that she had suffered throughout her tragic life. It took her more than a day to describe her childhood, her relationship with Janis's natural father, Ross, and her tumultuous marriage to Gordon.

Near the end of her second day of testimony, Brown began questioning Sharon about her use of a videocassette recorder that Gary rented for several months in 1984. She said the girls watched films on it that Gary had got for his little sister. She listed some of the titles of films they saw: Care Bears, Bedknobs and Broomsticks, Goofy Sports, and Purple Rain. She told the court about a film called Last House on the Left, which she said she rented for her brother, Mike. That was the same brother who had been accused of sexually assaulting Janis a few years before. Sharon said she was back on good terms with him, though she did not leave him alone with the girls.

"I didn't watch all that movie. I wanted to get Mike a videotape that I thought he would like. I saw a box with a woman running from a house. I figured the house was full of spooks," she explained. "As he watched it, he just called it a sick movie."

Sharon said that the children were playing in their bedroom while Mike was watching the film in the living room, and she was cooking in the kitchen. She said she wandered in and out of the living room and so did the children. She said she would send the girls back into their bedroom whenever she saw them in the room where the television was on, and also "scooted them out" when Mike told her they were watching it. She said she did not know how much of the film they saw, but they did have an opportunity to see some of it.

Brown told the judge that he wanted the court to see the film, as he felt there was a similarity between its subject matter and some of the allegations made to Catherine McInnis. The judge asked when the movie was shown, and Sharon said it was in 1984, and she would have to try and get a record of when she rented it to pinpoint the exact time. Brown said he had not been able to find such reports. The judge said he had not been told where it was shown.

"If the court is confused . . ." Brown began to say.

The judge responded sharply, "The court is not confused. The court is not informed."

Sharon explained that it was in her apartment in Toronto. The judge said he was still not satisfied that the film that Brown proposed to show was properly identified by Mrs. Wells. The lawyer asked his client to tell the court all that she remembered about the film, which, it soon became apparent, was very little.

"Her memory of it is very vague," said the judge. "No story line, just a few pictures: a raped girl, a finger with a ring."

Sharon said, "The reason I remember it is my brother said to me, it's one of the grossest movies he's ever seen, and my brother's seen a lot of movies."

It was already about 4:30 P.M. and the judge asked the lawyers if the morning would be a more appropriate time to watch a gross movie. Hugh Atwood said, "I have trouble enough handling my coffee in the morning." The court agreed to watch the film, and the judge asked Sharon to leave the courtroom while it was being shown.

After viewing the film, Judge Beckett glared at Brown with a look of extreme disgust, and stumbled as he hurriedly left the darkened courtroom. He later wrote in his final judgement, "I must say that her brother's description of the film as being 'sick and gross' was an understatement. The film depicted brutal scenes of murder and dismemberment of two teenage girls."

The film did not provide an instant explanation for the girls' bizarre statements, but it did give everyone who saw it in the court pause to think about what sick images of violence are readily available in society. It was profoundly shocking to realize that this inartistic, humorless celebration of sadistic sexual violence is readily available at video stores and marketed as popular entertainment.

When she resumed her testimony the next morning, Sharon said she had remembered more details about the film. The judge was very skeptical about her further descriptions of the movie. He noted: "It was apparent that, overnight, she had had a very sudden and almost total recall of details of the film. She even remembered the last scene in the movie, a chainsaw murder, about which she had gone to some trouble the day before to tell me that she had not recalled. She was even able to remember precisely what she had cooked for dinner that night.

"Sharon Wells seemed to offer this film as an explanation for some of the children's allegations of murder and dismemberment. However, she failed to mention this film to anyone previous to her testimony in court; not to the CAS, the police or to her own psychiatrist," said the judge. He stated that he did not believe her testimony about the film, especially after hearing evidence called by the CAS that the video store where she said she rented the film did not even have the film at the time she said she got it, and had no record of her ever taking it out.

Sharon testified that Janis knew how to operate a VCR, and that the children also saw videos at her brothers' and sisters' homes, as well as at Gary's and Gordon's. She said that the other films they saw included Clash of the Titans and The Dark Crystal. She said that in The Dark Crystal animated characters go on a journey through winter and dark spaces, and see witches are stirring something in a pot from which heads pop up. She also mentioned a scene in Clash of the Titans where a head is chopped off. She said she let the children watch Poltergeist on television, and now believes she was wrong in letting them see it. She said she was very careful not to let the children see programs like "Dynasty," which showed people in bed with each other.

Sharon told the court, "I cannot say I'm 100 percent sure Gary didn't sexually abuse my kids. But I can say I'm 100 percent sure I didn't sexually abuse my kids. As God is my witness, I never sexually abused my kids once. I would never put them through the pain I went through."

She said Gary did have the opportunity to abuse them. She said Gary was very upset when she got pregnant with the new baby, and told her she should have an abortion. She said she prayed, and opened the Bible randomly at "A seed will grow for the next generation." She said she took this as a sign that she should keep the child. Sharon testified that she did not think Gary gave a damn about the child, as he had not even wanted to have pictures of the baby, and had never asked her what the baby looked like. She said Gary asked her, "What am I going to tell my next girlfriend about a kid that I had?"

"I see her for one-and-a-half hours, twice a week. I love her. She's my daughter. She's beautiful. I never thought she'd come out so good. She's just beautiful. We play," Sharon said. "She laughs at me when she sees me. I think she knows who I am. I can't be certain."

Sharon claimed to have seen very little of her ex-husband, Gordon, since the court case began, an assertion that, the judge noted, was not supported by a comment she made about the fact that she had not seen Gordon wearing his knife on his belt since the trial began, but had noticed it in his car.

While Sharon vehemently denied any involvement in a plot to kill the McInnises on the May 1985 long weekend, the judge said he found her account of what she did that weekend "left a lot to be desired" and was "to a degree, at least, fabricated."

"What would I gain from killing her?" Sharon asked, "Sure, I was angry in the beginning. I thought she was sick. I thought she should have a one-way ticket up the mountain with a straitjacket. Now I have a different idea of Mrs. McInnis. I sat through her whole testimony. I can't say I think she's an upright, nasty person. I think she thought she was doing right. I think maybe she exaggerated things the children said. I think she perceived what my kids were saying in a different way from what they said it. Sure they said some things to her. I wasn't there. I can't actually say what was said, what went on. I never ever wished her dead. Say I wanted to do that, would I have any chance of getting my kids back if I blew up the McInnises?

"Gary and Gordon are just as the colors they are, black and white. They hate each other," she said. "For the three of us to get together to kill the McInnises, that's farfetched, if you ask me."

Arthur Brown introduced into evidence numerous pictures and coloring books that had belonged to the children, and among these he solemnly produced two Cabbage Patch dolls. Elizabeth, together with her official adoption papers, and Laura, who, Sharon explained, did not have any papers, were formally entered as exhibits. The court clerk marked them as exhibits 119 and 120, placing little tags on the front of each doll, and carefully sat them side by side on top of a row of paper file folders. Little more was said about the dolls or their significance to Sharon's case, but they sat there through the balance of the hearing, symbolizing, perhaps, the two children, the absent protagonists in this protracted tragedy.

Brown continued to question Sharon through five days. He next asked her if she had ever used a vibrator. She responded with almost theatrical tones of disbelief, "I'd never seen one of those up until a couple of months ago. Me and my mom went to a lingerie party. I thought it would be just nightgowns and such like. They had more than nightgowns there. I was embarrassed. They had vibrators and pants that you can eat. I'm serious, they did. Jelly stuff and two little ball things that woman walk around with in the supermarket. I swear to God, never in my life."

She said the children only saw Gary and her in bed on one occasion: "When I have a relationship, I have it in the bedroom with the door shut." Asked if she discussed the facts of life with the children, she said, "I explained about periods, what I know about them.

"I'm the type of person who doesn't like to look at men down there. When Gordon was finished he always put on his underwear, and Gary, when he went to the washroom, put a towel on. When it comes to looking at men, I'm very self-conscious," Sharon testified. She said she used to tell the children "their body's their own. Nobody gets to touch it but them. I always used to ask them, 'Can I wash you downstairs.' If they don't want me to, I would let them do it themselves. I wanted to stress to them that their body's their own. Lots of times I'd put cream on Linda, she would say, 'Mommy that hurts.' I would let her do it herself."

She said she thought that perhaps the children got the idea about her sticking things in them from her using a thermometer to check their temperatures. Brown wanted to file a thermometer as an exhibit, but the judge told him testily that he knew what a thermometer looked like.

She gave an explanation, which the judge found "very strange," for the allegations about the bird. She said, "I had put an old couch on the balcony [in Toronto]. There was a hole in the part you sit on. Some birds made a nest in there. I asked Gordon to help me get the birds out of there, and we were to get rid of the couch, and that's what we did with the birds, we took the old blanket that I had, and we put the birds on the blanket and put them beside the door, and the birds died, and we had to throw them out. Like, they didn't live. We would watch them every morning."

Judge Beckett noted that she had said the birds were black, and concluded, "I found this explanation unbelievable, and I do not accept it. I thought it strange that birds would be nesting on the 20th storey. No other witness was called to corroborate this evidence. It is significant that at no time Mrs. Wells gave this explanation to the CAS or to the police."

Sharon was very hesitant when she was asked for explanations about the alleged killings and mutilations, and offered the possibility that the girls' stories were inspired by the cutting off of the head in the Clash of the Titans. The judge observed, "It's interesting to note that Mrs. Wells made no mention of the Last House on the Left at this stage in her evidence."

"When asked about the children's allegations about Channel 11, she seemed very uncomfortable and took a long time to explain her answer," Judge Beckett noted. Sharon explained that they often went by the television studio, but "we only looked in it, we have never ever been right inside of it."

Sharon had no explanation for the children's allegations about graveyards, though she said they did ask her about a graveyard that they used to pass on the bus, and she told them that was where the dead people were. She denied any knowledge of satanism or satanic cults. She described the children being scared by people in masks on Halloween.

Judge Beckett stated in his judgement that during the course of her testimony, "she went through many mood swings, often slumped in the chair, sometimes with her head down, not answering questions for long periods of time, sometimes appearing extremely excited and other times flat and almost disinterested."

Sharon told the court, "I'm not going to stop. These are my children. I know I didn't do nothing to them. I'm going to fight until I can't fight no more, until there's no life in me to fight.

"I think I can take care of them, but I think I'll need help. Teach me better than what I've learned. There's so much to kids that I don't know and that I have to learn. I want my kids back. I love them very much. I want them to get to know me, to remember me again. I don't even know if they talk about me," she said. "I gave the CAS two necklaces to give to my kids, to tell them I still love them and am fighting for them."

She also gave what could be taken as a hint that there were other recourses open to her. She told the court that she knew the identity of the baby's foster mother, and knew her car, "But I'm taking the legal road."

The cross-examinations began gently, in a good-humored tone, as Michael Hartrick questioned Sharon about her ex-husband. He had asked her about Gordon's treatment of the children, and she had told him that he never hit Janis in the face. Then she said, "He kicked her toy one time, and broke it, because she smashed his skull ashtray. He kicked her turtle and broke the foot."

Hartrick responded, "We're dealing with a satanism trial here. Is this something we should be worried about?"

Sharon laughed as she replied, "No, it was made of ashtray stuff."

Hartrick turned to the allegations of marital violence, and said, "I suggest that he did not come at you with the machete, but whacked it into the wall."

"We both have different views of what happened."

"I suggest that if he was trying to strike you with the machete he could have done so."

"Yes, he could have. Just like he could have slit my throat with the knife."

"Was the machete something he used regularly, or only on festive occasions, to trim a tree?" asked Hartrick.

"He used it to trim the tree more than once. Other times only when he would show it to his friends."

When Hartrick asked if Sharon took Gordon's threats seriously, she replied, "When he threatened me I believed him. Talking to Gordon now, I think he just shoots his mouth off. There's a lot of people that he said he wanted to kill, that he hasn't done anything about. He even threatened to blow up the income tax people when he didn't get a good return. Well, I'm still here."

"And the income tax people are still here, unfortunately," said Hartrick.

Sharon seemed to take some delight in telling stories about Gordon's exaggerated threats and dramatic acts of violence, and she relaxed under the influence of Hartrick's witty responses.

When the cross-examination resumed again the next morning, she was again highly nervous. Although it was warm in the courtroom, Sharon was shivering, and her teeth were chattering. She put on her coat, folded and unfolded her arms several times and leaned forward, wringing her hands in a frenzied gesture.

The lawyer asked her about her account of the incident where she said Gordon tried to throw her off the 20th storey balcony. He suggested that Gordon was in fact trying to stop her from jumping. She replied, "People can see things differently. That's what I've learned from this trial. Even in some of the videos I've seen with the kids, I can see it one way and you can see it another. It's all in the way somebody looks at something. Me and Gordon had a lot of fights. When he throws the machete and misses my head, I figure he's out to kill me."

Judge Beckett noted that, on the whole, during this cross-examination she seemed to downplay the threats that her husband had made to her. The judge observed that she gave a rather strange answer to a question by Hartrick about whether Gordon worshiped the devil. She took a very long time to answer the question and finally said, "Did he worship the devil? No, not that I know of. He, at times, would say that 'I'm going to come back and haunt you,' because there was times when I would get mad at him and I'd say, 'Well, I wish you were dead,' or something like that and he'd say, 'I can't die. I'll come back and haunt you' sort of thing. But that's as far as I can remember."

Sharon looked frightened as John Harper, the lawyer for the Children's Aid Society, began his cross-examination by explaining to her what perjury is, and then launched into a series of questions about the movie, Last House on the Left. He pinned her down about when and where she had rented the film, and then told her he would bring evidence to show that it could not have been rented at that time from the store she had named. He showed her the box that contained the film, which had a vivid illustration of a woman with her hand above her head, a man with a knife in front of her and a man with a chainsaw behind her. Sharon said she did not remember seeing the men, only the girl and the house in the background. She said she didn't read the writing on the box, which described the film as "A story of terror, involving the death of two girls, kidnapped by a gang, an unbearable and brutal climax never before seen."

Harper questioned her aggressively about her memory of the film, suggesting that she was lying when she claimed to have suddenly remembered minute details while the court was viewing the film. "It was what the judge said. I figured I should remember more. That's why I tried to remember more," said Sharon, who stuck to her story that she had seen bits and pieces of the film in 1984 and not viewed it since. "Please don't scream," she asked the lawyer, who was questioning her sharply and rapidly, but in a normal voice.

"When you saw the movie in 1984, were you not sick at the part where the girl was raped in the woods?" asked Harper.

"I don't remember being sick," Sharon replied.

"Were you not sick at the part where one girl's chest was being cut and bleeding? Did it not bother you?" Harper persisted.

"Yes, it bothered me."

"And you told the court the kids were able to see the movie? You didn't think to shut the movie off?"

"I didn't know what the next scene would be."

"You continued to watch it till the end, where the father cut the man with the chainsaw?"

"I didn't know what was in between."

As Harper asked her why she had never mentioned the movie before she testified in court, Sharon's teeth were chattering again. She began exhaling loudly, and screwing up her face in a look of extreme anguish. Harper said, "I notice that you're shivering."

"I'm freezing," she replied, "probably because I just drunk a cold Coke."

The remainder of the day, Sharon's eighth day on the witness stand, was taken up with cross-examination about her childhood, her relationships and her treatment of the children while they were living in Toronto. Harper tried to expose inconsistencies in Sharon's story, points on which she had said things to third parties that differed from what she said in her testimony. He questioned her about the violent incidents with her first boyfriend, Ross Fuller, and asked her if she was sure that he had been jailed for two years as a result of her charging him with assault. She said she was. He suggested that, after Janis was born, she moved around a lot because she was on the run from the Toronto CAS. He questioned her judgement in allowing her brother Mike to sleep with Janis two nights in a row. He criticized her practice of sending the girls to stay with her mother and stepfather, when she was well aware of her stepfather's perverse interest in children.

For the morning of the next day Harper questioned Sharon further about the children and their injuries while they were in Toronto. He probed the view of Gordon that she had given in her earlier testimony, which was more lenient than that implied by allegations she had made against him in the past. Then in the afternoon he returned to the question he had raised earlier about Ross going to jail. Harper said, "I suggest Ross Fuller was never charged by you, never found guilty of assaulting you. I suggest you lied to this court."

"No sir."

"He was convicted of armed robbery in 1979 and sentenced for two years less a day for armed robbery," said Harper.

"I know he was convicted of holding up a Becker's store. But, yes, I must have got it confused," said Sharon.

"You knew about it?"

"Not until my sister showed me the paper, and laughed in my face about it."

"That was in January, 1979, just a few months after, you say, he was sentenced to two years less a day for assault causing bodily harm," Harper said.

"I know he went to court because I laid charges on him," Sharon replied.

"You said you heard the judge sentencing him?"

"Yes, sir, that's what I thought he said. I know that we went to court because I almost got in contempt of court. Maybe I've got mixed up, sir. Maybe I got them confused. I didn't mean to but I did. Maybe I got confused, but I knew . . . my sister laughed in my face. She said your daughter's father is a milkman bandit."

Sharon began to cry, and continued to repeat, "I know she laughed in my face about it. Maybe I got them confused, but I didn't mean to. But I know I went to court with them."

She controlled her mounting hysteria for a moment, and said, "What happened was, okay, I charged him. Then I got with Gordon. Then I was at my sister's. Then he came there to my place and threatened me with a gun."

She began crying again, and waved her hands frantically, as she shouted, "This whole thing is getting to me. I wake up with nightmares. I can't take it no more. Don't come near me. I can't take it no more."

Sharon got up from her chair, and turned her back on Harper. She was now sobbing and shaking convulsively, and said in a distracted but pleading tone, "I'm so confused about so much. I'm trying to . . . I want to get my kids back. I don't know what's wrong with me."

Brown approached her holding out a paper tissue, but she screamed at him, "Don't touch me, please. Don't hit me."

Her lawyer urged Sharon to walk out of the courtroom, but she was now in a state of total panic. She shouted hysterically, "I can't walk. I can't get my kids back. I want them, and I love them, but I'm not ready. I'm just not ready."

As the judge, lawyers and other people in the court watched in a stunned silence, Sharon slumped down onto the courtroom floor against the wall, in a space between the judge's bench and a stand that held the television set on which the court had earlier watched her children's anguished play. Shaking violently and shrieking, she lay there in a fetal position, while Brown asked for an adjournment and Judge Beckett cleared the court. She continued to yell and scream as an ambulance arrived. A few minutes later she was wheeled out of the courtroom, struggling against the leather straps that bound her to a stretcher.

Judge Beckett later stated, "I must say that I found the episode in court shocking, even frightening. As there was evidence given by Sharon Wells herself that the October 16th episode was similar to breakdowns that she had suffered in the past, and which had been witnessed by her children, there can be no doubt that these breakdowns must have had a stunning and fearful effect on the children."

During the three days that Sharon was recovering in a Hamilton hospital, public concerns were aired about the extreme length of the hearing. At a weekend seminar attended by journalists, lawyers and a family court judge, the wardship hearing became the focal point of a discussion on family court issues. "Was this mother the victim of an abusive legal process?" it was asked, and "Has the Hamilton hearing been allowed to get out of control?" These questions were pursued in newspaper articles, and an editorial in the Hamilton Spectator directly criticized the judge for his handling of the case.

Such public speculation about a case in progress, while common in the United States, is almost unheard of in Canada, where strict contempt of court laws restrict such discussion. When the court resumed the following week, the judge and lawyers spent several hours in chambers, apparently reviewing some of the newspaper coverage with these prohibitions in mind. No action was taken by the court on this issue, but Hugh Atwood did make a statement in court deploring the Spectator editorial, which seemed to take the position that the judge should somehow clamp down on the hearing in a way that would obviously deny the rights of a full judicial process to all parties involved. After the trial the newspaper published an editorial praising the way the judge handled the case.

When the court resumed the following week, Judge Beckett said he had been informed by Brown that Sharon was ready to continue her testimony. The judge said, "I must tell you I'm very uncomfortable. She may very well be physically and mentally ready to resume. But based on what I saw I have very serious reservations about whether she is in a state ready to resume the witness stand."

Harper said he wanted to make a motion that the court should require her to undergo a psychiatric examination before she continued. Brown asked for a moment to consult with his client, saying, "My client probably doesn't understand what's going on here."

"That's the point, isn't it?" said Judge Beckett. "This is not trial by ordeal."

The lawyers discussed whether the judge had the power to order a psychiatric examination, and Judge Beckett settled the issue by saying, "I'm satisfied I have the power. If I don't have the power, I'm going to exercise it anyway."

When the court next convened, Dr. Emil Zamora, the psychiatrist who had first examined Sharon on her arrival in hospital after her courtroom collapse, gave his report on his subsequent assessment of the patient. He gave the opinion that she was fit to testify: "I don't feel she had a psychotic breakdown. She had an adjustment reaction to stress. A dissociative reaction can be very short-lived and is not considered a psychotic breakdown, a nervous breakdown per se."

Hospital notes that Dr. Zamora brought to the court stated that Sharon described how, when Arthur Brown approached her in the courtroom, she felt that she saw the face of her deceased father. The psychiatrist said this was an illusion, a distortion of something she saw, rather than a true hallucination. The hospital notes also stated that Sharon recalled feeling frightened on the witness stand, but also angry about the length of the trial, her childhood and the stress she was suffering. It was also noted on the records that she cried hysterically on the day after she was admitted to hospital, saying that she was expecting to get therapy in hospital, and now she was going to be discharged and nothing had changed. The notes also stated "impaired concentration, memory, fatigue, suicidal thoughts—no plans made, has no supports other than lawyer."

Dr. Zamora testified, "Mrs. Wells seems to have a selective component as far as her memory is concerned. There may be some areas she is either willingly or unwillingly blocking out, usually distressing areas. . . . Her life has been very stressful, parts of her life are a blur to her. In court she felt cornered, didn't know what to do."

The hospital notes stated that Sharon was questioning whether there was another person inside her that could in some way have done the things that she was accused of doing. Dr. Zamora said there was not enough evidence to conclude she was suffering from multiple personalities. He said he believed that the woman would not follow through on the suicidal ideas she had entertained. He said, "She would like this to be over, not to have to go through this. But she does recognize she does have to."

Judge Beckett concluded from Dr. Zamora's evidence that Sharon Wells was mentally and physically capable of resuming her testimony. Looking lost and forlorn, the small, pale woman returned to the seat at the front of the court to continue her ordeal. John Harper, a generally composed and aggressive, but not insensitive, man, also looked uneasy as he prepared to resume his cross-examination.

THE MOTHER'S TESTIMONY CONTINUES

Sharon's fear and confusion were evident as soon as she returned to the witness stand. Her startling testimony during the next few days made it clear that it was not just the court process that frightened her, and not only other people that she was confused about.

"Is there something wrong with your voice?" Harper asked, as Sharon responded to his first few questions in a hoarse whisper.

"I think so, sir, my throat's all dry," she responded timidly.

She was even slower in answering Harper's questions than she had been before, and sometimes repeated the questions several times as if struggling to comprehend them.

She said she had recently met Gordon at her mother's house, where her ex-husband was a frequent visitor. She said he told her, " 'I'm going to testify, but I'd better be on and off in four days,' and he went into one of his spastic fits. I didn't want to talk to him about it, because he just goes on and on about this court case. He always takes a fit and rattles on and on."

"You have told us in your previous evidence that Gordon Wells, since this trial had begun, has threatened Gary Evans?" Harper asked.

"Yes, sir, he has."

"Since this trial began has Gordon Wells threatened anyone else in this courtroom?"

"Yes, sir."

"Who?"

"He has threatened his lawyer; he has threatened you, sir; he has threatened the judge, sir; he has threatened my lawyer, sir; he has threatened me, sir."

"And that was in your presence?"

"The only ones he hasn't threatened is the kids' lawyer and Mr. O'Neail, because he figures Mr. O'Neail shouldn't even be here. But that's the truth, sir, I swear it's the truth."

"When was the last time he said that in your presence?"

"That he has threatened?"

"Yes."

"The weekend past. On the weekend, I don't think he threatened you, sir. He just said he's not going to take a lot of crap from you," said Sharon. She said Gordon threatened the judge on that occasion: "He said that he was going to get him off the bench and going to sue him. He shouldn't be up there."

Sharon looked up at Judge Beckett, and added, "And win a million dollars and pay you off, sir. He said, 'If I have a million dollars I can pay them off.' He threatened at one point he was gonna blow his lawyer away, then me away, then Arthur, then the judge. I said, 'If you're going to blow them away, how can you sue them?' and he said he was going to sue them and then blow them away. He also said he was going to fire his lawyer. He's made a lot of threats like that, but some of them make me laugh. I told him, I said, 'You just have to go in and answer the questions.' You're a lawyer doing a job for your client. But I wouldn't want to blow you or anybody away. I wouldn't go to extremes like that, but Gordon has a different point of view than I do.

"That's the way I remember it, sir," said Sharon, describing how, when her ex-husband makes such threats, "his voice gets really deep and his face gets red. He didn't make these threats all this weekend. The main one he focused on was firing his lawyer, and Arthur. I said, 'You can't fire Arthur.' He said he could."

The judge commented in his judgement: "In observing the manner in which she answered these questions, and comparing them to the manner in which she had answered previous questions, I believe that she was telling the truth with respect to her statements about Gordon Wells's threats to bring harm to people in the courtroom. I found Mrs. Wells's testimony concerning recent contacts with Gordon Wells to be troubling. Bearing in mind her testimony concerning their violent relationship, there seemed little reason why they should be having any contact since the children have been in care. But during cross-examinations, she admitted to four or perhaps five occasions that she had contact with Wells since she started her testimony."

The judge told Sharon he was confused about what seemed to be a change in her attitude to Gordon. He asked her if anyone had made threats against her that would in any way affect her evidence in court. She appeared upset and frightened, said she was not as afraid of Gordon as she used to be, but added, "He said that he would blow me away. If he has to bring a gun into the courtroom, he'll just blow me away."

"I had the impression he issued this threat to you because of something you already said, or something you might say," said the judge.

"He's also threatened, he'll get me up for perjury," said Sharon. "I talked to him last weekend, when he phoned at my mother's. He said, 'My lawyer said you said too much, and I think you said too much, and I'm going to get you for perjury.'"

"Has it affected your testimony?" asked the judge.

"I just told the truth."

"I want to know if you feel you need protection."

"I must say I've been pretty nervous at times, but I just try and tell the truth the way I see it," Sharon replied. "I've had it up to here with his threats. I'm at the point where, do what you want, I don't care. I guess in a way his threats concern me, but I'm in such a confused state, where I don't give a damn. I want to get this whole thing done and over with, and get some help for myself because I need it. And Gordon's threats don't make it any easier.

"That's all I can say," Sharon told the judge. "Like there are other things I know about Gordon that I haven't said."

The lawyers all had a fresh opportunity to question the witness after the judge had done so, and it was inevitable that this hint would be probed extensively by Harper. Hartrick, the father's lawyer, tried to preempt that by asking about it himself. He asked Sharon if there was anything about Gordon relevant to the case that she hadn't disclosed. She told him about a big meat hook that Gordon kept. "It was very ugly-looking and scary," she said. "I don't know where he got it. It weighs about 15 pounds. When I was pregnant with Linda he said, 'If anyone comes through the door, just hook them with it. I couldn't even lift it—it's not funny, sir. It was after this Paul guy that Gordon knew came over with a bunch of friends and kicked in Mary's place. They came up to our place, and apparently Donald had threatened Paul with a knife. They come up to our place and they made a lot of threats back and forth. It was after that that he had that meat hook. They came over to our place and threatened us. The guy showed us a scar of his having a knife cut.

"I guess I was scared to mention anything like that," she said. "I guess because of the allegations."

"Has Gordon Wells ever told you what to say or what not to say?" asked Hartrick. Sharon was silent for more than a minute, and the lawyer asked her, "What's the problem?"

"I'm just thinking."

"Has he ever told you what to say?"

"Not that I can remember."

"Has Gordon Wells ever told you what not to say to this court?"

After another long pause, Sharon asked, "About anything?"

"About what not to say in your evidence. Has he ever said don't say this?" asked Hartrick. "Are you nervous about something? Look at me. Just answer my question. I'm not trying to cause you a problem, just trying to find out the truth."

The judge interrupted, "Mrs. Wells, I can see from here that you're shaking. Your head is down. Are you afraid to answer this question?"

"I'm trying to answer it. Has he ever told me not to say something? I can't answer that."

The judge said, "I can see from here you're extremely upset. You're not answering the question put by Mr. Hartrick. I'm bound to ask you if that's fear of something, because if it is the court will see to it you have whatever protection is required. Are you afraid?"

"To answer that question? Yes, I am. I'm afraid. I just . . ."

"Are you afraid somebody will hurt you?" asked the judge.

"Yes."

"See that policeman at the back of the courtroom. Why do you think he's there? So that people don't have to be afraid. There's ways and means. I'll make whatever order is necessary to protect you in whatever way is necessary. Now tell the court why you're afraid."

"I'm afraid of what Gordon might do to me," said Sharon, "because I've seen Gordon, now. He's really coming to a breaking point. It's not you people he's going to come after. It's me. He's made threats to other people, but it's always me he's come after. I'm just afraid. I told him I just don't care what he does. I just told him I don't care, because I'm just at a point of my life when I have so much hatred for everything around me, and Gordon threatens me, and that just makes me worse."

The judge noted that Sharon continued to show sheer terror as Hartrick questioned her about what it was that Gordon had said that she was afraid to tell. She said that she had met him at a donut shop in Hamilton to give him some pictures of the children, and they had a conversation in the parking lot: "He said that he's going to shut down this court case, and, if he has to, he'll bring some of his satanic friends to testify. I never knew that he had people like that. I was just shocked because I didn't know he had friends like that. And I'm confused whether he does know people like that, because, if he does, I'm scared."

Sharon repeated Gordon's threat again, and said, "I'm very scared. I never knew he had friends like that. He said if I told anybody he'd kill me. If he does have satanic people like that he knows, I'm sure that he's capable. He said, if I told anybody, he'd kill me. He said, if I told anybody, he'd totally deny it."

Hartrick said, "He didn't want you to give us some kind of notice that these potential witnesses are going to come and testify."

"What I got out of it was not to tell anyone that he knew people like that, satanic people," said Sharon. She said she did not ask who these satanic friends were: "I wasn't going to keep asking him about it. I guess it's because I'm really afraid of the answer that he might give me."

Special police protection was ordered for Sharon. When the court resumed the following day, there were several plainclothes policemen outside the courtroom, looking very conspicuous in their light-colored raincoats, and there was a high state of nervousness inside. Hartrick resumed his cross-examination of Sharon by suggesting that her statements the previous day about being afraid of Gordon were in conflict with her earlier testimony.

Judge Beckett said, "The statements are not in conflict. When she said earlier she was not afraid, she could have said parenthetically, 'As long as I don't tell.' The fear arises out of telling yesterday. As long as she didn't tell, she was not in fear. I repeat, I interpret her evidence as: I keep my mouth shut, I have nothing to be afraid of."

"I'm afraid now of Gordon," said Sharon. "If he walked in this room now I'd be afraid of him and what he would do to me. I'm very afraid of him."

Hartrick said, "I would submit that you've been giving us little clues in the last few days, comments about Gary Evans, Gordon Wells and yourself, inviting questions to be asked."

"Maybe subconsciously I wanted someone to ask me. Maybe that's what I did, because it's been eating me up inside. I want to know if he's got satanic friends. Do you think I'm going to ask him questions about it? Maybe because it's been tearing me apart for a long time now, wondering what I should do. Okay, maybe I was wanting somebody to ask about it."

"Your own lawyer knew about this?"

"He said we were going to sit on this, and see what we're going to do about this."

Hartrick continued to ask her about her delay in revealing this conversation, but the judge interrupted, "What I saw, yesterday, was raw fear from this witness, which amply explains her reluctance, her long delay in telling the story. If you didn't see it, I'm telling you what I saw was trembling, stark fear. I heard her say her life was threatened. I dare say you wouldn't have told if your life was threatened."

"I'm suggesting to this witness that it's baloney," said Hartrick. "The question I had asked was why she had chosen that point to finally tell us all."

Judge Beckett replied, "After a reading of the transcript, I don't think anybody in this courtroom would say she chose that moment. The moment was chosen for her."

Later Sharon told the court, "If he actually knows satanic people, I don't want him to have access to my kids. I don't want him near them. It's good to know finally he's threatening somebody else. Maybe you might know the fear I've faced for years. At least I've got protection."

Harper began questioning Sharon on her allegations, and asked her about Donald, one of the people involved in the meat hook incident. He had been the best man at Sharon's wedding and had stayed at her apartment for a period of time. Sharon said she didn't know his last name. She said she understood that he had since died in a car accident.

Sharon said that Janis had been threatened by the intruders in the incident involving the meat hook. Harper said, "I suggest you hid the fact of the meat hook from the court because it might relate to what the children were saying about the allegations?"

"About killing? Because a meat hook could kill somebody? Because a meat hook is a dangerous thing?" asked Sharon.

"It might go to show that what the children were saying was true," said Harper.

"Maybe it would have related to it. But it doesn't mean it's true."

"You withheld it because of that?"

"To tell the truth, sir, yes," said Sharon.

Harper suggested that Sharon's mother and her brothers were Gordon's friends. Sharon said, "I knew they weren't his satanic friends. That's my family."

"Do you know it as a fact? Do you know none of them were involved in any satanic cults?" asked Harper, who reminded her about the fact that Gordon used to hang around with her brothers in the days when they had their room painted black and decorated with skulls. He reminded her about Gordon's picture of the devil, and comments he made in the past about the devil. Harper asked why she should have been shocked when he spoke of satanic friends.

"I didn't add up everything like you're doing. I'm sorry I just didn't," said Sharon.

"I suggest to you, you withheld this from the court because once again it was too close to the allegations," said Harper.

"No, sir, I deny this, yes, I do."

Sharon later told Brown that Gordon had said, "When he reaches the breaking point he doesn't care if he goes to jail for ten years, he's going to bring someone down with him. I feel I'm the one who's going to get it."

She said, "I do feel I did the right thing in talking in court. Although I'm scared, I feel at peace of mind."

Brown had a few more questions. He asked Sharon if she had experienced blackouts where she couldn't remember things. She said she had, and she described memory lapses where she could only recall "blotches of what happened."

When Harper had questioned her about Gary and the children's allegations, Sharon said she had difficulty remembering some things, and added, "That's why I questioned myself, and said, 'Could I be two people.' There's a lot of things I don't remember about my life. That's why I'm questioning myself. Should I remember everything? Gary did say that to me once, that when I get angry I'm like two people. Last Thursday and before that, I have been questioning me as a person, who I am. And like, I'm wondering is there a possibility that I could be. Like, I don't know if I am. But there is a possibility and I want to rule it right out, and I want to know if I did, 'cause as Sharon Wells, as far as I can remember I did not do anything like that to my kids. But is there a possibility that I could have? That's what I want to know."

Sharon's nervousness and hesitancy was gone at that time, as she became totally absorbed in speaking out about the fears that were tormenting her. "I've had such a hard life," she said, almost choking on her tears. "I'm not asking for sympathy. But people who have such a hard life, like me, could be two people. I'm wondering, could I be? I want therapy. I need therapy. I want to know."

Harper asked her why her children were so terrified, and she replied, "I don't know, sir. I don't know. All I know is I never did that to my kids. I never sexually abused them, never ate people, never committed rituals and that. I'm so torn in so many different directions right now. I don't even know who I am. I wake up in the morning, and leave to come here, and I don't know who I am. I have to accept that the possibility exists that I may be two people.

"When I was a kid, and I got hurted, I laughed. Now I cry. Is that normal? It opened up a lot of things. I'm confused. Now if I got the kids I'd say to the CAS, 'Please take them, I'm scared. I might hurt them, because I don't know.' Like when I get an anxiety attack, I don't know if I'll hurt them or not. Like I'm scared of me."

Her lawyer watched with a pained expression on his face as Sharon explained, "That's why I cannot get my kids back now, sir, because I want to explore this possibility."

Harper listed all the children's allegations, asking for Sharon's response. She said that she knew that she, Sharon Wells, did not do those things, but speculated again about whether she might be two people. She said she was willing to have "psychiatrists pick at my brain." She said she wished the CAS would compromise, and just agree to keep the children while she found out if she had multiple personalities.

Once again Sharon began to make a tearful speech to the court. Her lawyer looked anguished, but there was no way for him to stop her speaking her mind. She said, "Could any one of you people in this courtroom sit here where I'm sitting, go through what I went through, and not have a doubt in your mind. I want one of you to sit here, and not have a damn doubt in your mind. Thoughts are racing in my mind, feelings racing through me. I don't know why my kids say this stuff. Maybe it got fabricated. I'm sitting here in a chair, fighting for two kids I love very much, and I want to get them back. I know what I'm saying now might have blown my shot to ever have my kids back again. I am willing to explore any possibility, go through anything, to find out who I am. I don't know who I am. If I am another person, and I did do that to my kids, I don't know if I'll be able to live with it, but I'll try."

She paused, and then said that if she found out that she did those things she wouldn't want the children back. She said she would tell the CAS, "Keep them, raise them, love them, because I know the hurt.

"You have to sit where I am sitting, be where I am, to know what I'm feeling," she told the court. "I feel the CAS should give me the chance, and not stop me seeing my kids for the rest of my life, or the rest of theirs. They're there to help people. It's not easy for me to sit up here and say this. I want to feel secure in my heart and mind that I am not two people."

CHAPTER 18

THE FATHER'S TESTIMONY

The court awaited the appearance of Gordon Wells with nervous anticipation. On the day he had been expected to testify he did not show up. His lawyer, Michael Hartrick, had not been able to get hold of him by phone. Hartrick said he would contact him in person, a task that he did not appear to relish because the father had allegedly threatened both to fire him and to "blow him away." Judge Beckett and Hartrick joked about these threats in court when the judge made reference to the possibility that the lawyer might be replaced. "I hope it's replaced, your honor," said Hartrick.

However, Gordon was not present when the court next convened, even though he had personally assured the lawyer that he would be there. Hartrick called another witness: Gordon's previous lawyer, Cathy Agnew. She was called to testify about Gordon's picture of the sorcerer, which she know he had given to her but had been lost while she was moving out of her office a year before. She said it was a pencil drawing of a menacing face. It was not a picture of a traditional devil, she said. "I wouldn't be afraid of showing it to my children it to my children, but it's not what I would choose to hang on the nursery wall."

Hartrick told the court that he had been informed that his client did not appear in court that morning because he had been arrested the night before for unpaid traffic tickets and had spent the night in jail.

The following day Gordon Wells made his much-heralded appearance. He was a tall man who walked with a slight stoop. As he took his place on the witness stand, he peered nervously about him through dark eyes, deep set in a furrowed brow. Thick wrinkles formed on his forehead as he grinned in response to Hartrick's opening line, "Welcome to Hamilton, Mr. Wells."

Speaking in clipped tones, he gave details of his background. He said he had a grade eleven education, and a good relationship with his parents as he was growing up, though he didn't get on well with his brothers and sisters. He was born in Toronto, and when asked in what part of the city he grew up, replied, "East, west, wherever I was living." He said he had a stable work record, having held one job for eight and a half years. He said he worked up to 13 hours a day at his present job. He talked about his early relationship with Sharon, and how he had adopted Janis, "because her so-called father wanted to take her." He described Janis's natural father as "a meathead." He said his relationship with Sharon was "the pits" because she used to bait him all the time.

Asked about the meat hook, he said, "Nothing to it. I got it from work, used it for towing cars." About the machete, he said, "I got it when I was 14 and had it ever since. I just kept it around." When Hartrick questioned him about Sharon's allegations about the machete, he replied, "I went up to move the rest of the stuff from my premises. She started baiting me. I turned around and swung it in the wall, like, 'Leave me alone, because I don't want to hurt anyone with it.'"

Gordon said his knife was a buck knife, a skinning knife with a four-inch blade, and not a switchblade. He said switchblades are spring-loaded, whereas his knife locks and has to be pulled out manually. He later admitted that he did once possess a switchblade "years ago, when I was a kid." He said the sawed-off shotgun was a pump-action twelve gauge, which never worked: "I got it ten years ago. Something was wrong with it, and it never did fire. Not that I ever fired it. The spring was loose. I'm a gun collector."

"Did you ever assault Sharon Wells with the knife?" asked Hartrick.

"Not that I can recall."

"With the machete?"

"No."

"Did you ever use the knife in an assaultive way?"

"Just to turn around and say, 'Leave me alone.' About three times. She knows how to bait me. I did it to the point to say, 'What you're doing to me is killing me.'"

The judge asked for a brief delay in proceedings while he filled his pen, and Hartrick said, "His honor is loading his weapon, the worst weapon of all." Gordon laughed, and again large wrinkles appeared on his forehead. He was then asked about his disciplining of the children, and he said he would tap them on the hand or the butt. He admitted that he once put Janis up against the wall, but "if I done it like the way she said, she would have gone through the wall."

He said that, after their move to the new apartment complex, his relationship with Sharon went "downhill all the way. . . . Sharon knows my pressure points. Sometimes I'm not the easiest person to live with." After their separation he said they would often try to make up, but "it seemed to backfire. She'd push me into a corner until I naturally blew up."

Asked if there were good times, he started to talk about Christmas, and then said, "A couple of Christmastimes I was there and at four in the morning her boyfriend phoned and said he was coming over—not Gary, some other guy she was seeing. And she wanted to throw me out. It destroyed my Christmas and the kids'."

He described an incident that occurred soon after they were married: "I hit her but I didn't know I hit her. I punched her out, when she woke me in a half-and-half sleep." He was asked if he had hit her on other occasions, and he explained that, if you hit a woman you should slap her, rather than "hauling off, and drive her one between the eyes." When this prompted some laughter in court, Gordon grinned and added, "Well, you asked me. I done it to her just once. But I didn't know it was her I was doing it to."

Asked about Sharon's relationship with Gary, he said, "I figured it was a wild-goose chase." Hartrick asked him to explain that comment, and he replied, "In my own words? If I did they wouldn't record it. He was just after her for her, and that was it." He said he met Gary on the street after he heard about the children's allegations, and told him, "I didn't exactly appreciate hearing the allegations of what they were supposed to have done to the kids. If that was true, that was it."

"Meaning?"

"He would get what is coming to him."

Gordon said the allegations were "all B.S." Hartrick asked him about his tattoos, and he showed his "little devil" tattoo to the judge. Judge Beckett examined it and described it for the court record: "Almost like a little cherub-type character, a childlike cartoon head, what appears to be two emerging horns, perhaps pointed ears, a three-pronged pitchfork over the right shoulder, red pants or diaper, a tail with a forked prong on the end." The judge asked if anyone else wanted to look at it.

"To them I charge," said Gordon. "It's just a little devil, Hot Stuff, a cartoon character that was popular back then. Janis liked the tattoos."

On the subject of recent contacts with his ex-wife, he said, "Since the trial started we got together. The last five years of our life hasn't been a dream boat. If I got the children, or Sharon, they don't need to come back to see us arguing again. We wanted to get our differences sorted out before." He said he did not have any satanic friends: "I haven't had any connections like that in my life. The only thing I told her is that the courtroom is all wrong. It's gone on way too long, and should be shut down and started again properly. A year-and-a-half to two years to straighten out a simple problem has gone too far."

Gordon told Brown that he had dismantled the shotgun and thrown it away, because "with all the stuff that's gone down, you wouldn't exactly keep a few of them around, would you?" He said he used to keep it in the apartment in Toronto for protection after "we had a little bit of discussion around the premises," and the lives of Sharon and the children were threatened. He said the fact that the gun did not work was irrelevant, since "if no-one knows you, and you walk up to a door and someone sticks a gun in your face, whether it works or not, they ain't gonna stick around and ask questions; they're just gonna leave."

Judge Beckett later observed, "I found that to be an amazing answer by Mr. Wells. I certainly do not believe him when he says that the gun was inoperative. It was he who had cut the gun down. A sawed-off shotgun can only have one function, and that is as an anti-personnel weapon."

"Do you open the door with a gun?" Brown asked Gordon.

"If I know what's coming down. I had it around in case anything did happen. I don't want any harm coming to my family. I had shells around, 12-gauge shotgun shells, but they didn't belong to the gun."

Brown asked him if he ever put the gun to Sharon's head, and he replied, "That's her story. As far as I know nothing like that transpired. I may have done a lot of stuff, but that I didn't do."

The mother's lawyer asked Gordon if he recalled seeing a skull suspended from the ceiling of Sharon's brothers' room during the days when he and Sharon's brothers used to be best friends. He said he did not recall ever seeing anything like that.

Gordon said he had lost a $30,000-a-year job because of the case. "It was mind straining. It had a very physical impact on me. You can't run heavy equipment and keep your mind on the job when something like this is going on," he said. "I told the boss. On the one hand he understood. On the other hand he didn't give a shit and fired me."

He said he had found it hard to separate from his wife, because he loved her. He said he was concerned about the effect of their violent scenes on the children, but "certain things vanish from your mind until you realize things have gone down wrong. I never really lost my temper with anybody else at all. I don't like fighting. I'd rather walk away than do anything." Asked about the holes in the wall, he said, "Let's put it this way. Isn't it better to punch a wall than to lay somebody out, and have criminal charges against you?"

Sharon sat shaking as she listened to Gordon's reply to Brown's question about her "satanic friends" allegation. Gordon said, "I think she's been sitting in the courtroom too long. When she wants to get her way she'll turn around and lie through her teeth. Somebody's going to believe her. If she goes in bawling her eyes out, the judge is going to believe her. She's been putting on an act for two years. She'd been saying, 'Let's work together to get the kids back,' then comes out with this idiotic story. She's been sitting in this courtroom too long, listening to the B.S. that's shoveled in this courtroom. If she bubbles her eyes out long enough she's going to get the kids back. That's a lot of bull. I'm an artist trying to raise my kids. You bring this on my doorstep. I'm not involved in anything like that. As far as I'm concerned this is a simple custody hearing. McInnis is the one that brought that out. You tell me she's sane? You tell me we're crazy?"

He denied threatening people in the court: "I wish I could win the lottery. But I didn't say the other half." When O'Neail asked him if he had referred to Gary as "a fucking black bastard," he said, "I've referred to a lot of people in a lot of ways." As to whether he said "That nigger should be shot," he responded, "If this court case comes out the right way, and he's done things to my kids, what do you think should be done to him? It's got nothing to do with him being black."

"Are you suggesting Sharon Wells was putting on a big act to this court?" asked Harper.

"Yeah, Sharon's noted for a lot of stuff to get what she wants. It wouldn't be the first time she pulled it on me. She lied like hell in family court. She's trying to use every ways and means for me not to get the kids if she doesn't get them.

"She doesn't like what I call open sex. But I don't have to turn around and force someone to do it. I'd wreck my own furniture. It was better than hurting her. I put my fist through walls, but it's better than hitting her," Gordon said.

Gordon said he had no contact with Sharon and the children for two-and-a-half months after they moved to Hamilton in the fall of 1984, following Gordon's allegations about the sexual abuse of Linda and Janis's allegations about the man at the baby-sitter's apartment. Harper asked him why he had failed to check on the children's welfare during this period. He replied, "If you complain and nobody listens to you, you get fed up after a while . . . . I did my part. The police in Toronto and the CAS in Toronto neglected to do theirs. What am I supposed to do, stay on the phone 24 hours and lose my job?"

When Sharon did finally get in touch with him, and let him see the children, Gordon did not try to find out where they lived. He said this was because if he had turned up on her doorstep it would have caused trouble. "She left me, figuring getting away from me. She would have had the police on my back. I don't need any hassle with the police. All I wanted to do was see my kids. I don't care what my wife does. Me and her aren't important any more. It's the kids. That's what I've been trying to punch into her head for the last two years."

As Gordon began to get upset about being questioned on the children's allegations, his brows furrowed with anger. The large wrinkles on his forehead accentuated the look of menace in his eyes. He said he had not attended the court hearing because of his work and because "this court case has got a lot of junk. It's all garbage. I don't need to listen to stuff like that." He asked, "Who put the devil part into their heads? Who put the picture into their heads? I never heard the kids say that. They used to like my tattoos."

When questioned further about the picture of the devil, Gordon said, "I don't draw to scare the shit out of anybody. It's art—nothing more."

Gordon told Harper sharply that he was "dead wrong" in his suggestion that Sharon visited on the long weekend. Harper said, "I suggest you were so angry with Catherine McInnis that you threatened their lives and the children heard you."

"Why would I be that mad at the McInnises, when the judge gave me access? I went in and had conversations with them? Don't you think that's a little absurd? I already had access to my kids. Why should I be mad at the McInnises? Why should I turn around and plot anything?" Gordon said. "No-one knows what goes on behind the closed doors at the foster parents'. She's the one who watches movies about satanism. She's the one that has bars on her windows. Mrs. McInnis is a nut case. You have an outside psychiatrist examine her and you might find out. She's supposed to be a churchgoer and she watches devil pictures on TV. She needs a straitjacket. They brainwashed those kids so bad, they'd come out with anything."

"Is that your answer to the allegations?"

"You got it."

Atwood read Gordon details of the sexual abuse allegations, and the father said, "How are they supposed to know about it? Between Gary and Sharon and the foster parents themselves, something had to go on. Janis and Linda, even if they were looking at Penthouse, wouldn't have known what they were looking at. It'd be just a bright picture. They have got to be guilty, or somebody's got to be guilty. They got to get it from some place."

He said he hadn't followed the trial because "I hear enough of this. I sit there and read the junk in the paper. I just get sick of it. I read about it now and again." During a break, however, he did warn the newspaper reporters in a menacing voice, louder and harsher than he had sounded during his testimony, that he would be keeping a sharp eye on what they wrote about him.

"No-one can actually say she done it or not. But she put the children in the CAS. I'm saying she shouldn't have them, because she doesn't deserve them," said Gordon. He told Atwood that his own view on child sexual abuse was that "if you turn around and do that to a child, you've got no rights to live."

Atwood asked Gordon about a statement he had made earlier about the Toronto apartment building having a reputation for kiddy porn. He replied, "I know of the building, and what came down in it. Certain things like that were going on in there. Sharon said people in the building told her. A cop at the station said he knew the building because he patrolled it for violence in the building."

Judge Beckett asked the father for his explanation of the children's allegations, and he replied, "The kids were saying something in confidence. Then Catherine McInnis and Lesley Morgan took the whole thing and blown it out of proportion."

"With what motive?" asked the judge.

"Who knows. You can't say things haven't been greatly fabricated in this court case. They have. The Children's Aid can't afford to lose this court case, because they'd lose face. The girls wouldn't know what satanism meant, wouldn't know what a dead body looked like unless somebody showed it to them."

The judge asked, "You've said that Mrs. McInnis has bars on her windows. How did you know that?"

"Through the grapevine. Certain parties told me. They turned around and went by the place, and seen bars in the windows."

"Who told you?"

"Sharon did. A long time ago."

"When?"

"Seven or eight months ago. Somewhere in there."

"Where?"

"Probably over the phone."

"I get the impression that you talk to each other from time to time. Sharon Wells testified she had four, possibly five contacts with you during the time she testified."

"Could be."

"You're a gun collector?" the judge then asked.

"I was."

"The pump-action shotgun, what make was it?"

"I can't remember."

"Why cut it down? Did you have any knowledge that is not lawful?"

"I did. But I did not use it. Most of the time it was in the trunk of my car."

"I'm curious as to why it was in the trunk."

"Because for a time most of my stuff was in the trunk. I'm the type of person that packs something away and forgets it's there. It must have been in the trunk of my car for years. It never really dawned on me. I just did it for the hell of it."

"I'm curious as to why you would mutilate a shotgun. What purpose would it then have?"

"Most people say, if you cut the barrel, it's better known as a scatter gun. It's just something that I did, then I got rid of it."

"For what purpose."

"No purpose at all. Just something to do at the time. I turned around and seen what it looks like. That's it."

"It wouldn't have any sporting purpose? You wouldn't go shooting with it?"

"There's a spread, so whatever you fire at, if it was birds, instead of getting one bird, probably you'd get two or three different ones."

"Did you ever intend to go hunting birds?"

"My brother was hunting and that. I was going to get into it."

When court resumed, Brown asked Gordon why he believed that the children couldn't have completely made up the allegations. He replied, "It's very simple. When a kid's first born they don't know nothing. When they go to school, they have to be told what's going down. They have to be shown, told, what things mean. That's what's called education.

"Satanism? Cannibalism? Why would Lesley Morgan and Catherine McInnis keep playing on that? Kids don't know anything about that," Gordon added.

Sharon, who had been looking scared and upset through most of Gordon's testimony, started laughing when the next witness appeared, and continued to giggle throughout her brief testimony. The witness was Gordon's mother, a large woman with dyed blond hair, who was wearing a big fur hat, a fur coat and a pink dress, the effect of which was slightly marred by what looked like a coffee stain on the back.

The woman testified that Gordon had been a very good boy, and had attended Sunday school every week. She said his shotgun didn't work and he didn't have any satanic friends. "My son is not evil. He is not a violent person," she said.

The court had earlier heard from Ann and Neil Murphy, the friends with whom Gordon had lived for several years after separating from Sharon. They had actually been called as Sharon's witnesses to testify about the condition of the children on the May, 1985, visits to their father. But the judge concluded that their evidence was purjured. This was significant because Ann was one of the people named by the children as being present at the graveyard rituals. The judge rejected their clumsy attempts to offer an explanation for statements by the children about Ann wearing a mask at the graveyard. This, combined with Gordon's unconvincing denial of the "satanic friends" remark, and the lack of any credible innocent explanation for the children's allegations, created a distinctly sinister impression of Gordon and his associates.

Judge Beckett stated in his judgement: "I found Gordon Wells to be an unreliable and unbelievable witness. I had the opportunity of observing him carefully for a period of three days in the witness stand and was not impressed by him. The fact that he lied to this court on several issues, especially about the statement to Sharon about his 'satanic friends' is, in my view, very significant."

THE BOYFRIEND'S TESTIMONY

Gary Evans was a slightly built, shy, soft-spoken young man, who completely denied all the allegations against him, maintaining that he was not "that kind of person." He offered no explanation for why the girls would fabricate such graphic and detailed accounts of sexual abuse at his hand. He presented a picture of them as normal, healthy little girls, and of Sharon's home as clean and tidy, which conflicted with all other evidence in the case.

It was hard to imagine, if he did not have a sexual interest in Sharon's children or some even more sinister involvement with her, why this well-bred university graduate would form a relationship with this disturbed, hostile, uneducated and distinctly unattractive young mother.

Judge Beckett clearly did not accept his story, and concluded: "I observed Evans closely during his testimony. I have since reviewed his testimony, and have come to the conclusion that he was not telling the truth when he denied sexually abusing Janis and Linda."

A psychologist and a psychiatrist who testified on Gary's behalf did not find any evidence of a propensity to sexually abuse children, but neither could say that they were confident that he had not committed such acts. Ronald Langevin, senior research psychologist at the

Clarke Institute of Psychiatry, testified that Evans had not shown any abnormalities while undergoing an impressive battery of tests, including a phalometric test to measure his erotic responses. The psychologist then admitted that it was possible to fake responses to such tests, and that they are, anyway, subject to a high rate of error. Psychiatrist Clive Chamberlain testified that Gary Evans seemed to be a normal, well-adjusted person, but then conceded that apparently normal people can commit horrendous crimes and that he could not really give an opinion about whether the young man did what was alleged without knowing about other facets of the case.

Dr. Langevin's evidence precipitated a wrangle over the admissibility of expert testimony, and an angry outburst from Judge Beckett. The defense lawyers were desperate to get an expert opinion that challenged the report of the Hospital for Sick Children. Langevin was apparently willing to offer some criticisms of the report, but the problem was that he was not a psychiatrist, and had no experience working directly with sexually abused children.

O'Neail, Gary Evans's lawyer, tried to argue that the psychologist, as an expert in testing and research design, could comment on the structure and the scientific basis of the hospital report. Harper said that the design of psychological tests and research projects is a totally different field to the analysis of children's statements.

Judge Beckett said, "I would welcome an expert with a great deal of clinical experience in dealing with abused children, but in his CV there is nothing that relates to that."

Atwood, representative of the Ontario Official Guardian, said the psychologist might just as well apply his expertise in test design to structural engineering. "He can psychologically test nuts and bolts as much as he wants, but he's not going to make them talk."

After Judge Beckett ruled that the witness was not qualified to give expert opinion on the children's credibility, Brown and Hartrick persisted in trying to get him to answer questions on this issue. The judge eventually became angry with this tactic and said, "I am not going to allow this trial to be turned into some kind of parody, a travesty of the way trials should be run. It seems to me like we're playing scrub ball here, getting witnesses as we go along."

In the testimony about Gary Evans that the psychologist was allowed to give, he said, "My impression is he is a naive man, inexperienced, candid, I believe, in his responses to me. I believe he was being honest."

Atwood, who was displaying some skepticism about Dr. Langevin's conclusions, drew the judge's attention to the fact that one of the questionnaires administered to Gary began by asking, "Have you ever been aroused by inanimate things?"

Gary Evans's mother testified that he had been brought up as an Anglican, had gone to Sunday school and still goes to church. She said there was never any problem between Gary and his younger sisters.

She described to Brown how her house was visited by police, who told her they had permission to search Gary's room: "I asked, 'For what?' They said dead birds, dead bodies, dead kids and things like that. They just destroyed the whole thing. They watched tapes on the VCR in the basement. Daytime soap operas. Three big men sat in there and watched them."

"Were there any religious programs?"

"No, just soap operas."

Mrs. Evans told Harper that her son now has a new girlfriend, but was reticent about telling her name. Harper asked her when Gary had returned the VCR that he and Sharon had subleased from his father. Mrs. Evans became hysterical. "God in heaven give me grace, because I never come in a place like this before, never been in a court," she said. "Don't try to put words in my mouth. I don't know what you're trying to do to my brain. I don't know, I don't know. If I say, I'd be lying."

Gary Evans testified that he had lived with his family near Toronto since coming to Canada from Barbados as a child. He said that he had a B.A. and was now doing postgraduate studies. He said he had held a number of summer jobs while he was in high school, and worked as an ice cream salesman when he was 15. In the fall of 1984, he was completing university in Hamilton, he said, and looking for work. He said he only lived with Sharon for about two weeks, but would look after the children, while she was working, until he found a job in December with a company that did out-of-town contract work.

Gary said his hobbies and interests were sports, track and field, soccer, basketball and photography. He said he took pictures of sports events and would usually take his camera when he went traveling.

He described Linda and Janis as "really nice little kids, playful, just nice kids. They weren't rude or anything, well-mannered, well-behaved." About the condition of the apartment and the children in Toronto, he said, "As far as I'm concerned it was decent living. The kids' rooms were always kept clean. She made their beds, kept them neat, prepared good meals for the kids all the time, made sure they always ate. Their clothes were kept clean. She was always wiping their faces."

Asked about the allegations made in the anonymous phone calls that Gordon had received, he said, "It was all false. I never struck a woman in my life. I'm not that type of person. I never abused children in my life. I'm not that type of person. I never made a woman pregnant before."

Gary said the reason he sometimes did not take Linda to school when he was looking after her was that he was looking for a job, and it was easier to take her with him, or drop her off at his mother's house, than to have to drive back to Hamilton to fetch her from school.

He said he was "totally shocked" when he was told about the children's allegations in March 1985. They were all false, he said. He denied each allegation in turn as O'Neail listed them out to him. He described some of them as very sickening and disgusting, explaining that he was "not brought up in that type of manner." He shook his head when O'Neail asked him about satanism, and said, "I was brought up a good Christian. That's false." And on the question of cannibalism, he said, "I wouldn't eat a person if I had to to survive. That's gross. It turns my stomach.

"It's so unbelievable. The only thing I can see is these kids been misled, and they misinterpreted some things the children said. They never gave us a chance, never talked to us. They took the kids, and said they've been abused and that was that. I'd play with the kids. If I pushed the kids playing, they might say Gary pushed me. They were just two healthy normal kids, healthy, bright energetic kids. There was nothing wrong with them."

Sharon gasped loudly as Gary testified that, when she became pregnant, she had not told him that she was no longer using birth control, and that the only reason he suggested an abortion was that he knew that the CAS would try to take the child away. He said he would like to have access to the baby, but would not be able to take custody yet because of his work and study commitments. He spoke very fervently about his desire to clear his name from a list of known sexual abusers that is kept by the provincial government: "My name is on the sexual abuse register for these false allegations. I don't want to have to plan my life around these false allegations . . . if I have a child in Ontario, they're just going to snatch her. It's ridiculous. I just want to get these accusations removed from my record. They're false and there's no truth to them."

Brown asked him why he was attracted to Sharon, and he replied, "I saw the person she was inside. A very caring person. A very loving person. The fact she had two kids didn't matter to me. It was her."

"Did you have an interest in her so you would have two vulnerable little girls that you could abuse?" asked Brown.

"Not at all. Never in my life. I'm not that kind of person."

"You were naive in sexual matters, a late bloomer. Was your first physical relationship with a lady with Sharon?"

"Yes, it was."

Brown asked if they had discussed child abuse, and Gary replied, "She said she'd never be able to live with me, if I did that. I told her, 'I'm not like that. I've got sisters myself. I wouldn't want any harm to come to them. I would never harm your kids in any way.'"

Harper asked him why he refused to talk to the police. He replied, "I told them I hadn't obtained counsel. The allegations were false. I felt in my best interests to tell them the allegations were false, and, until I obtained counsel, not talk to them." He agreed with Harper that he had an opportunity to talk to Eva Gede, the psychiatrist who assessed Sharon, but he said he felt she was "not an unbiased person." He said he made arrangements to talk to Dr. Rae-Grant, but cancelled them when he decided that "she had me convicted before we sat down."

Judge Beckett noted that this, and other evidence before the court, was in conflict with his claim that he never had a chance to tell his story to the CAS.

Harper questioned Gary's assertion that the foster mother could have got the children to make false allegations against him within three weeks of their coming into her care. He responded, "You can put things into kids' minds very easily. They've messed up these kids. It all started out in the foster care home, and I would say that they have taken the kids and they have, sort of, you know, twisted what the kids might have said, and gotten the kids believing it; got the kids so confused that the kids are actually believing it, and then the kids got to the point where they are saying it, and they don't know what they are saying, and that is the honest truth. These kids have been misinterpreted and they have been messed up."

Judge Beckett quoted this statement in his judgement, and commented, "Gary Evans's recourse to the explanation given above was totally unsupported by any evidence in a situation which cried out for some kind of an explanation. In my opinion it was unacceptable."

Responding to questions from the judge, Gary said he did not remember birds ever nesting on Sharon's balcony, that he had never heard of the movie Last House on the Left, and that he had never been told the children were exposed to any kind of movie that they shouldn't have seen.

Dr. Chamberlain, a child psychiatrist experienced in doing court assessments, said he found it hazardous to do an assessment for a child welfare hearing without having a chance to see all parties involved. He said he agreed to do a partial assessment of Gary Evans because he had been told that there had been no comprehensive assessment in the case, and that Evans had not seen a psychiatrist.

Later, in response to questions from Harper, he said he had not been made aware of several of the assessments and reports that were done on the case, and had not seen transcripts of evidence that was presented to the court.

As a result of his examination of Gary Evans, he said, "My impression is that of a well-adjusted young male, somewhat unsophisticated and late in developing sexually, but certainly within normal limits. He does not fit any personality pattern of men who initiate sexual activity with children, or who are likely to be aggressive physically or verbally. His moral standards, as far as I can know them within the limitation of this assessment, should preclude involvement, even passively, in activities such as have been alleged."

He added, "It is possible he was concealing his behavior and not telling the truth. There is no way I can assure myself people are telling the truth, particularly in circumstances like these. I can't read minds. I conducted a very limited investigation. I would have preferred to have talked to a large number of people, all the protagonists, and fit them into the mosaic. I am left with a question in my mind. How can this person, as I see him, become involved in behavior which I've heard happened?" Dr. Chamberlain said.

The psychiatrist said that, having seen Lesley Morgan's assessment of the case and the Hospital for Sick Children report, he felt at a loss as to how he could fit that together with his knowledge of Evans: "Either I have to change my notion of the person I've seen, or change my notion of the validity of the reports, or find some other way to understand it." He said, "I am left then, much like one of the proverbial blind men, touching part of an elephant. My part does not fit reports from others."

Asked about the report from the Hospital for Sick Children, he said, "I have never seen one as carefully crafted and thoughtfully put together. I have no quarrel with it whatsoever." He added, "If the conclusions are that the events reported by the children all happened, I would not draw that conclusion." He said he would have wanted to do a more expanded inquiry before reaching that conclusion.

Brown asked if notes taken by an unsophisticated interviewer were an adequate basis for forming an opinion on children's credibility. Judge Beckett said, "I don't mind telling you now. I wish the whole thing were televised. I'm sure there are better methods. But that didn't happen."

Dr. Chamberlain said, "As I understand it, the assessment was an effort to correct through analysis inconsistencies that were occasioned by an inexperienced interviewer, compensating for an inexperienced interviewer by a fairly sophisticated technique."

He told Brown that he would have liked to have seen the children, but said he recognized that "part of the agony of trying to come to terms with this issue is you've already got children at risk who have suffered a great deal. To have another stranger come in creates problems. I am not a wizard. There's nothing special about me." When Harper told him that the therapist testified that it would be harmful for the children to be interviewed, Dr. Chamberlain said, "I would want the therapist to convince me she was right. Dr. Oliviera is a well-known and excellent therapist. I would certainly be impressed by what she had to say."

In response to a further question from Brown, he said, "It is a mistake to assume that children always tell the truth or that they will lie. I've seen many children represent different realities depending on who they are with. Children say what they say for all sorts of reasons, logical reasons, to feel safe and comfortable. Lying or telling the truth is an adult notion that perhaps shouldn't be applied to children."

"Children tend to be susceptible?"

"People are susceptible."

In a section of Dr. Chamberlain's report read to the court by O'Neail, he stated that he found that Gary Evans did not fit into the two types of personalities who sexually abuse children. But Harper quoted a further sentence that O'Neail had not read: "It goes without saying that normal people can behave in ways different from normal disposition given a situation different from their normal context." Harper asked him, "Are there, in fact, three types?"

Dr. Chamberlain replied, "Sure. Normal people. That is, clinically normal people. All one has to do is reflect on what happened in Germany before and during the Second World War. Quite clinically sound people do unimaginable things under unusual circumstances."

THE JUDGE'S DECISION

Gordon Wells believed Judge Beckett released a written judgement on the case, and did not come into court to give oral reasons for his final decision, because the judge was "chicken." Others who reviewed the 106-page ruling saw it as a fine mixture of caution and toughness.

It did not come as a surprise to many of the people who had followed the case to find that the judge ruled that the two girls and their baby halfsister were in need of protection, or that he had come to the very hard conclusion that their parents should not have any access to them. Nor had anyone expected him to go out on a limb and state that he emphatically believed everything that Janis and Linda had said, concluding that the children definitely had witnessed murders and were the victims of a satanic cult. The evidence to support that kind of finding had not been presented.

The judge might well have concluded that he did not believe any of the children's more bizarre allegations, and still decided to make them wards of the Crown, solely on the basis of the evidence of neglect, psychological damage and sexual abuse. He could have simply dismissed the most troubling aspects of the case as being irrelevant to his ruling. The fact that he did not do this made the judgement an intriguing one. Judge Beckett was cautious in not trying to reach conclusions for which he had insufficient factual basis, but he did pose all of the tough questions that arose from the evidence that was presented to him. His judgement would force those who read it to seriously ponder the almost unthinkable possibilities suggested by the children's strange stories.

It was not that the judge was anxious to delve into this material, which he described as "almost beyond human comprehension." Referring to what he characterized as "a virtual flood of the most lurid, gruesome, bloodthirsty stories that any person could possibly imagine," Judge Beckett said, "the court heard allegations of murder, of cannibalism, of graveyard rituals and acts of bestiality, allegations so horrible, so gruesome, so loathsome that no-one, including myself, wanted to believe any of it. In fact I wanted very much to believe that none of the allegations made by Janis and Linda could be true."

Judge Beckett said that the reluctance of the police to believe the allegations was understandable and reflected "the natural abhorrence of any normal person at the very thought that children in our community could possibly be involved in such matters." He said he did not intend the hearing to become a forum into the adequacy of the police investigation of the case, and, while recognizing that they did not find evidence to support the children's more "florid" allegations, he stated, "That is not to say, of course, that any of these events did not occur: it is only to say that the police found no evidence of it." He said this lack of evidence could not prove either that the children did not have experiences that "prompted childlike misinterpretations or distortions of fact that resulted in their stories.

"We may never know for certain to what extent the so-called 'florid' allegations are based on fact, or what occurrences or experiences the children had that could have prompted them to say such things," Judge Beckett said.

The "rich detail" of the children's stories impressed the judge, "as well as the fact that they related them with obvious reluctance and fear." He said he was struck by the signs of distress that they showed when telling their stories, particularly such symptoms as soiling, wetting, trembling and shaking. He said, "Most particularly, I was impressed with the age-inappropriate knowledge they have, especially of sexual matters.

"The CAS called no evidence with respect to 'satanic cults' and the court does not intend to take any judicial notice of the practices and rites of any such cults," the judgement stated. "Nonetheless, the descriptions of midnight graveyard scenes with dancing and singing, of people with masks, of opening of graves and coffins together with gross sexual activities suggests cult activities."

Judge Beckett said he certainly found many things that the children said difficult to resolve or accept. For example, he said, the evidence about the Channel 11 television studio made him conclude that it had probably not been used for pornography sessions, such as the children described. But, he said, one has to wonder why Janis described the interior so accurately and why she was so frightened when being driven by it.

"Why did the children refer to the number 666—a symbol we know is a biblical reference to the 'beast or the devil'?" Judge Beckett asked. He noted that it had been suggested during the hearing that this reference arose from the fact that one of the children's relatives lived at an apartment building with the street number 666. But the children did not refer to the number in connection with this, the judge said. "On the contrary they connected it with graveyard activities." He also asked, "What experience did the children have to enable them to speak such horrors and why did Janis persistently draw pictures of graveyards? Why were the minds of these children dominated by thoughts of death and of characters like 'the Blob'? Why do they speak of their father with such fear and say that he had killed people, and think they could engage him to kill Gary Evans?"

In posing these questions, the judge remarked that some of the things the children spoke of turned out to be proven later. He said "the man with half a face," for example, turned out to be a real person, and their father did, in fact, have a picture of "the devil" in his room. "Were Sharon Wells, Gary Evans or Gordon Wells involved in cult activities?" Judge Beckett asked. "Clearly on the evidence, I cannot find that they were. But what of the fact that Gordon Wells spoke to Sharon Wells in October, 1986, of his 'satanic friends'? The fact that he would make such a remark does little to allay the suspicions raised by the children's allegations."

On the issue of the children's allegations about a plot to kill the foster parents, the judge observed that evidence indicated that Gordon Wells was prone to making threats of violence, and that it is not difficult to infer that the children might have overheard statements that they interpreted as a plot. Judge Beckett said he was not convinced by the evidence that Gordon Wells was violently antagonistic to both Sharon and Gary, which had been advanced by defense lawyers as proof of the absurdity of the children's story of the alleged plot.

"I am left with the question of where the 'florid' allegations originated," the judge stated. "Was it fantasy? Were the children lying? If the children were fantasizing or lying, the question arises as to where the children got the material to produce their so-called lies or fantasies. I cannot accept that two little children of this age could possibly describe the matters I have described above without some knowledge or some experience in order to create the lies or the fantasies. Such matters surely cannot come out of the minds of young children as native or original thought. But is not the fact that they said such things, that such horrors were in their minds, evidence of a very bizarrely disturbed relationship with their caretakers? Was this not evidence of brutal trauma to their psyche, just as would bruises and broken bones be evidence of physical abuse to their bodies?"

The judge went on to comment: "The world of small children is a narrow one: it is mother, it is father and their families, their school and their playmates. It is in this milieu that a child's mental constructs are molded. What experiences did these children have, while in the care of the adults involved, that would cause them to say what they said and to say it with such fear and terror? To say that they 'lied' or that it was 'fantasy' falls far short of explaining how such things could have been in their minds. It also should not be forgotten that statements by small children must always be viewed from the perspective of a child—what a child says may not be truth but that does not mean it is a lie or fantasy. What may not, in reality, be truth, may be interpreted as truth by a child. For example, a child told to eat meat, which is in reality raw chicken, but is represented to the child by his caretaker as human flesh, would not be 'lying' if he said that he had eaten human flesh; he would just be mistaken.

"But does it really matter, for the purposes of this case, whether the children saw murder or something that they interpreted as being murder? Whether they ate human flesh or ate something they thought was human flesh, whether they were in Channel 11 Telecenter, or whether they were in some place that they believed to be the Telecenter? It is really unimportant in reality as to which it was," Judge Beckett concluded.

The judge had no difficulty, however, in concluding that the children had been sexually abused by all three adults. He said, "I was particularly impressed by the fact that the children did not tell their stories with any degree of pleasure or satisfaction. Quite the contrary—they did not want to tell and often attempted to interfere with each other when one was disclosing. In the telling of these stories, there was far more than consistency that compels me to believe the allegations of sexual abuse, especially the use of graphic detail about sexual matters children of this age could not possibly know otherwise. Young children of this age might indeed find a sexual aid such as a vibrator in their parents' premises, but how would a child know how such an instrument is used? How would a child know that it is necessary to use Vaseline in order to achieve the purpose of the instrument? Where would children get notions of oral sex, not only as between their mother and Gary Evans, but as between those two individuals and the children? How could they describe such events unless somehow it had been part of their experiences?"

Judge Beckett said it was impossible to see how the children could be mistaken in presenting such graphic descriptions, or how such explicit statements could possibly have been misinterpreted. While he said that the girls might have a motive for lying about Gary's involvement in such things, he found it difficult to imagine why the children would make false allegations against their parents, when they loved their parents and knew these allegations were the reason for their not being returned to their home.

With apparent discomfort the judge concluded, "The graphic description of the children being forced to eat feces has a distinct ring of truth about it, loathsome as that thought might be. The children's descriptions of oral sex, particularly with Gary Evans, contain detail and descriptions of sensation and tastes that could not possibly come out of the imaginations of children. As much as I did not and do not want to believe these children were forced into such loathsome activities, I find it impossible on the basis of what these children have said over the past two years to come to any other conclusion."

Judge Beckett found that Gary Evans had grossly and sexually abused the children on numerous occasions. He described Sharon's explanations for the allegations as "somewhat bizarre," and rejected them as "at best, hopeful speculation, and, at worst, a deliberate resort to fabrication in an attempt to deceive the court." He concluded that she too had sexually abused the girls over an extended period of time. The allegations of sexual abuse against Gordon Wells had not been that extensive, but Judge Beckett found that the children had clearly accused their father of sexually abusing them, not only in statements to Mrs. McInnis, but also to Lesley Morgan and Sgt. Elwood. He also noted that Linda had talked in a therapy session about her fear that her father would kill her with a knife to the neck. The judge made the finding that the father had sexually abused the girls, and that, anyway, they needed to be protected from this man, because they saw him as a figure of fear and violence.

"The allegations that these children made cried out for some reasonable and rational explanation from Sharon Wells, Gary Evans or Gordon Wells. None was forthcoming," said the judge. He agreed with Dr. Oliviera that, unless these people were able to either validate or satisfactorily explain the children's belief that the statements they made are true, further contact with these adults could be harmful to the children.

The judgement had taken more than two months to prepare, and the judge made frequent reference to the difficulty he had been faced with. He said, "Perhaps in the history of such cases in Canada, no judge has been faced with such an overwhelming volume of evidence." He referred several times to his extreme personal distaste for dealing with the repulsive subject matter of much of the evidence. He described the decision that he was faced with as "an awesome responsibility for any one person to have." He went on to say, "I can think of no order that any judge could possibly make that can so profoundly affect the lives of the people involved; to take someone's children from them is a power that a judge must exercise only with the highest degree of caution, only on the basis of compelling evidence, and only after a careful examination of possible alternative remedies.

"Certainly no-one can derive any pleasure or satisfaction from the order that I have made," Judge Beckett said, "but by the same token, society cannot tolerate young children being exposed to the abuses that Janis and Linda have suffered, and that the baby would likely suffer if left in the care of their parents."

Judge Beckett's ruling ended with a compassionate statement about the woman who had played such a tragic role during the 18 months that the case was before the court. "Sadly, life has dealt Sharon Wells little happiness, but much sadness and brutality," he said. "She is a pathetic woman who desperately needs help and one can only hope that the system will now turn its attention to her as well, in an attempt to mitigate the horrible experiences of her past and the devastating effect of the order that I have been forced to make."

EPILOGUE

Do children lie? This question was put to almost every expert witness at the hearing, and would almost always come up whenever interested outsiders discussed the case. People continued to ask the question long after the clear and emphatic answer was given by Judge Beckett and most of the witnesses. That answer is "yes, of course children lie. And they can easily be confused, deceived or mistaken."

Adults also lie. Some people, including child abusers, pornographers and members of secretive cults, are especially practiced and skillful at concealing the truth. History has proven over and over again that people are also easily confused and misled, especially if the truth is something that would be troubling to accept. Adult lies and myths are much more complex and impenetrable than children's deceptions. The important thing is to be able to distinguish between lies and falsehood whether they are coming from children or adults.

The question that the Hamilton wardship hearing posed was not whether children in general can lie, but whether Janis and Linda were lying or mistaken when they made a series of detailed, consistent and explicit allegations against adults whom they loved and feared. The answer that came out of more than a year of evidence was that they were not lying, and, though they may have been mistaken about some things, their allegations were apparently based on real experiences. It was never proven exactly what those experiences were, beyond the fact that they were certainly exposed to gross sexual abuse and degradation, but the judge noted that the children's statements suggested that they were involved in cult activities.

Even the least distressing explanation for the children's allegations confronts us with unsettling truths about the nature of our society, and presents us with grave concerns about whether children are receiving adequate protection. The explanation that would be least anxiety-provoking for the average parent would be that the children's more bizarre allegations were fantasies generated by an appallingly horrific history of abuse. If this is the case, all we have to worry about is trying to improve child protection services and watching out for these unnamed perpetrators, and perhaps many similarly dangerous individuals, who may be living in our neighborhood. Perhaps we would want to go further and look for cures for the underlying sickness in society that generates such aberrations, but we would at least be assured that the evil we have already recognized is the evil that we are dealing with—and to some extent learned to live with.

However, evidence does not tend to support the idea that the Hamilton case was a unique aberration. The girls' allegations in this case were remarkably similar to those made by many hundreds of children all over North America. No theories have yet been advanced to adequately show how even the most horrendous forms of sexual abuse might lead children to relate convincing and detailed accounts of ritualistic violence. These accounts almost all involve references to the same specific acts of violence and abuse, and often refer to elements of satanic symbolism, presumably outside the experience of the average seven- or eight-year-old. Most of the children's statements also refer to the use of cameras. In the absence of other credible explanations, we cannot afford to dismiss the possibility that these allegations point to the activities of groups engaged in satanic ritual, or pornography, or both, and that there may be some communication or connection between such groups.

The response of many individuals and agencies who do not want to pursue this line of investigation has been to ask, "Where are the bodies? Where are the pornographic materials that were produced by such groups?" Some people, including police investigators, who believe that human sacrifice is being practiced, respond to the first question with statistics about missing children, and explanations about how skillful these cult groups apparently are at completely destroying all evidence. A more easily acceptable answer is that, if children are being manipulated, terrorized and used as pornographic subjects in rituals involving animals and simulated human sacrifice, there would be no bodies. There have been numerous discoveries of animal remains in conjunction with evidence of rituals. The fact that pornographic materials have not been recovered in connection with individual cases may only be a reflection of how difficult it is to investigate a sophisticated pornography operation.

Roland Summit told a Florida state commission on pornography in November, 1985, "There are thousands of pictures without known children. And there are thousands of photographed children without known pictures. Far from establishing credibility, these two opposing clues tend to nullify one another. Obscene pictures of anonymous children provoke only helplessness, while children who report being photographed in the midst of sexual exploitation trigger a single-minded pursuit of the photographic evidence. The almost inevitable failure to find identifiable photos tends to discredit other aspects of the child's story. Every unproved allegation seems to encourage the hope that nothing the child is saying is true."

The motivations and the practices of cult groups are radically different from conventional criminal activity, and completely outside the experience of most police forces. Police investigators and others who have seriously looked at the problem of child pornography and the phenomenon of ritual abuse all agree that these are areas in which traditional police methods are inadequate. Professional pornography rings are highly sophisticated operations, and their investigation requires large-scale co-ordination of information from many different sources. Evidence is difficult to find and, if this evidence involves ritual material, one must first have the specialized knowledge required to interpret it. Infiltration is either impossible or unethical when it involves dealing with groups that require its members to engage in acts of violence or child exploitation. For the same reason one is unlikely to find informants from within such groups, who would necessarily incriminate themselves by what they disclose. Investigators must therefore rely a lot on victims' accounts together with surveillance and exhaustive checks into suspects and their contacts.

Although the Hamilton hearing certainly did not provide proof that the children were forced to participate in a satanic cult or a professional pornography ring, the suggestions that such organized child exploitation was involved were strong enough that I believe we have to take them seriously. We need more investigation in this area, and we have to provide the police with funds for training and the establishment of special units for this type of investigation.

Any surveillance operation is expensive and labor-intensive, and is not likely to be entered into without credible witnesses. The question of assessing the credibility of child witnesses is therefore crucial. It is extremely difficult not because children are particularly prone to lying, but because there are several factors (such as fear, love, dependency and insecurity) that may cause them to withhold the truth in certain situations, disclose it in others, and often retract an earlier allegation or denial. Studies such as those done in connection with the Hamilton case are helping psychiatrists and social workers to evolve better methods of assessing credibility, and conducting interviews that encourage children to speak without fear but do not contaminate their disclosures with leading questions. Police investigators in this field need to co-operate closely with child care professionals in order to comprehend these sensitive issues.

The polarization of opinions on the issues concerning children's credibility led investigators in many of the cases in the United States first to rely too much on disclosures by child witnesses, and then to completely discount their stories. In Jordan, Minnesota, particularly, it appears that arrests were made too hastily, without adequate research and surveillance, and a multiplicity of interviews with the same children by several different people resulted in some of the children changing their stories and the evidence of others being so contaminated by the investigatory process that it was unusable in court. Several of the defendants in the Jordan case, against whom charges were dropped, attempted to sue police, prosecutors and therapists for allegedly conspiring to fabricate evidence of a sex ring in order to further the career of the Scott County attorney. The United States

Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, which dismissed this suit in February, 1987, clearly found that the conspiracy theory was absurd, but also noted that there were reasonable grounds for arresting the suspects.

The senior judge of the court expressed misgivings about the handling of the case, and stated, "The children's accounts are so startling and egregious, however, that it is difficult to accept the prosecutor's dismissal of the charges against the parents and the other parties charged . . . . The children's accusations, if true, demand the prosecution of the guilty parties. The prosecutor's action in dismissing the charges leaves this shocking and abusive affair in limbo." The judge went on to say that accused people may have been dealt with unjustly and, expressing concern over the difficulty in ascertaining what did happen in Jordan, urged that such perplexing cases be handled cautiously, keeping in mind the rights of both children and parents.

The investigation of the Hamilton case was also impeded by conflicts between the police and social workers over the children's credibility, and a lack of surveillance, research and timely searches. The hearing exposed inadequate communication between different agencies and professionals in Toronto. Such problems could be eliminated, or at least minimized, by better training and education programs for all professionals who deal with children, and the provision of financing for services that would co-ordinate the work of different agencies in the field. There is also a need to clarify the mandates of the police and the Children's Aid Societies in child abuse cases. The CASs now rely on police to do much of the investigation, but police forces do not consider themselves responsible for following up on child welfare cases that do not look as if they will result in criminal charges.

The length of time it took to reach a determination of the children's future raised concerns that their rights and those of their parents were being eroded. The public was also concerned over the million-dollar cost of the court hearing, in which all the lawyers were either financed by Legal Aid or represented public agencies. The case did provide a full examination of the evidence and issues involved, and achieved its aim of giving the children the protection they sadly needed. Having sat through every day of the 18-month hearing, I was not left with the feeling that anyone was to blame for the slow progress of the case. The novelty and extreme complexity of the issues required careful consideration, and the legal system rightly allows all parties to present and question all evidence that may be helpful to their case.

The lawyers involved in the case all agreed that ways have to be found to deal with such cases more quickly in the future. The many legal rulings that were made during the course of the hearing after lengthy arguments will perhaps result in quicker resolution of similar issues in other cases, while lawyers and judges will certainly study the way that evidence was presented in the Hamilton hearing in the hope of finding more efficient ways of handling such material.

The bizarre allegations and the sensational nature of the parents' evidence resulted in the hearing attracting a level of public attention quite unprecedented for a child welfare case. Not only has the case helped to alert the public to the need for more research and investigation into the perplexing issue of ritual abuse, but it has also served to promote awareness about child sexual abuse in general, a problem of epidemic proportions, of which ritual abuse is an alarming new mutation. Protecting children is something that most people in our society see as a high priority. For this reason politicians have placed it high on the public agenda. While members of the public are concerned about such issues, they do not usually trouble themselves much over the details. This is what enables politicians to practice a sleight-of-hand by which they can pay lip service to the public's concern by means of rhetoric and impressively tough legislation, but avoid the commitment of resources that will enable professionals working in the field to insure that the intent of the legislation is fulfilled.

I believe that a realistic response to ritual abuse and other forms of exploitation of children requires financing of innovative investigation and research—at the very least, a commitment by government to give child protection agencies the money they need to do their jobs properly. While reports of child sexual abuse have increased all over the country in the past few years by as much as 300 percent a year in some regions, there has been virtually no corresponding increase in the number of child welfare workers, Crown attorneys and police officers. The new legislation, which could make it easier to prosecute sexual abuse cases, will be of little value unless governments also provide agencies with the staff they need to investigate and take cases to court.

Judge Beckett's decision protected Janis and Linda from further abuse, but not before they had suffered potentially irreparable psychological damage. Their therapy, suspended in the spring of 1986, was resumed after a few months when it became clear that the hearing would continue well into 1987. Their psychiatrist was not optimistic about their prospects of growing up to be happy, well-adjusted adults, breaking the cycle of abuse by protecting their own children from the kind of suffering they and their mother have endured. "They are going to need a great deal of support," Sylvio Mainville, the executive director of the Hamilton-Wentworth Children's Aid Society, said in an interview. "We can only hope and pray to God that they are going to come out of this in a way that they can lead meaningful lives as adults."

The problems that tainted the lives of Janis and Linda have their roots far in the past, and are continuing to grow. The sickness that they suffer from has such a strong hold on our society that it is hard to see how it can be eradicated without a fundamental change in our priorities. The problem is partly one of economics and social policy. It is often argued that child sexual abuse is something that transcends class barriers. Gary and Sharon are an example of that, in that they came from such vastly different economic, cultural and social backgrounds; it seemed that almost the only thing they had in common was an inclination to sexually abuse children. However, it is not true that there is no relationship between child abuse and social class. Concerns mentioned during the hearing about the prevalence of sexual abuse in the Toronto public housing complex where Sharon lived are underscored by the Badgley Commission Report on Sexual Offenses Against Children And Youths, which stated that 47 percent of the girls and 33 percent of boys sexually assaulted in metro Toronto between 1979 and 1981 lived in public housing. The report stated:

"Public housing units appear to constitute an easily visible target where a large number of children live in the same location."

Child abuse expert David Finkelhor noted in a 1986 book: "Although abuse is certainly not limited to the lower classes, as the stereotype might suggest, to most researchers it makes sense that the frustrations of poverty, joblessness, lack of education, and inadequate housing contribute to the conditions that increase violence toward children."[14] Finkelhor goes on to make the point that this may not be the case with sexual abuse, as with physical violence towards children. He states that studies and incidence reports do show a higher prevalence of child sexual abuse among low-income families, but this may be because such abuse is more likely to be detected by social agencies that work more with poorer people.

Certainly it would be naive to assume that Sharon's children would have been safe from abuse if she had been housed in a decent building, which was not depressing and inconvenient, rife with violence and criminal activity and crawling with cockroaches—but it might have helped, especially if she received a family allowance that gave her financial independence from the men who had such a devastating impact on her and her children's lives. It would also have been beneficial to her if she lived somewhere close to a day-care center and a mental health center, and if the social worker who was responsible for monitoring the family felt she could make regular visits without risking her own life.

Sharon had been trapped all her life in a cycle of poverty and dependence. She had been brought up to think of herself as a victim, and she was vulnerable to any form of exploitation. Gordon came from a similar environment. One would have no difficulty in characterizing him as "a frustrated, hostile, but powerless figure, who lacks legitimate means of striking back at supposed aggressors." As a description of Gordon, this could be peculiarly apt, since the words are taken from a sociological study of members of a satanist group.[15] This study describes such individuals as not necessarily poor, but usually marginal, deviant people, who desire success but do not understand how they can legitimately achieve it: "A great many of the satanists whom I interviewed reported childhoods marred by strife: they spoke of broken homes, drunken parents, aggressive and hostile siblings."

This corresponds with the observations of Louise Edwards, a British Columbia therapist, who has become increasingly concerned about the relationship between satanic cults and child abuse. She said in an interview that, while satanic cults appear to have memberships that include affluent professional people, they seek to involve alienated individuals whose only power is physical violence. She says such people make perfect victims in that they are often regarded as "lowlife, expendable people: who keeps track of them? Nobody ever complains when anything happens to them."

There can be no doubt that the influence of satanism in society is alarmingly high, and the hold that it has on many young people through heavy metal music is a disturbing trend. Again the connection between powerlessness, alienation and a craving to make an impact through magic, ritual and violence can be seen in this form of teenage pop satanism. In this phenomenon can be seen, perhaps, another form of child abuse—the commercial exploitation of young people by a music industry that profits from the sale of images of horror and despair. This is not because there is any satanist conspiracy or particularly evil intent on the part of the people who make and sell these records. It is simply that the image of evil has become a highly marketable commodity. The same form of exploitation caters to the popularity among young people of horror films that feature graphic portrayals of sadistic sexual violence, usually inflicted on teenage girls. Last House on the Left, which shocked everyone who saw it in court, is a fairly typical example of these films, which regularly attract large line-ups at movie theaters and are among the most popular items for rental in video stores.

Child sexual abuse is just one of many frightening realities that it would be more comfortable to ignore. There is overwhelming proof of its pervasiveness, but many people work very hard at denying the seriousness of the problem, in the same way the threats to the environment and the survival of the species are ignored or made light of. In this context, it is not surprising that few people would want to believe young children's bizarre stories of cannibalism and ritual murder.

Ellen Bass wrote in an introduction to a book of writings by survivors of child sexual abuse: "The sexual abuse of children is part of a culture in which violence to life is condoned. Our forests, our rivers, our oceans, our air, our earth, this entire biosphere, all are invaded with poison—raped, just as our children are raped. It is very possible that in 50 years or less, life as we know it will not exist on Earth. Nuclear war could kill us all. Even without an explosion, the radiation emitted in the various phases of mining, milling, and constructing nuclear power plants and weapons is already so abundant that the continuation of our species is in grave danger. It is not odd that men whose desire for profit has superseded their own instinct for survival should so abuse their young."[16]

A police investigator concerned about satanism stated that the phenomenon is frightening because of the all-encompassing motive behind the abuse that is practiced on its victims. He saw this motive as a desire to distort the values and change the thinking of a future generation. We will not know until we have done some further investigation of the allegations of satanic cult involvement in ritual child abuse if this is paranoia or a realistic fear. In looking at the documented cases of child exploitation that surround us, in observing the images of violence and dehumanized sexuality that are part of our everyday cultural landscape, it is not that hard to believe that, conspiracy or no conspiracy, the satanists' goal could easily be achieved without much effort on their part.

In one of her most poignant statements, Janis told her foster mother, "Most people are bad." In about ten years' time, she and her sister will be young adults trying to make their way in society. It would be comforting to believe that by that time some changes will have taken place that will have encouraged her to revise her view of humanity.

AFTERWORD

On July 21, 1987, four months after Judge Beckett delivered his final judgement in the case, an appeals court received some poignant evidence about the children's response to the judge's decision. This was presented to an Ontario Supreme Court judge, who was considering an application from Sharon Wells for interim access to her children pending an appeal of the judgement.

The court was told that when the judgement was first explained to the children on April 3, 1987, Linda said, "I wished on a wishbone and I got my wish. It came true. It came true."

The children's therapist Alice Oliviera described in an affidavit how delighted the two girls appeared upon hearing the news, and hugged their foster parents, Stan and Helen Kovaks. Dr. Oliviera said that, as the children snuggled up to Mrs. Kovaks resting their heads on her bosom, Linda said, "My mom told the judge she didn't do bad things and it was a lie. She did do bad things."

The children told the therapist that they would like the Kovakses to adopt them. Janis said that she would like to buy land next door to the Kovakses home so that she could build a house and always live beside Aunt Helen. Linda said she would even live in the ditch next door.

The Supreme Court judge was clearly so convinced by Dr. Oliviera's affidavit and other written material submitted to him that he dismissed the mother's application for access without asking to hear arguments from the lawyers representing the Children's Aid Society and the Ontario Official Guardian. The judge also ruled that it would not be in the best interest of the 16-month-old baby to be visited by her natural mother. Sharon had been allowed to visit her baby twice a week during the trial, but these visits were terminated when Judge Beckett made his final decision. The appeal court considered the opinions of a social worker who had observed the mother's visits. The social worker said that the baby seemed mildly distressed whenever she was taken to see Sharon, and would cling to her foster mother for one or two hours after the visits. The social worker observed that Sharon would speak to the infant in high-pitched baby talk, and would often refer to herself as "Mom," which, the judge was told, would tend to be confusing to a child who regarded her foster parent as her mother.

Dr. Olivera stated in her affidavit that the Kovakses provided Janis and Linda with a loving, secure and stable environnment. She said it would be "utterly cruel" and "terribly, terribly abusive" to throw them into the limbo of insecurity again. "The most vital need in the world for these two children is to know that they belong to adults that will take care of them for an extended period of time, adults who will protect, nurture them, let them feel they are worthwhile and lovable," the therapist said.

Dr. Oliviera said she told the girls on March 6, 1987, that the judge was very close to making a decision, and both children said that they wanted more than anything else to stay with "Auntie Helen and Uncle Stan." When the therapist asked them how they felt about the possibility that they might not be able to stay with the foster parents, Janis replied that she would kill herself.

After the judge's decision was handed down, the children were told that they could have one last visit with their mother, or else write a goodbye letter. Janis said she would rather write a letter, and she and her sister decided that it would be a good idea to get the letters written right away. But, realizing that the judgement would be appealed and not knowing how else to convey this concept to the girls, the social workers told them that their mother was not yet ready to say good-bye as she had not yet accepted the judge's decision.

"No, she's probably still arguing," said Linda. "But it's no use.

Her time is up. It's no use still arguing. The judge believed she did those bad things to us. She did bad things when she was mad. She has no more chances. Her time has run out."

Janis said, "I don't feel sad about Mom because of the things she done. She lied. She's a liar. You can tell the judge that."

Linda said she was afraid that the judges would "change their minds," and she said that if they did she would run away and hide.

When a representative of the Official Guardian later interviewed the children in order to determine what their wishes were with respect to the appeal, they again repeated their desire to stay with the Kovakses and told the lawyer to ask the judge if they could have their old toys back.

Janis wrote a letter to Dr. Oliviera, saying that she would be sad if she had to go back to live with her mother or father. The letter, which was presented as an exhibit to the appeal court, had all the untidiness and errors in spelling and grammar that one would expect from a child who was not yet ten years old. But Janis also showed a sophisticated understanding that belied her age as she wrote, "If we won't see Mom or Dad, then they can make a new life. Then we can make a new life too."

The determination with which the children appeared to be grasping this opportunity to make a new life gives some cause to hope that their harrowing story may have a happy ending.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Kevin Marron was born in London, England, in 1947 and spent his formative years in Egypt, Bahrain, South Wales and the west of England. After completing secondary school, he taught for a year in Algeria under a voluntary service program. In 1970, he graduated from Cambridge University with an honours BA in English, and came to Canada to do postgraduate studies at McMaster University.

Now a Canadian citizen and living in Hamilton, Ont., Marron has worked as a freelance reporter for the Globe and Mail since 1978. Before that he taught at a free school, helped run an alternate community newspaper in Brantford, and edited a weekly newspaper in Dundas. He is now preparing a book about occult groups in Canada.

abuse by satanic cults could be epidemic—and also our 'best kept secret' hidden by traditions that hold the privacy of family life sacrosanct and by adults who refuse to believe the allegations of the victims themselves—because they are only children.

Kevin Marron was on hand as countless expert witnesses took the stand during this politically charged and costly trial. He viewed the chilling videotaped testimony of the sisters "at play" with a therapist, and he recreates the bizarre testimony of the girls' mother—herself a victim of abuse—as she collapsed under oath.

Remarkably, Ritual Abuse is more than an account of extreme human depravity—it is also a testament of hope. Marron recounts the sincerity and love of the foster parents, social workers and doctors whose unflagging commitment helped bring to light and redress these shocking acts. He examines the laws designed to protect children and shows how they often work to promote their exploitation. What are the children's rights in abuse cases? What are the rights of the parents? Who is to be believed?

Ritual Abuse is a powerful story that will haunt you long after you turn the final page. It is a no-holds-barred inquiry into the best—and worst—of human nature. It is a necessary book written with honesty and compassion.

KEVIN MARRON is an Ontario-based journalist who writes for the Globe & Mail on a variety of topics. This is his first book.

"A disturbing account of a very bizarre, shocking and controversial trial."

—Edward L. Greenspan, Q.C.

"A brutal tale convincingly told, proving once again that what man can conceive, he will do. Essential reading for all charged with the protection of children."

—Sylvia Fraser

"Kevin Marron creates a poignant and compelling reminder of how important it is that we, as adults, truly listen to children if we are ever to remember and understand their world—even when it seems 'beyond belief' by rational adult standards. Everyone who purports to care about protecting children has something to learn from this important book. I salute Kevin Marron for his obvious caring and commitment to create something positive from this tragedy. Thank you again for the reminder of the challenges which still await."

Nobody can do everything. But everyone can do something.

No thanks to the CIA, which has attempted for six years to subvert my radio broadcasts and magazine articles by assaulting me with “non-lethal” weapons, an untraceable form of torture perfected by the U.S. government, made something of an art form. A delusion? No. The grim history of American electromagnetic torture is contained herein.

Much sane counsel was given by Sandy Munro, who maintains a secret life comprised of chasing down obscure dirt on covert ops, driven by an awesome sense of justice. Will Robinson and Marilyn Colman, hosts of ”The Lighthouse Report,” aired my political research for five years over KAZU-FM in Monterey, California, rare types who understood my obsession to promote respect for human life in a country that doesn’t. Adam Parfrey, Feral House publisher, provided more wise counsel, the title to this volume and much-needed friendship in the bleakest moments. Child therapists Catherine Gould, Vicky Graham-Costain and Nita Vallens brought me up to date on ritual abuse after a long hiatus from this particular nightmare to take on less stressful research on Nazi death squads, George Bush and the like.

Charles Higham, author of American Swastika, spent long Sunday mornings over breakfast filling my ears with eloquent tales of political subterfuge too thick with scandal to see the light of day for years. His best, unfortunately neglected advice: “Write about people who are dead—you’ll have less trouble that way.” The editors of Hustler have enthusiastically supported my research, as have Patrick Formey, Martin Cannon and Andy Boehm at Prevailing Winds. Virginia McCullough, a researcher with an incredibly active mind and a memory liuke a steel trap, provided much professional guidance. Ted Gunderson and Jackie MacGauley shared the results of their research freely. Michael Sheppard peeled me off the floor in moments of desperation (pursuing Nazi treacheries can get to one; so can an apartment constantly filled with infra-sound and pulsed microwaves, and the occasional pyromaniac out to stop my wagging tongue once and for all). Dave Armstrong, former editor of Random Lengths in Long Beach, was one of the few in the press willing to publish stories on the CIA's domestic excesses. Ron Silver, an actor turned dragon slayer, earned a place in the book. John Lambros, a victim of CIA mind control experiments, contributed a burgeoning file on his tormentors.

The late Mae Brussell's work has proven invaluable, providing the keys to the universe and inspiration to "Brussell Sprouts" in all walks of life, including myself.

Introduction

The Deep Politics of Psychocivilization

Rent-a-Tent, Rent-a-Tent...

For the past fifty years a pathological science has evolved in the netherworld of the national security elite. Like a buxom siren, the science of mind control beckons the technocrat with Machiavellian ambitions into assuming the position of a petty god.

He dreams of cybernetic control of whole populations.

At one point in their careers, in fact, most of the upper-tier academics employed in federal mind control research have publicly expressed a yearning for a psychocivilized society. Subjects of the experimentation have glimpsed their dream—a daily regimen of dehumanizing harrassment and even torture from a remote source, usually veiled by hypnotic memories of "alien" contact or the like. The number of human guinea pigs is growing. The experiments have encompassed entire cities. Electromagnetic influence over the brain and body—flashy comic book technology—is a recurring theme in these pages, which attempts to cut through the veil thrown up by the media around the skulking of the CIA and other totalitarian branches of government.

The science of mind control has achieved the scale of a criminal subculture, and left a wide path of chaos and confusion that crosses all international boundaries. The carnage takes place under the noses of the public, obscured by cover stories and dead witnesses and the incredible naivete of most news reporters. The cover stories take variegated forms:

- Brain Studies—On occasion, with startling candor, federally-funded psychiatrists sometimes blurt out to reporters their deepest desires. Dr. Karl Pribram, director of the Neuropsychology Research Laboratory at Stanford University, once boasted, "I certainly could educate a child by putting an electrode in the lateral hypothalamus." Selective stimulation, he said, meant that "I can grossly change his behavior." In Psychology Today for October, 1973 M.I.T. Professor Stephan Chorover observed: "Too many contemporary neuro- and behavioral-scientists seem committed to a narrow, unrealistic view of human social behavior. They focus mainly on the possibility of controlling behavior. If this continues, psychotechnology will increasingly become a favorite tool of social and political repression."

- The "Alien" Invasion—a very active cover story for the development of mind control technology. Supposedly (as those weird syndicated UFO television programs keep reminding us) alien scientists have voyaged millions of light years to place CIA implants in the bodies of human subjects. This incredible cover story is widely believed—yet most "skeptics" scoff at the notion that human scientists might want to do the same thing. The aliens have been pounded into the heads of the American consumer by a slue of books penned by military intelligence officers.

- Parapsychology, ESP and Remote Viewing Experiments—the type that made history at Stanford University and UCLA. These are usually astonishingly successful and passed off as proof of the paranormal, when in fact they are augmented by telemetric brain technology, and cannot help but succeed if the microwave transmitter is operating and set to the brain frequency of the percipient. Remote viewing, for example, is possible when an image is beamed to the visual pathways.

Psychic Spying?

Four years ago, officers of the Central Intelligence Agency and the National Security Agency participated in a series of unusual experiments run by Stanford Research Institute (SRI) to verify claims that certain people have psychic abilities. The results SRI reported were astonishing.

The SRI investigators, physicists Harold E. Puthoff (a former NSA research engineer) and Russell Targ, set out to demonstrate to their CIA sponsor that their subjects, noted psychic Ingo Swann and a middle-aged businessman named Pat Price, could describe distant locations merely by knowing which geographic coordinates to "look at." Some parapsychologists call this alleged ability "astral projection," or "out of body experience." Puthoff and Targ prefer the term "remote viewing."

Targ and Puthoff—who have disavowed working for the CIA—have in common credentials in advanced laser technology. Puthoff, a high-ranking Scientologist, is the inventor of the tunable laser. Targ once designed a microwave plasma generator. Twilight Zone studies often front for the development of intrusive machines that interact with the cortex. (CIA critic Ken Lawrence sniffed, "it takes considerable mind-bending to suppose the CIA hired men with these skills to try to read the Kremlin's classified zener cards.")

The remote viewing study, code-named "Project Scanate," makes sense when considered a techno-organic test drive conducted under the "rigorous control" of "the sponsor." The Washington Post reported that the Agency admitted transmitting "coordinates" from a monitor in Washington, D.C. to Stanford University. After the experiment, Pat Price, a "psychic" test subjects (yet another Scientologist), was asked to mentally revisit the site. She supplied the following details:

> Top of desk had papers labeled:
> FLYTRAP
> MINERVA
> File cabinet on north wall labeled:
> OPERATION POOL
> Folders inside cabinet labeled:
> CUEBALL
> 14 BALL
> 4 BALL
> RACKUP
> Name of Site vague, seems like Hayford or Haystack Personnel:
> COL. R.J. HAMILTON
> MAJ. GEN. GEORGE R. NASH
> MAJ. JOHN C. CALHOUN

But Mr. Price wasn't nearly satisfied with merely describing a top-secret satellite interrogation station complete with code words used to eavesdrop of Soviet space vehicles (if, in fact, he saw anything at all.) He volunteered to scan "the other side of the globe for a (Soviet) Bloc equivalent, and found one in the Urals," according to the Stanford report on the experiment. He managed to give the map coordinates of the Soviet installation, described it in minute detail, including heliports, radar arrays, railroad tracks, and the observation of an "unusually high ratio of women to men, at least at night."

- Space-Based Defense—As much as half the funding for Star Wars has disappeared into classified R&D programs (see "Blue Smoke and Lasers"). All along, Congress was assured by SDI officials that the funds were spent on the programs for which they were intended. Behind the Pentagon's search for the perfect space-based X-ray laser, replete with faked testing and slick public relations, lurked a secret electromagnetic weapons program, and intrigues that proved fatal to 23 British scientists. Otherwise rational Ph.Ds were driven by an inexplicable, overpowering urge to destroy themselves by biting on live wires and driving furiously into brick walls.

Under the increasingly anxious skies of California, SDI development was housed at Lawrence Livermore labs—once the site of "remote viewing" experiments similar to those at Stanford University.

- Non-lethal weapons—goop guns, robotic soldier-ants and acoustic bullets serve as a much-publicized Trojan horse for the proliferation and introduction of electromagnetic pulse weapons, infra-sound guns, plasma generators, killer satellites, computer-aided mental projection, cranial surveillance devices, EM brain-blasters, pulsed-microwave thought transference, cyborgian psychic driving techniques, computer-enhanced subliminal transmissions and other military spin-offs of remote mind control technology.

- Ritual child abuse—since 1963 the CIA and select branches of military intelligence have been intensely involved in the occult underground. Some of the most menticidal of the Mystery Cults participate in psychoactive drug experimentation, the development of harassment techniques, the testing of brain-intrusive devices on unwary human targets, hypno-programming, and so on.

Dr. Catherine Gould, an Encino, California-based child therapist specializing in ritual abuse, found that "mind control is originally established when the victim is a child under six years old. During this formative stage of development, perpetrating cult members systematically combine dissociation-enhancing drugs, pain, sexual assault, terror, and other forms of psychological abuse in such a way that the child dissociates the intolerable traumatic experience."

Ad nauseum.

Mediaeko, the Swedish investigative group, found that the hidden professional body of the mind control fraternity, "wherever it operated internationally, together with the secret police, was to preserve the secrecy of mind control, since they could systematically certify any person who insisted that he or she had been subjected to such abuse. Now, the conviction of being externally-controlled, of being mind-read or subjected to long-term experimentation with radio-signals was due to the psychoses often referred to as persecution mania, paranoia or schizophrenia." The media have led the public at large to accept that such claims are the ravings of classic persecution mania.

But once the curious political researcher learns his way around the covert mind control universe, it unfolds in media reports like a fine-point Oriental mural on torn rice paper. This volume is an encryption guide for reconstructing the picture from scraps of media disinformation of the type that flows from the False Memory Syndrome Foundation.

Hearing "Voices"

The Hidden History of CIA and Pentagon Electromagnetic Mind Control Experiments on Involuntary Human Subjects

Ricardo S. Caputo was a very disturbed man, as the New York Times blared:

INNER VOICES DEMAND BLOOD:
CONFESSION DIARY IN THE KILLING OF 4 WOMEN

In dozens of sessions with his attorney and psychiatrist, Caputo spoke of hearing "bizarre voices" and "seeing hallucinations" when driven to murderous fits. He described the three personalities inside him. In his diary, the killer wrote of his violent moods, preceded by "broad lines" crossing his vision whenever his emotional state deteriorated and the voices taunted him into a murderous rage.

Desperate, Caputo turned to his brother Alfredo and hired the attorney. Heeding their advice, he surrendered to the Argentine authorities, but "police and judges simply threw up their hands," the Times reported, "claiming that since no charges were pending against him, he could not be arrested, no matter how many crimes he confessed to." In his diary Caputo described the four killings, the "broad lines" scoring his vision when his emotions swung out of control and the voices harassed him. The "voices," he said, "did not let me have any peace."[1]

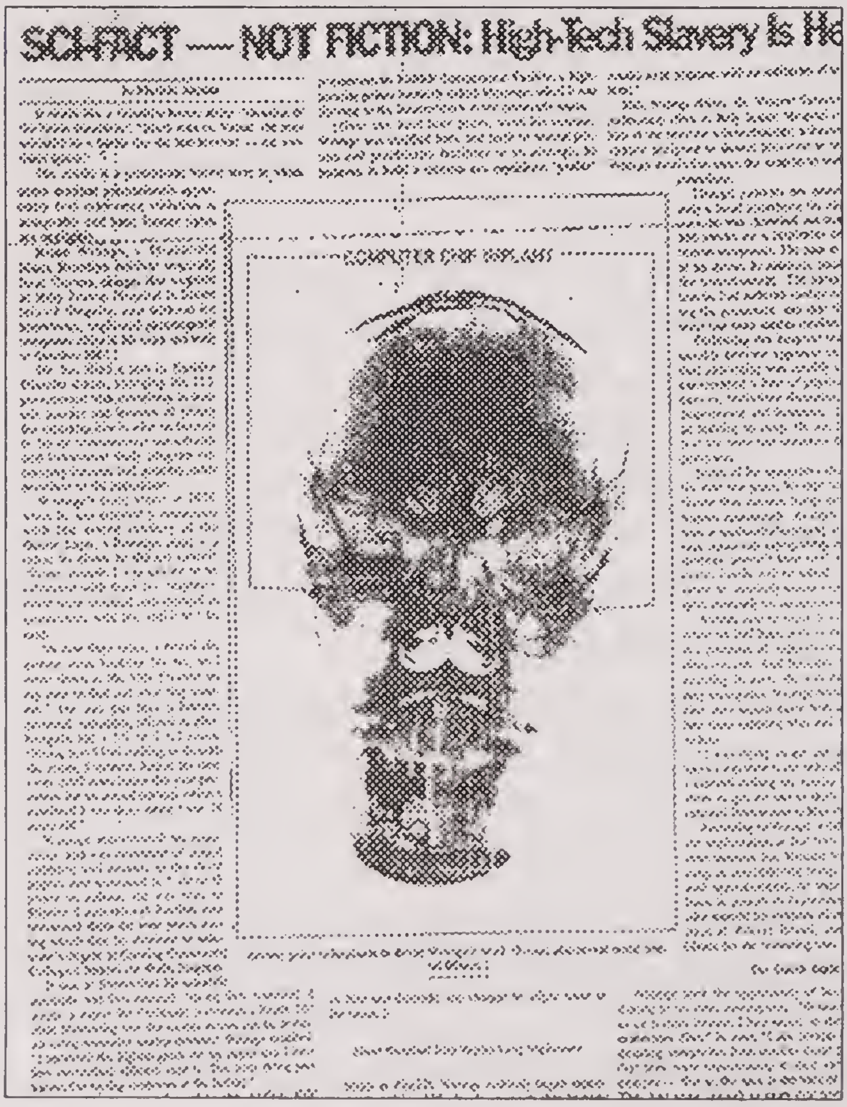
An equally repugnant story was told by Carl Campbell, described by his mother as a troubled man haunted by "voices." On May 5, 1991 Campbell strolled to a bus stop in the Pentagon parking lot and emptied five pistol rounds into the chest and abdomen of Navy Commander Edward J. Higgins, an arms control specialist for the DoD. Campbell was taken into custody by federal police and charged with first-degree murder.

Psychologists submitted a report to U.S. Magistrate W. Curtis Sewell in Alexandria. In it, they wrote that Campbell claimed the CIA had "injected" him with a microchip that controlled his mind.[2] In fact, there is a little known technique used by the CIA for injecting a computer chip into the bloodstream, which delivers it to the brain where it catches and lodges.[3] The question is, how did Campbell, ruled mentally incompetent by the court, a gibbering psychotic, become familiar with an obscure procedure for implanting a biomedical telemetry chip?

Early Giants of Remote Mind Control

The CIA's experiments in radio control of the brain are based on the development of the EEG in the 1920s. In 1934 Drs. Chaffee and Light published a pivotal monograph, "A Method for Remote Control of Electrical Stimulation of the Nervous System." Work along the same lines allowed Dr. Jose Delgado of Cordoba, Spain to climb into bull-ring and, with the push of a button, trigger an electrode in the head of a charging bull and stop the beast in its tracks.

Further groundbreaking advances were made by L.L. Vasiliev, the famed Russian physiologist and doyan of parapsychology, in "Critical Evaluation of the Hypnogenic Method." The article detailed the experiments of Dr. I.F. Tomashevsky in remote radio control of the brain, "at a distance of one or more rooms and under conditions where the participant would not know or suspect that she would be experimented with.... One such experiment was carried out in a park at a distance," Vasiliev reported, and "a post-hypnotic mental suggestion to go to sleep was complied with within a minute."[4]



SCI-FACT — NOT FICTION: High-Tech Slavery Is He

By 1956 Curtiss Shafer, an electrical engineer for the Norden-Ketay Corporation, could explore the possibilities at the National Electronics Conference in Chicago. "The ultimate achievement of biocontrol may be man himself," Shafer said. "The controlled subjects would never be permitted to think as individuals. A few months after birth, a surgeon would equip each child with a socket mounted under the scalp and electrodes reaching selected areas of brain tissue." In this psycho-Arcadia, "sensory perceptions and muscular activity could be either modified or completely controlled by bioelectric signals radiating from state-controlled transmitters."[5]

The CIA had already rushed headlong into Shafer's EMR dystopia with the founding of an experimental mind control clinic in Montreal, directed by the notorious D. Ewen Cameron, M.D. on grants from the Rockefeller Foundation and J.D. McConnell of the Montreal Star. Another pool of funding was the Gerschickter Foundation, named for Dr. Charles Gerschickter of Georgetown University Hospital, who had tested potent drugs on mental patients and the terminally ill, and bombarded monkeys with radar waves until they passed out at the behest of the CIA.[6]

Allan Memorial was housed in a limestone mansion atop Mount Royal, donated by Sir Hugh Allan and staffed with emigre psychiatrists from war-crushed Europe.

Cameron shared a bloodless, sadistic character with the Nazis he analyzed early in his career. Allan Memorial opened in 1942. Three years later he was invited to Nuremberg to evaluate the mental state of Rudolph Hess. In Germany Cameron could dissect the aberrations of fascist rule. Dr. Harvey Weinstein, a psychiatrist whose father was a guinea pig for Cameron's mind control experiments, writes that Germany was "a laboratory in which the issues of authority, powerlessness, individual motivation and behavior could be examined."[7] And ruthlessly applied in Montreal. Cameron's early revulsion at Nazi violence gave way to a growing elitist sensibility. His scorn for the weak, including his own mentally-crippled patients, qualified him for the carnage to come.

In 1992 retired Colonel L. Fletcher Prouty, formerly a Pentagon liaison to the CIA, told author Dick Russell that Allan Memorial "was pretty well organized." Prouty:

> If you get ahold of a directory for the American Psychiatric Association in around 1956 or 1957, you'll be surprised to find that an enormous percentage of the individuals listed are foreign-born. Mostly they came out of Germany and Eastern Europe in a big wave. They were all called "technical specialists," but really they were psychiatrists. They went into jobs at universities mostly—but many were working on these 'unconventional' mind control programs for U.S. intelligence.... These would go to people like Dr. Cameron in Canada.[8]

Not one of Cameron's patients was ever cured in the Radio Telemetry Laboratory, a makeshift torture chamber assembled in the cellar of his own private Bedlam. The financial underpinnings for the experiments came from Cornell's Society for the Investigation of Human Ecology, a CIA front. Cameron's right-hand man was Leonard Rubenstein, an electrical whiz of Cockney descent who lacked medical bona fides, but passionately exercised a fascination with remote brain control. He foresaw the telemetry lab as the foundation of a sprawling psychopolitical Apparat "that will keep tabs on people without their knowing," as he told a fellow staffer.[9]

Cameron's left hand was Dr. Walter Freeman, who had performed no less than 4,000 frontal lobotomies in 20 years of practice—often on patients suffering only mild depression or paranoia. Dr. Freeman went on to become a respected San Francisco brain specialist.[10]

The psychotronic heart of the laboratory was the Grid Room, with its verticed, Amazing Tales interior. The subject was strapped into a chair involuntarily, by force, his head bristling with electrodes and transducers. Any resistance was met with a paralyzing dose of curare. The subject's brain waves were beamed to a nearby reception room crammed with voice analyzers, a wire recorder and radio receivers cobbled together by Rubenstein.[11] The systematic annihilation, or "depatterning" of a subject's mind and memory, was accomplished with overdoses of LSD, barbiturate sleep for 65 days at a stretch and ECT shocks at 75 times the recommended dosage. Psychic driving, the repetition of a recorded message for 16 hours a day, programmed the empty mind. Fragile patients referred to Allan Memorial for help were thus turned into carbuncular jellyfish.[12]

Yet Cameron, before his death in 1967, was president of the American and Canadian Psychiatric Associations.

His work in brain emissions was balanced elsewhere by experiments in reception. Honeywell, Inc., for instance, launched into "a method to penetrate inside a man's mind and control his brain waves over long distance."[13] The Scientific Engineering Institute in Boston, another CIA cover, was established in 1956 to study radar. In 1962 the SEI set up a "Life Sciences" lab to study the effects of electrodes deep within the brain.[14] At the National Institutes of Health, Dr. Maitland Baldwin beamed radio signals into the brains of lobotomized monkeys. His CIA monitors noted weird excesses: in one experiment, Baldwin decapitated a monkey and transplanted its head to the body of another, then attempted to restore it to life with radar saturation.[15]

At Langley the experiments were presided over by Dr. Stephen Aldrich, a patron of occult research, foreshadowing the use of mind control technology by satanic cults in the 1980s and '90s, according to Julianne McKinney, director of the Electronic Surveillance Project of the Association of National Security Alumni.[16] Dr. Aldrich, a graduate of Amherst and Northwestern, took control of The Firm's Office of Research and Development (ORD) in 1962 upon the departure of Sidney Gottleib. The occasion marked the birth of Operation Often, an investigation of the occult. With Houston sorceress Sybil Leek as their guide, CIA behaviorists studied the arcana of the occult underground.[17]

The SEI contributed a social laboratory to Often in 1972 at the University of South Carolina in the form of a course in rituals of demonology and voodoo.[18]

Aldrich's interest in the occult (shared by scores of others in the intelligence world.[19]) may explain his penchant for remote brain manipulation, based as it is in "psychic" technology. Under the direction of Aldrich, writes John Marks in The Search for the Manchurian Candidate, ORD technocrats "kept probing for ways to control human behavior, and they were doing so with space-age technology that made the days of MKULTRA look like the horse-and buggy era."[20] Particularly useful to CIA scientists were advances in stereotaxic surgery, simplifying the implantation of electrodes in the brain to wipe out a subject's memories in preparation for hypnotic reconstructive surgery.

In 1965 the New York Times learned of obscure electronic experiments quietly funded by the government, and went tabloid with the front-page headline:

MIND CONTROL COMING, SCIENTIST WARNS

Dr. David Krech, a psychology professor at the University of California, warned that "our research may carry with it even more serious implications than the awful, in both senses of the word, achievements of the atomic physicists." When leaks to the press exposed the horror stories, he said, "let us not find ourselves in the position of being caught foolishly surprised, naively perplexed and touchingly full of publicly displayed guilt."[21]

On May 6 Dr. Delgado, the Spanish bulltamer and postwar Yale researcher, closed a lecture on the evolution of the brain at the American Museum of Natural History in New York with the announcement that "science has developed a new electrical methodology for the study and control of cerebral function in animals and humans."[22]

Operation Bloodbath

Encouraged by progress in transforming human beings into cordless automatons, the CIA picked up the pace. Two years before Dr. Krech's admonition, a CIA manual was prepared on the electronic wizardry of Radio-Hypnotic Intracerebral Control (RHIC), originally developed by the Pentagon, according to a 1975 issue of Modern People:

> When a part of your brain receives a tiny electrical impulse from outside sources, such as vision, hearing, etc., an emotion is produced—anger at the sight of a gang of boys beating an old > woman, for example. The same emotions of anger can be created by artificial radio signals sent to your brain by a controller. You could instantly feel the same white hot anger without any apparent reason.[23]

The objective of Project ARTICHOKE, the CIA's umbrella remote mind control program in the 1950s (as reported in innumerable men's magazines) was the creation of a "Manchurian" killer-puppet with a revolver and a memory like a steel sieve, both emptied by electrical stimulation.

The technology existed by the early 1960s to support the contention of former FBI agent Lincoln Lawrence (an alias) and researcher Art Ford in the classic investigation of CIA mind control ops, Were We Controlled?, that Lee Harvey Oswald was a hypnogenic assassin—with a malfunctioning electrical implant in his head.

That a political assassin could be directed from afar to strike on cue is not so implausible as it may seem to the uninitiated. The authors' reconstruction holds up as well today as it did in 1968, when the book was published. If only persons involved with the book proved as durable. Lawrence's attorney, the late Martin Scheiman, was gunned down inside the Time-Life Building. A condensation of the book by Damon Runyon, Jr. (an adherent to New Orleans D.A. Jim Garrison's recreation of the Kennedy assassination) was preempted by death. In April, 1968 the celebrated writer suffered a mortal fall from a bridge in Washington, D.C.'s Rock Creek Park.[24]

The CIA circle in the Inferno swelled with odd deaths, disappearances and "suicides."

In 1975 Herman Kimsey, a veteran Army counter intelligence operative and a ranking CIA official until his resignation in 1962, surfaced posthumously in Hugh MacDonald's Appointment in Dallas: "Oswald was programmed to kill," Kimsey told MacDonald, "like a medium at a seance. Then the mechanism went on the blink and Oswald became a dangerous toy without direction."[25] Three weeks after the interview, Kimsey perished of heart failure.[26]

Likewise, Oswald crony David Ferrie, a CIA pilot and hypnotist, was found dead in his New Orleans apartment, surrounded by fifteen empty medicine bottles, a seeming suicide. But the coroner's final ruling was that the cause of death was a berry aneurysm. Forensic specialists ventured that the blood vessel had hemorrhaged as the result of a karate blow to back of his head. Raiding police carted off Ferrie's effusive notes on hypnosis and a pile of books on post-hypnotic suggestion. His cohorts went into hiding after his death, but one, Jack Martin, surfaced long enough, according to Walter Bowart in Operation Mind Control, "to suggest that Oswald had been programmed by Ferrie to go to Dallas and kill the President."[27]

A shadow cabinet of intelligence officials guided the CIA's remote mind control program. The reigning Big Brother was Richard Helms, then plans director, a product of the Eastern cryptocracy (his grandfather was the first director of the International Bank of Settlements, and past president of the Federal Reserve), and a former United Press reporter, in which capacity he interviewed Adolph Hitler in 1937.[28] In the wake of the Bay of Pigs tragedy, Helms was selected by CIA Director John McCone to run the "dirty tricks" department. Appointed to the position of Director of Central Intelligence in 1966, he left the Agency six years later. Before departing, Helms kept the secrets by ordering the destruction of all files relating to MKULTRA.[29]

He was a Machiavelli with a mission. An avid proponent of telemetry as a form of low-intensity warfare, Helms commandeered a vast research network in pursuit of such subtle depth persuasion techniques as the transmission of strategic subliminal messages to the brains of enemy populations. He advocated the use of high-frequencies to affect memory and even the unconscious. Helms ordered up a scientific cabal to study automata theory.[30] In a memo to the Warren Commission, he made mention of "biological radio communication."[31]

The 1964 memo was prophetic. Helms:

> Cybernetics can be used in molding of a child's character, the inculcation of knowledge and techniques, the amassing of experience, the establishment of social behavior patterns... all functions which can be summarized as control of the growth processes of the individual.[32]

Cybernetics technology that responds to thought was in the offing. In his memo, Helms diverted attention from CIA-funded research and development by alluding to the Soviets. But then they had no technology the U.S. did not also have, he conceded.

A subsequent CIA directive, summarized in a brochure on the "Cybernetic Technique" distributed by Mankind Research Unlimited (MRU), a research front in the District of Columbia, gleefully discusses the Agency's development of a "means by which information of modest rate can be fed to humans utilizing other senses than sight or hearing." The Cybernetic Technique, "based on Eastern European research," involves beaming information to individual nerve cells. The purpose, the directive states, is the enhancement of mental and physical performance.[33]

The cyborg was born.

Cyborg Nazis and the MASERS of Pandora

In 1965, upon discovering the microwave dousing of the American embassy in Moscow, the DoD's secretive Advanced Research Projects Agency (ARPA) set up a laboratory at the Walter Reed Army Institute of Research in Washington, D.C. ARPA had already developed a prodigious arsenal of electromagnetic weapons. Dr. Jose Delgado (whose work with radio-waves was underwritten by the CIA and Navy) thought these invisible weapons "more dangerous than atomic destruction." With knowledge of the brain, he said, "we may transform, we may shape, direct, robotize man. I think the great danger of the future is... that we will have robotized human beings who are not aware that they have been robotized."[34] Touching, but Delgado's sudden fit of conscience was belated. America's EM arsenal owes its very existence to his brain transponder experiments, which robotized humans.

But the beaming of the American embassy was an unexpected turn in the Invisible Cold War. What were the Ruskies up to?

The Moscow Signal, Paul Brodeur speculates in The Zapping of America, may be a perennial stern warning to the DoD to curb any geopolitical ambitions that EM weapons might inspire. He also interprets the Signal as retaliation for "the threat or fact of unwarranted irradiation of their population by powerful electromagnetic devices that now encircle them and look down on them from outer space."[35]

Baffled officials of the intelligence community consulted experts on the biological effects of the radiation. Dr. Milton Zaret, a leading microwave scientist recruited by PANDORA, recalls that the CIA inquired "whether I thought electromagnetic radiation beamed at the brain from a distance could affect the way a person might act," and "could microwaves be used to facilitate brainwashing or to break down prisoners under investigation."[36] The State Department chose to keep the Signal a secret from embassy employees—and studied the side-effects instead. Ambassador Stoessel's office was situated in the beam's center. He fell prey to a blood disease, bleeding eyes, nausea, and eventually lymphoma. Two other State Department employees, Charles Bohlen and Llewellyn Thompson, have been stricken with cancer. The existence of the Soviet beam was only acknowledged by the U.S. in 1976, in response to a Jack Anderson column.

The State Department declared that the microwave saturation of the embassy activated bugging devices in the walls. But Dr. Zaret has conducted his own tests, simulating the Moscow emissions, and reviewed Soviet medical literature. He concluded that the Moscow Signal was psychoactive: "Whatever other reasons the Russians may have had, they believed the beam would modify the behavior of personnel."[37]

In 1965 the Pentagon's investigation of microwaves was "broadened to include ARPA and code-named Project PANDORA, based at the Walter

Reed Army Institute of Research. PANDORA scientists began by zapping monkeys to study the biological effects of highly concentrated microwave frequencies.[38] Similar studies were conducted at the Veterans' Administration Hospital in Kansas City, the University of Rochester, Brooks Air Force Base in Texas, Johns Hopkins, MIT, the Mitre Corporation, the University of Pennsylvania, and scores of other domestic and foreign research laboratories.

CIA researchers, meanwhile, explored other bands on the EM spectrum. The ubiquitous Dr. Delgado blasted the amygdala and hippocampus of four of his patients with radio waves. He reported that they experienced sundry emotions, sensations, and "colored visions."[39] Scientists at the National Institutes of Health duplicated Rubenstein's medieval telemetry lab at Allan Memorial.[40] And at UCLA, Dr. Ross Adey (who worked closely with emigre Nazi technicians after WW II) rigged the brains of lab animals to transmit to a radio receiver, which shot signals back to a device that sparked any behavior desired by the researcher.[41]

Such gadgets have turned up in startling places.

In The Controllers, mind control researcher Martin Cannon argues that the brain transmitters and "stimoceivers" of the 1960s were "similar to those now viewed in (UFO) abductee MRI scans." The press ceased coverage of brain telemetry experiments in the mid-seventies. But

Washington Post story for August 7, 1977 explained how the CIA beamed signals to Stanford University at the very time researchers there conducted remote viewing experiments. Were images beamed to the heads of the percipients?

Cannon's study of abduction accounts led him to conclude that effects of brain stimulation "can now be elicited with microwaves and other forms of electromagnetic radiation, with and without electrodes."[42]

In the scientific underground the development of microwave weapons suffered inevitable eruptions, making the front pages. Retaliation for the Moscow Signal is the probable background of one flat-toned LA Times news brief on England's EM "death ray":

> The official Soviet newspaper Izvestia said that high-frequency radio waves used to power British eavesdropping devices may have killed two Soviet citizens in London. In an article headlined "Rays Bring Death," the newspaper said microwave radiation was used to control sophisticated listening devices implanted in the walls of the diplomatic compound in London.... A senior British Foreign Office official denied any government connection with the deaths.[43]

The U.S. conceived its own electromagnetic "death ray" in 1965. The patent, according to officials of McFarlane, an independent R&D firm, was stolen from them by NASA. The theft was reported in hearings before the House Subcommittee on DoD appropriations, chaired by Rep. George Mahon of Texas. The invention, a "Modulated Electron-Gun X-Ray Nuclear Booster," could be adapted to "communications, remote control and guidance systems, electromagnetic radiation telemetering and death ray applications," according to company literature.

McFarlane submitted the prototype to NASA in 1964, along with detailed plans, circuit drawings and technical data. But NASA's Inventions and Contributions Board dismissed the device as "of no significant value in our aeronautical and space program." The Booster was rejected. A year later NASA proposed to Congress the development of MIROS, a point-to-point orbital "communications system" (any offensive military intention went unspoken), based on principles conceived by McFarlane with acknowledged "death ray" applications."[44]

"Why," a company official asked the subcommittee, "does NASA appear before congressional committees to ask for funds for these very same developments, which they have told us are of no value? Why the double standard?"[45]

Electronic warfare was the invisible axis of the Cold War. The McFarlane design anticipated Star Wars by twenty years, but even then the subject of EM killer satellites was never publicly raised.

The militarization of psychotronics branched into every conceivable direction. Systems Consultants, Inc., the federal proprietary, was founded in 1966 with branch offices in Virginia and "a permanent, professional staff of 250 concentrated on problem solving in the areas of intelligence, electronic warfare, sensor technology and applications."[46] The aforementioned Mankind Research Unlimited is a spin-off of Systems Consultants. MRU advertises that "biological effects" can be "modified by action of energies, or biological force fields." More to the point, MRU maintains that the Soviet Union has "more than twenty centers for the study of biocommunications"—or ESP and related technology "with an annual budget estimated to be over 12 million rubles ($13 million) for 1967." The U.S., an MRU spokesman lamented in a company brochure, lagged far behind. "Mankind Research hopes to counter and reverse this trend so that the full fruits and benefits derived from this research are also made available to the United States."[47]

MRU's primary interests (and so the CIA's) were an open book: "Biocybernetics," "Psycho-Technology Research" and "Behavioral Neuropsychiatry," among other mind-dominating military and intelligence systems.

Vietnam burned in the political background. Students marched. The Nixon camp was poised to assume power and strategic political murders assured they would. The mind control netherworld erupted yet again with the assassination of Robert Kennedy in Los Angeles on June 5, 1968.

"I'll never forget his eyes," Western Union operator Mary Grohs said of Sirhan Sirhan, whom she met an hour before the shooting at the Ambassador Hotel. Others also noticed his eyes. "Dark brown and peaceful," said George Plimpton, one of six men required to wrestle Sirhan into submission as Kennedy lay dying.[48] Sirhan, in the opinion of many prominent researchers, was a hypno-patsy.

"Sirhan's trial was, and will be remembered, as the psychiatric blunder of the century," argues Dr. Eduard Simson-Kallas, senior psychologist of the California prison system when he examined Sirhan.[49] In his March 9, 1973 affidavit, Simson-Kallas reported that he was "appalled at the conduct of mental health professionals involved in this case." He agreed to read the transcripts at Sirhan's request, concluding that psychological findings submitted to the court were "strongly in conflict with the trial's main witnesses." At no point in the evidence did he find that Sirhan was a "paranoid schizophrenic" or "psychotic," as several government psychologists testified. One, Dr. Diamond, has diagnosed Sirhan as a sufferer of "dementia praecox." But if this were true, Simson-Kallas wrote, "Sirhan would have to be incurably insane. That is what the label means. Sirhan was not incurably insane,' or even 'insane.'"

"Whatever strange behavior I showed in court," Sirhan told him, "was the result of my outrage over Dr. Diamond's and other doctor's testimony. They were saying many things about me that were grossly untrue, nor did I give them permission to testify in my behalf in court."

Furthermore, Simson-Kallas insists that "Dr. Diamond was wrong in testifying that the evidence for psychosis was obtained when Sirhan was under hypnosis. The fact is, paranoid schizophrenics are almost impossible to hypnotize." Sirhan dropped into a trance easily. "Psychotics in general are among the poorest subjects for hypnosis. They cannot concentrate, they do not follow instructions and basically do not trust." Sirhan had no such aversion to hypnosis. On the contrary, he once made a trance disk and practiced self-hypnosis as a distraction from Death Row malaise. This required "considerable self-control, which no psychotic has," Simson-Kallas says. "That Sirhan was easy to hypnotize... proves he was not a paranoid schizophrenic."[50]

Sirhan wasn't demented; he was controlled. His inability to recall the murder is either the aftermath of post-hypnotic suggestion or a synapse-deadening radio blast ("Electronic Dissolution of Memory," or EDOM, a CIA technique exposed by Lincoln Lawrence). There are other indications of hynotic—possibly radio-hypnotic—control of Sirhan:

- Thane Eugene Cesar, a "security guard," is widely considered to be the designated assassin. Like all participants in the murders of John and Robert Kennedy, Cesar was politically hard-right. He told Ted Charach, co-producer of The Second Gun, an assassination documentary, that he'd been to "American-Nazi conclaves." Cesar held down a fuzzily-defined job at Lockheed, a company on intimate terms with the CIA, and a PANDORA contractor. Jim Yoder, a retired Lockheed engineer, told former FBI agent William Turner that Cesar worked floating assignments in an "off-limits" area operated by the CIA.[51] (Lockheed was also on cozy terms with Richard Nixon's political circle, particularly William Rogers, former secretary of state, who in 1975 urged Henry Kissinger to purge the names of Lockheed agents from a Justice Department probe of bribery allegations.[52])

Sirhan under hypnosis: "PRACTICE, PRACTICE, PRACTICE..." "Practice what?" asked Dr. Diamond. "MIND CONTROL, MIND CONTROL, MIND CONTROL, MIND CONTROL..."[53] The repetition recalls Dr. Cameron's "psychic driving."

- Charles McQuiston, a former Army intelligence officer, applied a technique called Psychological Stress Evaluation to tape recordings of Sirhan. McQuiston concluded that "Sirhan was under some kind of hypnotic influence... kept repeating certain phrases." Again, psychic driving, a pet CIA technique, enters Sirhan's mental profile. "I believe Sirhan was brainwashed under hypnosis by the constant repetition of words like, 'You are nobody, you're nothing, the American dream is gone.'"[54] This is precisely the sort of ego-trashing epistle used in Cameron's classified experiments at Allan Memorial's Telemetry Lab.[55] When Sirhan believed it, McQuiston says, "someone implanted an idea, kill RFK, and under hypnosis the brainwashed Sirhan accepted it." Similar messages have long been radioed to auditory receivers buried in the cochlea or brains of the CIA's experimental subjects.

- Assassination researchers accuse William Bryan, a Los Angeles hypnotist, of programming Sirhan. Bryan was a brainwashing specialist for the Air Force in Korea, and thereafter an adviser to the CIA's mind control program. In L.A. he ran the American Institute of Hypnosis, a therapeutic clinic.[56]

- Sirhan disappeared for three months in 1967. A neighbor of Sirhan's family told the FBI that his mother was "extremely worried" and "she did not know his whereabouts for some time." When Sirhan returned home, he displayed a fascination with the occult. His co-enthusiast was Walter Thomas Rathke, described by a friend as "far-right politically."[57] Rathke trained Sirhan in self-hypnosis with mirrors and candles. In his self-induced trances, psychic driving messages (according to McQuiston) programmed him to empty his revolver on cue. In all, twelve shots were fired.

The only gap in the mind control picture is this: Sirhan's trances were self-induced. Alone in the dark with his mirrors and candles, it's unlikely he provided the "messages" himself. Their source has yet to be determined. Reports by victims of CIA auditory-frequency experiments date them to the mid-sixties, and may explain Sirhan's agitated, robotic speech patterns.

Breaking the ESP Barrier

The "voices" were conceived in a lightning bolt. In 1956 two geophysicists, Holzer and Deal, noticed that naturally-occurring electromagnetic signals in the auditory range were tossed off by thunderstorms.[58] With little variation, most of the EM bursts were metered at 25 to 130 cycles/sec., with a very low attenuation rate. In other words, lightning discharges could be picked up anywhere in the world as "magnetic noise" on the ELF radio dial.

Two years on, Dr. Allan Frey, a biophysicist at General Electric's Advanced Electronics Center, Cornell University (and a contractor for the Office of Naval Research), published a "technical note" in Aerospace Medicine reporting that the auditory system responds "to electromagnetic energy in at least a portion of the radio frequency (RF) spectrum. Further, this response is instantaneous and occurs at low power densities… well below that necessary for biological damage."[59] Frey's subjects "heard" buzzes and knocks when exposed to low frequency radio emissions. In one experiment a radio beam swept over a subject, and with each sweep he "heard the radio frequency (RF) sound for a few seconds and reported it." When Frey modulated power densities, he discovered that even clinically deaf subjects perceived RF sounds. He played with transmitter settings, and was shocked to find that radio beams "can induce the perception of severe buffeting of the head," or prick the skin like needles.[60]

It seems that the brain is a powerful receiver. Frey: "The human auditory system and a table radio may be one order of magnitude apart in sensitivity to RF energy."[61] The area of the brain most sensitive to radio energy was just above the temporal lobe. The vocabulary of RF noises was expanded by modulating the pulse (with "no information placed in the signal"), perceived by the subject as originating from within or slightly behind the head.

Among practical applications of auditory stimulation, Frey proposed "stimulating the nervous system without the damage caused by electrodes."[62]

It was a significant discovery—but met with a wall of yawns from the status-quo scientific community. To his horror, he became the butt of jokes in letters to peer review journals. But PANDORA's technocrats supported his experiments and took the obvious military applications very seriously. Frey's work with microwaves had obvious uses in covert operations. In one experiment, for instance, he synchronized pulsed microwaves with the myocardia rhythm of a frog. Its heart stopped. He microwaved cats and found that stimulation of the hypothalamus had a powerful effect on emotions.[63]

Frey was reluctant to experiment on humans for ethical reasons. But PANDORA was manned by a full complement of Nazi Paperclip imports, and they did not balk at irradiating human subjects.

One of the German scientists employed by the government was Dr. Dietrich Beischer, who exposed some 7,000 Naval crewmen to dangerous levels of microwave energy at the Naval Aerospace Research Laboratory in Pensacola, Florida. Data on exposure limits, he declared at a symposium in Dahlgren, Virginia in 1973, could be "obtained in no other way," given the "exquisitely complex and dynamic nature of the human organism."[64]

Alas, Dr. Beischer, like scores of other scientists engaged in the experiments, died or disappeared in 1977. Among his last personal contacts was Nobel laureate, ESP researcher and fellow PANDORAN Robert O. Becker:

> Just before the meeting, I got a call from him. With no preamble or explanation, he blurted out: "I'm at a pay phone. I can't talk long. They are watching me. I can't come to the meeting or ever communicate with you again. I'm sorry. You've been a good friend. Goodbye." Soon afterward I called his office at Pensacola > and was told, "I'm sorry, there is no one here by that name," just as in the movies. A guy who had done important research there for decades just disappeared.[65]

The Promethean architects of Psychocivilization guarded the emerging technology jealously. "They" were more likely to be the CIA than the KGB.

An "official" halt to PANDORA's excesses was called in 1970, but the research had turned a historic corner and classified RF mind control testing quickly became a military armed drugs, ECT, torture, brain surgery or most other forms of behavior modification. The CIA and Pentagon concentrated their efforts on electromagnetism. Why the fuss?

A computerized form of telepathy.

"Biocommunication," the dream of Richard Helms, was tested on humans within a few years of his memo to the Warren Commission. The CIA had achieved direct communication between brain and computer by the late sixties, and had demonstrated in the laboratory that computer-assisted automatic learning was possible by pin-pointing neuron clusters in the brain with radio signals.[66] Microwaves easily penetrated the head's protective shielding of bone and membrane. Miniaturization of the receiver linked the mind to a remote computer. Brain waves were unscrambled and deciphered, recorded, beamed to another person—two-way mental communication.[67]

In Technospies (1978), author Ford Rowan foresaw the possibilities:

> Computers that can communicate with the brain may help people in all sorts of intellectual tasks. A tiny terminal implanted in a person's brain would give him access to giant computer banks, for instance, and with the miniaturization of computers, an actual computer could be implanted in the brain. From the individual's viewpoint it would become a part of his brain, extending his knowledge and memory immensely.[68]

The mind-reading venture was the culmination of a goal fixed as early as 1951 to Project ARTICHOKE, the CIA's development of behavior control techniques employing drugs, hypnosis, electroshock and extrasensory perception.[69]

Robert Naeslund, by his own account a subject of the experiments, claims to have been implanted unaware while undergoing surgery in 1967. He describes the "brain transmitter" in his head (with X-ray verification) as a device that floods the brain with radio energy, "picks up the sensory functions of the brain... Vision, thoughts, images, hearing, etc. are completely obvious to the person who has the receiver connected to his head." A Stockholm physician consulted by Naeslund told him: "young children were also used for these experiments in order to evaluate thought activity and reactions in children."[70]

The development of remote mind-reading machines in secret academic enclaves picked up with ARPA backing in the early 1970s. Scientists mapped the brain, gigahertzed the nervous system and gauged biohazards at MIT, NYU and UCLA. NASA launched its program. A story on the ARPA brain control effort appeared, not in the corporate press, but the National Enquirer for June 22, 1976. The Pentagon did not exactly deny the story. Robert L. Gilliat, an assistant general counsel for the Department of Defense, replied meekly: "The so-called 'brain-wave' machine… is not capable of reading brain waves of anyone other than a willing participant in the laboratory efforts to develop that particular device."[71] Presumably, the brain of an unwilling subject was impenetrable to microwaves.

In 1972 an ARPA report to Congress announced, after Helms, that "the long-sought goal (is) direct and intimate coupling between man and the computer." Four years later ARPA reported that thought-wave research had gone beyond communication to enhance memory by downloading information into the brain. Based on these capabilities, the post-PANDORA team set out to upgrade the interpretation of neural signals, and broaden the program to invent realistic tasks of "military significance."[72]

This side of the electronic battlefield, the experiments contributed to medicine the "transmitter-reinforcer," a device that transmits data on a patient's health. Ford:

> The transmitter-reinforcer utilizes space age technology to send accurate readings on the patient's condition to a computer, which digests the data. The computer can monitor many patients simultaneously. If a patient needs a dose of aversion treatment, the computer acts as controller, delivering a tone signal or shock.

The original, clandestine purpose of the "reinforcer" was not lost on authoritarian types in the psychiatric wings. Rowan:

> One study suggested that radio transmitter receivers should be implanted into the brains of patients to broadcast information to a computer which would monitor and control the patients' behavior.[73]

Other "constructive" uses of CIA/PANDORA telemetric brain implants were championed by criminologists. In 1972, Drs. Barton Ingraham and Gerald Smith advocated the implantation of brain transmitters to monitor and manipulate the minds of probationers. "The technique of telemetric control of human beings offers the possibility of regulating behavior with precision on a subconscious level," the authors enthused in a 1972 Issues in Criminology article.[74]

Surveillance expert Joseph Meyer of the DoD carried the idea a step further, proposing that electromagnetic mind control devices "surround the criminal with a kind of externalized conscience, an electronic substitute for social conditioning, group pressure and inner motivation." The ideal subject for testing the implants was "the poor and uneducated urban dweller (who) is fundamentally unnecessary to the economy," Meyer said.

Military doctors with hard-right political views were naturally drawn to electronic mind control as the final solution to the "useless eaters" quandary. One Air Force doctor went so far as to recommend, in the New England Journal of Medicine, that if a criminal's brain waves did not test "normal" after five years, he should be put to death.[75]

Dr. Louis Jolyon West, formerly a CIA brainwashing specialist and LSD experimenter, proposed establishing a computerized system employing space technology to monitor and control the violence-prone.[76] At UCLA's Neuropsychiatric Institute, under West's direction, a biofeedback device was developed to control sexual deviants that fits the penis. Sexual arousal set off an audible signal that became louder as the device expanded. At the same time, heart beat rate and muscular tension were monitored by telemetric computer.[77] This sort of Orwellian thinking led opponents of West to fear the prospect that computer data on young children could be used as justification for implanting them for state control.[78]

The nagging ethical considerations prompted a report on future applications and possible abuses. Scientists at Lockheed and Stanford Research Institute prepared the report, which postulated the rise of "a technocratic elite" with dominion over intelligence and identification systems to monitor whole countries. Wars would be waged by robots.

Technological advances anticipated by the authors included computer-operated artificial organs, biocybernetic devices to provide "social conversation, entertainment, companionship and even physical gratification," and a "machine-animal symbiant," an animal or human monitor that transmits its perceptions to a central authority. Partially funded by the National Science Foundation, the report recommended the formation of an oversight panel of artificial intelligence specialists to uphold ethical standards.[79]

"Voices" in the Attic

The moral squalor of the government's RF mind control program cried out for oversight, as one case history from the Los Angeles Herald Examiner (for March 21, 1979) makes clear:

A SUIT OVER BRAIN SURGERY—
MAN HALLUCINATES, SAY MICROWAVES ARE MURDERING HIM

The subject was Leonard Kille, a talented electronics engineer. Kille was the holder of patents for inventions willed to MIT when his brain was disabled by CIA psychiatrists Vernon Mark of Boston City Hospital and UCLA's Frank Ervin.

Kille was a co-inventor of the Land camera, named for Edwin Land of the Polaroid Corporation, an old boy of the CIA's mind control program. It was Land, in fact, who founded the Scientific Engineering Institute on behalf of the CIA.[81] (The SEI appeared earlier in this account hosting a course on demonology and witchcraft at the University of South Carolina, and planting electrodes in the brains of human subjects.) Land's CIA clique of "behaviorists" apparently drew their moral inspiration from the Death's Head Order of the Waffen SS. At South Vietnam's Bien Hoa Hospital, for example, an SEI team team buried electrodes in the skulls of Vietcong POWs and attempted to spur them into violence by remote control. Upon completion of the experiments, the POWs were shot and cremated by a company of "America's best," the Green Berets.[82]

Kille's story is no less lurid. In 1966 he suspected that his wife was having an affair. She denied it. He didn't believe her and flew into rages. A psychiatrist interpreted his anger as a "personality pattern disturbance," and referred him to Mark and Ervin for neurological tests. They diagnosed him a mild psychomotor epileptic, and his jealousy was obviously "paranoia." (As it happens, his wife was carrying on an affair with a boarder.) His psychiatrists described Kille as "uncontrolled," "dangerous." (In fact, Kille's most violent outburst consisted of throwing tin cans at his wife—he missed her.) Kille was hospitalized and pressured into brain surgery. He refused at first, but his wife threatened divorce if he didn't submit to his psychiatrists. The cruel irony was that she divorced him after the surgery anyway to marry her paramour.

In the operating room, four electrical strands running the length of his brain were implanted. Each strand was studded with 20 or so electrodes. It was only after surgery that Kille was asked to sign his consent with the strands in place, already zinging his brain.[83]

Internal EEG activity was recorded. The voltage of the stimoceivers was boosted as part of Kille's "treatment."[84]

Dr. Peter Breggin of the Center to Study Psychiatry, a rare ombudsman of psychiatric abuses, investigated the case and found despite the glowing reports of Mark and Ervin that the patient was "totally disabled, chronically hospitalized, and subject to nightmarish terrors that he will be caught and operated on again at the Massachusetts General Hospital."[85]

In 1971 an attendant found him with a wastebasket on his head to "stop the microwaves." A sympathetic doctor at Boston's VA hospital, where he was transferred, ordered for him "a large sheet of aluminum foil so he may fashion a protective helmet for himself. Good luck." The VA doctors were not informed that Kille had been fitted with the electrode strands, and wrote him off as a delusional paranoiac.

"The Mass General and labs… (are) killing all the useful cells in my brain," he confided in a note to a VA doctor when the electrodes burned lesions into his amygdala, another "treatment." It left him permanently paralyzed from the waist down.

Sweet and Ervin controlled his moods with electronic stimulation. They turned him up and turned him down, he said. The "haunting fear" left by Kille's ordeal, a psychiatrist wrote in the New England Journal of Medicine, is that "men may be become slaves, perhaps, to an authoritarian state."[86]

A significant step in this direction was taken at Walter Reed Army Hospital of Research in 1973 by Dr. Joseph Sharp. Inside an isolation chamber, Sharp heard words beamed at him in a pulsed-microwave audiogram. (An audiogram is a computerized analog of the spoken voice.) ARPA's Robert O. Becker foresaw in the experiment "obvious applications in covert operations." He imagined a barrage of "voices" driving an enemy insane, and post-hypnotic suggestions radioed to a programmed assassin.

Sure enough, hybrid EMR-hypnosis beams bearing "voices" were tested a year later by Dr. J.F. Shapitz, who proposed: "In this investigation it will be shown that the spoken word of the hypnotist may also be conveyed by modulated electromagnetic energy directly into the subconscious parts of the human brain"—another dream of Richard Helms was about to pass. The "voices," Schapitz wrote, would program the subconscious mind "without employing any technical devices for receiving or transcoding the messages and without the person exposed to such influence having a chance to control the information input."[87]

The Soviets were experimenting along the same lines. Russia's EM mind control state-of-the-art surfaced at the Conference on Psychotronic Research in 1973. Topics on the agenda of the meeting, held in Prague, included:

- Erasure of the Subconscious Mind
- Development of Extrasensory Perception
- The Induction of Paranormal Effects in Dreams
- The Mechanical Equivalent of Neuropsychic Energy
- The Psi Gene

And so on.[88]

The American mind control initiative was every bit as exotic. In Los Altos Hills, California, scientists drawing from the CIA's "black" budget cash cow applied acoustical telemetry in the development of transmitters that create scallops of infra-sound waves in the head, wiping clean all information stored by the brain cells.[89] Brain researcher Wilder Penfield demonstrated that electrical stimulation kicked up lost memories with perfect recall.[90]

True to the traditional interests of The Firm, drugs were sought to make experimental subjects more susceptible to hypno-programming. The guinea-pig was drugged, bathed with pulsed-microwave thought transmissions (the "Voice of God," humanoids from Alpha Centauri, a dead relative, any of the cover stories concocted by post-PANDORA researchers and operatives) and words commenced in the auditory tract.[91]

The "voices" descended on Marti Koskii in the mid-1970s. A welder by trade and a resident of Edmonton, Canada, he charges the CIA, Canadian police and Litton Moffat with "telepathic terrorism":

> First I was prepared-sensitized for microwave telepathy. In my case the "talk" was initially the next-door neighbors.... This went on for approximately four years, twenty hours a week. Also, after this they were capable of some kind of mind reading and discovered the key to the function of various control centres of the body. Now they were able to more or less control my sleep, feelings, sense of taste (saltiness, acidity of food), sexual functions (erection, ejaculation), sense of smell, urination, bowel movement and metabolism.[92]

Koskii dismissed the "voices" visiting him a few hours a day as a "harmless schizophrenia." Not exactly. After the four-year preliminary period, his life was gradually ruined. Carbon dioxide caused him to foam at the mouth, making his work impossible. The "voices" hazed him every waking minute. He was allowed one hour of sleep a day. On one occasion, his heart beat stepped up "faster and stronger till I had a heart attack and had to be hospitalized." Twice, nerves in his lower bodily strata were deadened and his bladder ruptured. He was plagued by impotence and partial loss of memory.

Koskii hasn't a clue why he was chosen, but the motive may be political. "In an elaborate and excruciating experiment that involved hypnosis and supporting special effects," he recalls, "I was presented with a program of indoctrination to convince me criticism of the American society was a 'cancer' and a threat to us all. I was told I was 'unclean' and 'contaminated' with this 'cancer.'"

Experimenting overseas narrowed the odds of exposure. Robert Naeslund describes two independent cases that surfaced in Sweden:

> Rolf Sundwall was anesthetized while in police custody around 1974. Subsequently a strong radio signal entered his body day and night. After about one year, he was admitted to a mental asylum. Circumstances destroyed his life and he died in a fire in his home in 1978.
> The insertion of a brain transmitter in Gote Josefsson's head > was also performed while in police custody in 1975. The pain caused by the frequencies entering Josefsson's head were so strong that he was admitted to Ulleraker Mental Asylum... The court was provided with information regarding the criminal utilization by the police of brain transmitters in Josefsson's case, but refused to have him properly medically examined.[93]

The emphasis on pulsed microwaves stemmed from a 1972 Army study, supposedly concerning Soviet experimentation. Titled Controlled Offensive Behavior, USSR, the report mainly concerned itself with the targeting of individuals, not groups, and foreshadowed the government's microwave experiments on heedless human subjects, often political activists, during the Reagan/Bush administrations. The aim of developing microwave anti-personnel weapons and "mind altering techniques," according to the study, was "the total submission of one's will to some outside force."[94]

Pointing fingers at the Soviets is Washington's way of justifying domestic human rights violations. Electromagnetically "controlled offensive behavior" has lurked behind a long line of murders and suicides throughout the western hemisphere.

Sometimes at the doorstep of the intelligence establishment. On February 17, 1989, the Washington Post reported:

BANK KILLER TORMENTED BY "VOICES"

concerning Emmanuel Tsegaye, an Ethopian-born bank teller in Bethesda, Maryland. The 33 year-old Tsegaye was the proverbial "disgruntled employee," depressed, suicidal, "tormented by voices that only he could hear." He murdered three coworkers at Chevy Chase Federal Savings, yet Tsegaye, the Post noted, "who attempted suicide numerous times and often spoke of hearing disembodied voices, rarely was violent to others."[95] He'd been institutionalized for depression several times, and received treatment at St. Elizabeth's Hospital, long a haunt of CIA psychiatry.

"I used to hear... voices both from space and as... exact repeated words" (a fair description of psychic driving), he wrote in a letter to the judge who committed him in 1984. "I used to hear a person speaking from (the) distance about the things I was thinking." After one suicide attempt, he wrote, "I was depressed, mentally and physically weak... from the voices I used to hear and inadequate sleeps." The "voices" were so real to Tsegaye that he tried several times to tape record them "from the air."

Evidence of gigahertz mind control often passes unnoticed in the background of public spectacles like the Tsegaye carnage. Political and financial conspiracies are just as often at play. The unfortunate Rex Niles, a former Southern California electronics salesman, learned the hard way. Niles was a federal informant in a kickback ring of Pentagon contractors. But before he could produce testimony in court, he fell prey to a malicious MASER attack.[96]

To a Los Angeles Times reporter, he complained that noises were keeping him awake at night:

> "You know, in the middle of the night, at 2 in the morning, when they wouldn't allow me to sleep, when they were aggravating my conscious as well as my subconscious mind, I would hear what sounded like large groups of people down on the street—yelling, talking, and they would laugh and throw something that sounded like a bottle breaking on the street. "So I would go to the window, or one time I was dressed because I couldn't sleep, so I went down, and the street was absolutely empty.

Federal "marshals," he said, harassed him with microwave weapons and deprived him of rest to make him appear deranged. His sister testified that helicopters often circled her home, and 250 watts of atmospheric microwaves in the Niles home were gauged by an engineer.

A lifelong friend of Niles insists that her computer "went haywire" when Niles approached it. For the Times photographer, he held up an aluminum foil hat—pierced through with small holes: "proof that the government is bombarding him with microwaves in an attempt to kill him."

The Microwave Mafia Murders

A particularly nasty flare-up of the mind control underground was the 1978 "disappearance" of Andrija Puharich, owner of the Intelectron Corp., a medical technology firm, and a Merry Prankster on the techno-parapsychological fringe of the CIA.

Puharich was a veteran of MKULTRA. According to journalist Steven Levy:

> The details of his assignment are clouded in a murkiness he has come to wear like some exquisite garment. In any case, his activities have raised the perception among many that under the auspices of the U.S. government, Puharich had been involved in actual experiments in parapsychology and psychedelic drugs. Those with a conspiratorial bent have often assumed Puharich has dark intelligence connections.[96]

He was conversant in psychoactive weapons, and his "pet subjects" were mind control and the telepathic effects of extra low frequency (ELF) waves. Alas, he had breached the CIA's Cone of Silence by speaking openly of "weapons systems... that we have no defense against," as Ira Einhorn, a former cohort, phrased it. "That would be the last thing the CIA—or anyone in the military establishment—would even want us to breathe about." Shortly before Puharich vanished, his Ossining home was torched and destroyed. He told Einhorn that the CIA was responsible.[97]

The harassment of Puharich was reenacted wholesale with the weird deaths of 22 British scientists in the 1980s, otherwise known as the "Star Wars Killings." SDI really had little to do with the homicides. Star Wars, after all, was a cover story for the R&D of electromagnetic weapons. The deception is a premise of The Zapping of America, by Paul Brodeur, who, after puzzling over technical and strategic shortcomings of space-based defense, concludes that the program was (is?) "little more than an elaborate smokescreen designed to hide the fact that the United States is developing a directed-energy weapon that uses a high-power microwave pulse."[98]

While the public was permitted an occasional glimpse at Brilliant Pebbles on the evening news, the Pentagon and CIA pursued a sprawling, obscure initiative of its own.

Seven of the murdered scientists worked for Marconi, a subsidiary of General Electric—a fount of EMR brain control technology and microwave radiation projects[99]—and the largest military electronics contractor in the UK.[100]

Two of the deaths can be interpreted as grim warnings to others in the telemetric mind control netherworld. John Ferry, a Marconi executive, was ruled to have committed "suicide" by chewing on live wires. The corpse of Alistair Beckham, a software designer, was found coiled in bare wires—a message to others engaged in EM research and development?

One British engineer has been directly linked to the program. This was Frank Jennings of Plessey Defense Systems, dead of a heart attack.

The American Sons of ARTICHOKE

Until recently, as Naval Captain Paul Taylor wrote in a 1976 essay, "The Electromagnetic Spectrum in Low-Intensity Conflict," most scientists assumed that "a microwave is a microwave."[103] Captain Taylor's survey of covert warfare applications discussed radio frequencies "disruptive to purposeful behavior," and the brain as "an electrically mediated organ." A "speed-of-light weapons effect" could be achieved, he said, with "the passage of approximately 100 milliamperes through the myocardium (leading) to cardiac standstill and death." EM devices with stun or kill settings could sweep across entire armies (or cities).[104] The genocidal "death ray" had arrived.

The Reagan administration used it as a hidden bargaining chip in arms negotiations with the Soviets.[105] But the technology was tested at home on private citizens.

The entire city of Eugene, Oregon was doused in microwave radiation in March, 1978. The Oregon Journal reported:

> MYSTERIOUS RADIO SIGNALS
> CAUSING CONCERN IN OREGON

The signals were recorded throughout the state. Naturally, the federal government was called in "to help solve the problem." [106] One Oregonian who could do without the government's "help" was Marshall Parrott, chief of the state Health Division's radiation control section. Parrott posited that the cause of the microwave pulses "could be any thing from sunspots to our own federal government."[106] Paul Brodeur reports that TRW has proposed constructing a Naval communications system along an existing 850-mile power line with its terminus in Oregon. He attributes the microwave assault on Eugene to the interplay of Naval ELF beams and Soviet jamming.[107] Ranking government specialists blamed the Soviets, but even the FCC has concluded that the signal came from a Navy transmitter in California. Microwaves, the FCC report concluded, were the likely cause of several sudden illnesses among faculty researchers at an Oregon State University laboratory.[108]

Oregonians complained of headaches, fatigue, inability to sleep, reddening of the skin, anxiety, "clicks" in the head and a "buzz" harmonizing with a high-pitched wail.

Andrew Michrowski, a concerned Canadian researcher, wrote to Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau on September 19, 1978, citing a Pacific Northwest Center for Non-Ionizing Radiation study that found the "Soviet" signals "psychoactive" and "very strongly suggestive of achieving the objective of brain control." An EEG examination of a Eugene resident recorded 6 Hz brainwaves, indicating "irritability." The radiation, Michrowski observed, was "dangerous in the... shadow of planetary-scale brain control that is growing into a reality with each passing week."[109]

A similar ELF experiment raised the mental morbidity rate of Timmons, Ontario.[110]

The callously haphazard testing of EMR "non-lethal" effects around the world inspired researcher Harlan E. Girard, at a 1991 NATO conference, to report that a principal feature of the weapons system "is its ability to produce auditory effects." It is also capable of producing visual hallucinations, described to Girard "by a German artist, on whom this equipment is being tested involuntarily, as having the quality of 35mm slides." The equipment, he said, "can be used to block all sensation." Girard considers long-range mind control "truly satanic" in its moral implications. "Considering how recklessly, wantonly and indiscriminately America's new weapons have been used," he said, "physicians attending the dead and dying should consider the patient's own political views and associations before making a diagnosis or conducting an autopsy.[111]

An especially brutal turn in federal mind control experimentation involves children. A Southern California child therapist (requesting anonymity) tells of treating a young patient who'd undergone an obscure brain operation at the aforementioned UCLA Neuropsychiatric Institute at the age of three. The therapist insists that the operation explains his present "psychosis."[112]

Another therapist—specializing in ritual abuse trauma—offered in a phone conversation that she'd ordered X-rays of a 3 year-old patient who, she suspected, had been implanted. An attending physician confirmed that there was a tiny electrical device fitted to the child's brain.

The fact is that the wave of ritual child abuse allegations that swept the country in the 1980s cloaked federal psychotronic and eugenics experiments on young children. As one adult survivor of psychotronic mind control concludes, "covert arms of government… have coined the term 'screen memories' to describe the obfuscational memories impressed by the abusers themselves." The so-called "False Memory Syndrome," he says, "is a scapegoat created by a consortium of federal 'spin doctors' bent on negating the believability and viability of the more than 12,000 unwitting citizens who have been on the receiving end of this technology." The CIA and military establishment "must at all costs disguise their abuse in order to continue experimentation with psychotronics," he argues.

The "false memory" bromide has been popularized largely by organized pedophiles, cultists and hired guns of psychiatry. It has been adopted as the status quo position of the press. But the cover story originated with the CIA's mind control netherworld. "Nazi-inspired scientists," the survivor says, "perform medical tests during the abuse event, such as implantation of biotelemetric trackinq devices into nasal cavities and ear canals."

The brain transmitters can be tracked by Global Positioning System satellites. The subject therefore cannot hope to escape the mind control network.[113]

Screen memories of abuse, created by hypnotic or psychotronic visualization, a "novelty effect," are offered by UFO researcher Martin Cannon as a probable explanation for the weirdness surrounding most "alien" abductions. Again the government, shielded by an unbelievable cover story, escapes detection. EM technology (and testing on humans) remains classified.

No doubt, UFOs exist and have traumatized thousands of "contactees" —the military has been building them since the 1940s. To be sure, U.S.

News & World Report (April 7, 1950) declaimed:

FLYING SAUCERS—THE REAL STORY
U.S. BUILT FIRST ONE IN 1942
—JET-PROPELLED DISKS CAN OUTFLY OTHER PLANES—

The "sky disks" could already "hover aloft, spurt ahead at tremendous speed, outmaneuver conventional craft," the article reported. The 1942 prototype was elliptical. It had a maximum speed of 400–500 miles an hour, and lifted from the ground almost vertically.[114]

Imagine what "UFOs" can do fifty years later.

Cannon posits that government saucers account for the countless sightings and abductions reported around the world. Screen memories explain the bug-eyed monsters. "All the powers of the espionage empire and the scientific establishment have entered into an unholy alliance," Cannon says, "psychiatrist and spy… microwave specialists and clandestine operators.[115] And then there are the cults. Between ritual molestation and "alien" abductions, there is this common connection. Cannon:

> Some abductees I have spoken to have been directed to join certain religious/philosophical sects. These cults often bear close examination. The leaders of these groups tend to be "ex" CIA operatives, or Special Forces veterans. They are often linked through personal relations, even though they espouse widely varying traditions. They often use hypnosis, drugs, or "mind machines" in their rituals. Members of these cults have reported periods of missing time during these ceremonies or "study periods."[116]

UFOs are stricly terrestrial, as one UFO abductee recognized. She phoned Julianne McKinney at the Microwave Surveillance Project in Washington to report her abduction, aware that it was government-directed. "Her house is being shot at," McKinney says, "and they are harassing her viciously, the target of massive microwave assault"[117] The abuse of psychoactive technology is escalating, unbeknownst to the American public. Recurrent hypno-programmed stalkers, ritual and "alien" outrages and psychotronic forms of political persecution are on the upswing at the hands of the DIA, CIA, FBI, NSA and other covert branches of government. Hired guns in media, law enforcement and psychiatry protect them by discrediting the victims. In effect, an ambitious but meticulously-concealed, undeclared war on American private citizens is in progress—a psywar.

And anyone is a potential casualty.

Chapter Two

Blue Smoke & Lasers

SDI as a Cover Story for the R&D of Electromagnetic/Cybernetic Mind Control Technology

In 1976 William Bise, director of the Pacific Northwest Center for the Study of Non-Ionizing Radiation in Portland, compiled a report on "Radio-Frequency Induced Interference Responses in the Human Nervous System." Dr. Bise's experiments demonstrated that the irradiation of four of his human subjects in an electromagnetic field of 65-90 microvolts per meter caused impairment of memory and concentration. The Pacific Northwest experiments were a small part of a sprawling research effort, conceived by the Department of Defense toward the development of an arsenal of electromagnetic (EM) weapons, often sweetened in public by military spokesmen as "non-lethal."[1]

True, the biological effects of low-intensity EMR are scarcely more than an annoyance. The famous Taos hum, a baffling low-frequency vexation first reported in 1989 by residents of northern New Mexico, was one of several incidents of urban radio-frequency (RF) saturation. At the time, scientific investigators were unable to explain the low-pitch rumble blamed for a sudden outbreak of headaches, nosebleeds, dizziness and a general feeling of discomfort.[2] (A few years later, it emerged that Los Alamos Labs in Albuquerque had in development EM weapons capable of producing the same effects. The non-lethal defense program is run by John Alexander, an Army veteran, psychic enthusiast and walking Terrorist's Cookbook with a doctorate in Thanatology, the study of death.[3])

But "non-lethal'" weapons are potentially no more "humane" than the conventional type—a simple RF pulse can kill as readily, and as painfully, as a fusillade of black talons.

Columnist Jack Anderson mused in 1985: "Can the human mind be short-circuited or even destroyed by extremely low-frequency radio waves? Preposterous as such an idea may seem, scientists on both sides of the Iron Curtain have been conducting secret tests. Reputable scientists say they could be developed into yet another grisly weapon of mass destruction."[4]

Brain researchers told Anderson that American and Soviet scientists were close to perfecting a mechanism that interferes with the electrical signals of the brain with remote transmissions of EM radiation. "This interference," Anderson reported, "could extend to 'switching off' the brain's vital functions—that is, killing the targeted victims."

But scientists with CIA and military contracts have, for forty years, made it apparent they could produce devastating biological effects with EM radiation much earlier than Anderson's sources let on. In the mid-60s, for instance, State University of New York Professors Howard Friedman and Robert O. Becker, the Nobel laureate, and Charles Bachman, a physicist at Syracuse University, studied the effects of EM radiation on 28,642 patients at seven veterans' hospitals.[5] (However churlish, the study was the norm for a government now known to have tested radioactive isotopes on mental patients, and chemical warfare agents billeted from the Golden Gate Bridge.) Scientists at UCLA probed the brain in the 1960s, mapped out the synapses responsive to electromagnetic stimulation. Today, the university oversees experimentation at Los Alamos and Lawrence Livermore labs. Both have developed radio-biological weapons that appear to be a continuation of the brain studies, realizing their dystopian potential. Livermore, of course, has been a central participant in SDI since September 1982 when Edward Teller, the lab's founder, suggested the laser shield concept to Reagan. (The Father of the H-Bomb had coincidentally received 40,000 shares in a company engaged in laser research, later found to have defrauded investors.[6])

Remote mind control is not a recent breakthrough in "non-lethal" technology.

In 1965 the Pentagon's Advanced Research Project Agency set up Project PANDORA, the top-secret search for military applications of microwaves. Seven years later, the Army issued a classified report, noting: "it is possible to field a truck-portable microwave barrier system that will completely immobilize personnel in the open with present-day technology and equipment."[7]

Only recently has the barrier cannon been rolled out of the Pentagon's burgeoning vault of black projects. One NASA report written in 1970 by Thomas Fryer of Ames Research Labs concerned "Implantable Biotelemetry Systems" (the gadgets that turn up with unnerving regularity in the bodies of UFO abductees).

A 1976 DIA report mentions "anti-personnel applications" of pulsed microwaves that carry "sounds and possibly even words which appear to be originating intercranially."[8]

The Reagan administration intensified the push into EM weapons development. Dr. Michael Persinger, a neurologist at Ontario's Laurentian University, found that extremely low frequency fields could induce nausea, depression, panics, etc. Persinger's research was mustered under Reagan's secret, brain-scrambling Project S Sleeping Beauty.[9]

Other experiments were cloaked by the Strategic Defense Initiative—hardly inconsistent for a country with a long history of political scandals rising like a bad smell from the national security branch of government, from the U-2's Soviet adventure to Watergate to uranium testing on urban populations to the landing of cocaine shipments in Mena, Arkansas. Star Wars is, in fact, a cover story.

Paul Brodeur, in The Zapping of America, dissects available SDI data at length, concluding:

> "All the talk about death rays and charged particle beams has been little more than an elaborate smokescreen designed to hide the fact that the United States is developing a directed energy weapon that uses a high-power microwave pulse."[10]

If Star Wars is indeed a superficial public relations effort conceived to obscure a massive military push into mind control technology, the evidence must lie just beneath the surface, a colossal shadow R&D effort difficult to completely conceal. Behind the Star Wars front, funds would flow from legitimate to illicit programs, dropping through a hole in the floor.

That's precisely what happened. SDI funding was channeled into hidden research efforts. In early 1993, Aldric Saucier, a scientist for the Army's ballistic defense command with long experience in space research, complained to the House Government Operations Committee that Star Wars was cursed by a chronic diversion of funds. He estimated that as much as half of the entire SDI budget had disappeared into classified projects. "Millions of dollars in research awards were shifted from one program to another," he testified. Participants in the covert R&D effort even spoke in code words, referring to the diversions as "taxes" or "I.O.U.'s."

Saucier's blast at Star Wars appeared in the March 9, 1993 New York Times. He blew a shrill whistle at the "hundreds of millions diverted to secret programs." Yet Congress was assured that the funds had been used as directed. Dr. Saucier summed up SDI as a "high-risk, space-age national security pork barrel for contractors and top government managers," and a "serious obstacle to a strong national defense because of systematic illegality." He complained of egregious abuses of power, "the substitution of political method for the scientific method."[11]

Slippery accounting aside, if the true aim of SDI is the development of pulsed-microwave weapons, key defense firms would quietly merge to combine the fields of microwave technology and biology, a dangerous liaison in the shadow of Brilliant Pebbles. In fact, corporate shuffling behind SDI does reveal the hybrid and the technocracy behind it. A scandalous case in point is the move by Fiat, the most powerful corporation in Italy, into the American circle of competition for SDI contracts. On September 25, 1986, John Maresca, deputy assistant secretary of defense, wrote a memo to Richard Perle, then assistant secretary in charge of international policy, about legal papers drawn up a month earlier setting up "the FIAT Trading Company of North America as FIAT's sole conduit for doing business with DoD," an accord "sufficient to allow FIAT and its subsidiaries to compete for SDI research contracts.... It remains to be seen what reaction Congress will have to the situation."[12]

But the Congressional response was predictable enough. Muommar Ghaddaffi was an outgoing director of Fiat. His shares were abruptly snatched up by the company for $3.1 billion under arrangements made by Germany's Deutsche Bank. Some of the funds were laundered by a Fiat front company used since the early '80s to ship missile parts to Argentina and Libya in violation of an international ban on the transfer of high technology components through Germany's Bayerische Hypotheken and Weschel und Chase Manhattan, as detailed in an affidavit filed by a U.S. Customs agent in the eastern district court of California in 1988.[13]

Under the control of Italy's Agnelli family, Fiat has since the turn of the century been cozy with totalitarian political regimes, Hitler's and Mussolini's among them.[14]

The EM mind control initiative lurking behind the Star Wars cover story would appeal to a man of Fiat chairman Gianni Agnelli's domineering temper. In fact, he positively lusted after after an SDI contract. The Fiat board's divestment of the Libyan interest was intended to reassure critics of Agnelli in Reagan's own administration that the company would not be a security risk.

United Technologies, a heavily-subsidized extension of the Pentagon and a Fiat partner, had already drawn the Italians into the Star Wars sphere. United is the former stomping ground of Knight of Malta Alexander Haig, Clark MacGregor, a campaign manager for Nixon, and Edward Hennessy, a senior VP groomed for corporate control—by Harold Geneen of ITT—who left in 1979 to run Allied Chemical Corp.

Agnelli proposed joining SNIA, a Fiat subsidiary (the very same stung selling classified electronic missile components to Libya and Argentina), with Star Wars. With Ghaddaffi off the board of directors, he paved the way by merging SNIA with Bioengineering International BV, a Dutch-held medical technology firm.

The multi-billion dollar question is this: What does a space-based, anti-ballistic defense system have to do with biotechnology?

The SNIA board of directors was apprised by Chairman Cesare Romiti, according to Alan Friedman in a biography of Agnelli, that the merger was a “diversification from arms to the high-tech medical field.”[15]

Yet SNIA was the subsidiary upon which Agnelli had been pinning his hopes of a role in SDI. SNIA is a space contractor, a producer of orbital transfer and guidance systems. The merger with Bioengineering was altogether inconsistent with space-based defense, but not with the Defense Department’s classified EM weapons program.

It might be argued that the Fiat subsidiaries play a minor role in SDI, a small satellite in a big sky. But a report of the Council on Economic Priorities found that 87% of the SDI contracts awarded in 1983–84 went to only ten major defense firms. Eight of these were selected from among the DoD’s twenty leading private contractors.[16]

Critics of Star Wars give further credence to Brodeur’s argument that the program is a smokescreen. Most major news outlets, Mark Hertsgaard finds in On Bended Knee, have been “implicitly critical, if only because [reporting on SDI] exposed unwelcome truths about the system; most tellingly, that it would not work the way Reagan said it would, and that it would cost a fortune to develop. SDI was such an obviously flawed and perilous idea that it provoked considerable unease among influential members of the American academy, Congress and foreign policy and arms control communities…. A survey of National Academy of Science members found top scientists opposed to SDI developments by an eight-to-one margin.”

Reagan’s SDI proposal was conceived in a scientific vacuum. Historian A. Hunter Dupree wrote in a 1986 Nature article that the decision to fund SDI “was made without peer review, and no advice from scientists was sought or received.” The funds were allocated, scarce specialists mustered, “without the slightest review or evaluation by the scientific community as to whether the project should be undertaken at all. This dangerous departure from postwar practice is unique.”[17]

To quell opposition, Star Wars officials falsified research data. Four anonymous officials of the Reagan administration admitted in August 1993 that the deception was approved by then Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger, according to the New York Times, “to persuade the Soviet empire to cripple itself with debt.”[18] This is sheer spin. If the motive was to deceive the Soviets, the Pentagon had no reason to submit falsified test data to closed Congressional briefings. A total of $36 billion has been spent on SDI development, much of the expenditure based on erroneous trials.

After three dismal failures, one test was rigged in June 1984, supposedly to fool the Kremlin. But it was clear in an account given by a project scientist that fudging test data was not an economic warfare gambit. “We would lose hundreds of dollars in Congress if we did not perform it successfully,” the scientist said. “It would be a catastrophe. We put a beacon with a certain frequency on the target vehicle. On the interceptor, we had a receiver. The hit looked beautiful, so Congress did not ask questions.”

The flimflam was inspired by sheer, self-serving financial expediency. SDI technocrats lied to their Congressional paymasters while the public watched panoramic cartoons of Brilliant Pebbles decimating a swarm of nukes on the evening news.

John Tirman, a director of the Winston Foundation for World Peace and an SDI critic, responded by editorializing that the entire program was a "hoax." Tirman: "The very idea of 'Star Wars'—an 'umbrella' that would shield America from Soviet nuclear warheads—was itself a massive deception. No knowledgeable scientist thought for a moment that such a shield was feasible. Yet the Pentagon proceeded with this fraud as if Reagan's fanciful notion had merit. What's more, other faked tests followed in 1990 and 1991, after the Soviet 'threat' had disappeared."[19]

Even the lofty Edward Teller has been charged with falsifying test data on "Super Excalibur," a nuclear-powered X-ray laser built by Lawrence Livermore Labs, in actuality a space-based red herring for the oversight committees to chew on.[20]

In 1988, investigators from a score of federal agencies and Congressional offices searched the premises and interviewed Livermore staffers. "For the first time in the lab's history," the Los Angeles Times reported, "key members of its leadership have broken ranks and gone public with tales of internal disarray." Roy Woodruff, formerly the director of Livermore's weapons program, accused Teller of deceiving Washington and the public with false information on the X-ray laser, the "centerpiece of the Strategic Defense Initiative." (Super Excalibur was killed in July 1992 anyway when the Energy Department canceled the tests without making a public announcement.[21] The official explanation was that the Bush administration, by abandoning the X-ray laser, codenamed "Greenwater," was implementing a policy of nuclear test limitations after tens of millions of dollars had been spent.)

Critics of SDI, Woodruff said, "were saying that a system couldn't be based in space because it would require a tremendous energy supply and would be vulnerable to attack." Disinformation on "Greenwater," he said, was intended to curtail scientific objections. "They needed a little magic, and aha! Guess what? A little magic! Very classified so you can't review it or talk about it. No power-supply problem because it uses a hydrogen bomb."

Super Excalibur was fraudulent even in conception as an anti-missile system. "It has little potential for actually defending against ballistic attack," Woodruff emphasized. "It just wasn't that capable a laser. So if the program goals had been met, if indeed we were entering the engineering phase, as Teller said, what we would've had was a weapon that was capable of attacking satellites and defending satellites at great distances. If you have a very big satellite—a neutral particle beam accelerator, a big chemical laser, a garage full of kinetic-kill vehicles—this X-ray laser weapon has the potential to destroy those things." In other words, the weapon was not even an anti-ballistic system, as Teller claimed.[22]

Besides, there was nothing original about Lawrence Livermore's X-ray laser, which smelled suspiciously like the "Modulated Electron-Gun X-Ray Nuclear Booster" patented by the McFarlane Corporation, a private engineering firm, in 1965. The schematics and a prototype of the device were pirated by NASA, according to a McFarlane executive in hearings before the House subcommittee on DoD appropriations the following year. Company literature explained that the orbital laser was suited, among other things, to "electromagnetic radiation telemetering and death ray applications", a design, again, never intended for anti-ballistics.

Teller sold the citizenry a costly bill of goods. Aldric Saucier recalls that he "was present once when Dr. Edward Teller of the University of California National Laboratory said he needed $20 million for more studies of an already-completed experiment on the X-ray laser. Then S.D.I. director Gen. James Abrahamson responded to the effect that he could go ahead."[23]

Teller's interests, beyond capricious misapplications of nuclear technology, include "non-lethal defense." In November 1993, Dr. Teller was a featured speaker at a conference on electromagnetic weapons at Johns Hopkins University in Laurel, Maryland, sponsored by Los Alamos National Laboratory, chaired by the aforementioned Doctor of Death, John Alexander. Another key speaker at the conference was Clay Easterly of the Oak Ridge National Laboratory, addressing the fine points of the "Application of Extremely Low Frequency Electromagnetic Fields to Non-Lethal Weapons."[24]

The military-industrial sector was heavily represented at the conference by McDonnell Douglas, Tracor Aerospace, Martin Marietta, Northrop, Lockheed, Westinghouse and Boeing's defense and space groups.[25]

The major multinational SDI contractors held much more than a passing interest in orbital EM weapons technology capable of controlling and switching off the brain. So does the Pentagon, represented at the EM weapons conference by scientists from the U.S. Army Research Lab, the Special Operations Command, the Marine Corps Intelligence Center and the Advanced Research Projects Agency (ARPA).

Further evidence that Star Wars covers for radio-biological warfare is the staggering mortality rate of scientists involved in the program, particularly the colorful "suicides" of 23 SDI engineers in Great Britain. Harlan Girard, a scientist and subject of continuous microwave harassment by the military for his outspoken criticism of electromagnetic mind control projects, told high-brow attendees of a 1991 NATO conference on emergent technologies that the British technocrats had in common connections to the U.S. Navy.[26] Not improbable. The Navy has funded academic research on distant evoked responses and the brain-manipulating effects of gigahertz radiation on human subjects, in coordination with the CIA, for decades. (Out of this research came the 10 milliwatt safety standard, set in the early 1950s by Herman Schwan, a repatriated Nazi scientist. Schwan hailed from the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute of Biophysics in Germany, and settled in the U.S. after the war to teach bio-engineering and physical medicine at the University of Pennsylvania.)[27]

The enduring mystery of the Star Wars "suicides" was foreshadowed on July 9, 1986 with the murder-by-bombing of the research director of West Germany's Siemens Co., yet another electronics conglomerate, said to have been negotiating with the Pentagon on an SDI contract. Next to go was a German bureaucrat, a diplomatic liaison to the Strategic Defense Initiative Organization, shot dead, quickly followed by an Italian Star Wars consultant.[28] A leftist brigade of terrorists was held responsible for the murders, but no arrests were made.

A pattern to the killings in Great Britain begins with the fact that seven of the scientists worked for Marconi, a subsidiary of General Electric. At the time, Marconi was under investigation for bribing and defrauding ministers of government. But Britain's MoD found "no evidence" linking the deaths. Blame for the sudden outbreak of suicides among Marconi engineers was laid on stress.[29] (Another unlikely explanation was given for the "hum" in Bristol, home of Marconi, a low-frequency noise like that in Taos, New Mexico, in this instance blamed on "frogs.") Jonathan Walsh. a digital communications specialist at Marconi, was assigned to the secretive Martlesham Heath Research Laboratory under a General Electric contract.[30] (GE has long led the field in the development of anti-personnel electronic weapons, an interest that gestated with participation in Project Comet, the Pentagon-based research program to explore the psychological effects of frequencies on the electromagnetic spectrum.) Walsh dropped from his hotel window in November 1985.

None of the Star Wars "suicides" were specialists in laser research or space-based missiles. All worked in advanced electronics or computer systems with military applications. Many were attached to the Royal Military College of Science, an authority on electronic surveillance, communications and weaponry.[31] They were employed on secret projects. Supposedly Star Wars was an open book. From the start, Reagan invited all friendly nations to contribute to the defense system. Major developments were to be publicized, not squandered in secret laboratories.

As is... oh, for instance... microwave brain telemetering from a remote source. That technology was very secret. John Alexander wrote in the December 1980 number of Military Review that "there are weapons systems that operate on the power of the mind and whose lethal capacity has already been demonstrated."[32] Star Wars was an ideal cover story, because the technology of radio-biological (or "psychic") warfare was in part a spin-off of the advanced physiological monitoring instruments used in space flight.[33]

EM-pulse mind control experimentation takes place inside a fog of secrecy and disinformation. Behind the Star Wars murders, if not an inside job or the work of the CIA, are other likely culprits. Iran, for instance, then at war with Iraq, had highly-placed connections in British intelligence, among them Michael Heseltine, soon to be England's Minister of Defense. Heseltine was the sole shareholder of Royal Ordnance, Inc., a military explosives manufacturer that traded with the Khomeini regime in violation of a ban on on the export of sensitive technology to Third World dictatorships.[34] (Heseltine was also Gianni Agnelli's British supplier in the aforementioned sale of missile components to Muommar Ghaddaffi.)

Iraq was preparing to graduate from conventional to "non-lethal" EM weapons. Khomeini's intelligence operatives may have learned of Iraq's trade with Marconi and the transfer of secret technology through an intelligence source in the British government. Iranian terrorists were already active in the UK. The stresses in the background of the Iran-Iraq war could explain the attacks on electromagnetic weapons designers and programming specialists.

Physicist Paul Brodeur, mystified by Pentagon disinformation regarding SDI, examined a schematic for an "Electron Beam Accelorator" of the type to be incorporated—supposedly—in space-based defense. Brodeur discovered that the weapon was in reality a device capable of generating a powerful EM pulse. All of this is recounted in Brodeur's Zapping of America, which features a chapter on mind control technology.

An Iranian backlash was predictable since, according to the London Times, "the twin focuses of British and American policy towards the arming of Iraq lay in the identification of Iran as the enemy," with diversions of cash to defense companies in England and the U.S. "supplying Baghdad through the Banca Nazionale del Lavoro (BNL) branch in Atlanta."[35]

The intrigue was heightened by fierce competition among the multinationals for Star Wars contracts. Many of these shared with Fiat and GE sordid histories of selling advanced military technology to repressive military regimes. Saddam Hussein placed a priority on microwave weapons. His strategy of waging "unconventional" warfare was not possible without support from executives of the major defense firms in NATO countries. One of England's closest competitors in the microwave communications business is Thomson-CSF, an electronics conglomerate run by the French government. In the 1980s, Thomson, pitted against Plessey Defense Systems in England, won a lucrative contract with Iraq. Initial payments were made by the infamous BNL, which collapsed in 1989.

In The Death Lobby, Kenneth Timmerman describes how Thomson and BNL assisted Iraq's expansion into electronic warfare. "The project was given the code name Saad 13. The $1 billion contact was barely mentioned in the French press and was treated as a virtual state secret in times to come. At one point Thomson even tried to deny it had ever signed such a deal, although thousands of Thomson engineers were involved at different times." The idea, a Thomson vice president said, was to "give the Iraqis a tool for the future. It was certainly the most ambitious project of its kind undertaken in a Third World country."[36]

The carnage among Star Wars scientists was coincident with the rivalry between Marconi and Plessey in Great Britain, and Thomson-CSF in France. Two of the deceased were employees of Plessey: Michael Baker, a digital communications specialist, killed in May 1987 when his BMW careened through a road barrier, and Frank Jennings, an electronic weapons engineer, dead of a heart attack a month later. The British gained the upper hand over France in dealings with Iraq by loaning Saddam Hussein a unit of Special Air Service (SAS) commandos to train his secret police, the Iraqi Special Forces. Timmerman: "In 1985 the French had lost two large contracts to British electronics companies. Marconi signed a contract to supply 'troposcatter' microwave transmitters that Thomson-CSF thought it had won. The transmitters allowed Iraqi forces to dispatch orders from Baghdad to the southern front without relying on telephone lines (and they confounded allied intelligence during Operation Desert Storm.)"[37] Intense competition among defense firms, and illicit trade in secret technology with warring dictatorships, was the backdrop to the British deaths. Conditions were rife for such skullduggery.

So were the microwave devices sold to Iraq. The troposcatter microwave transmitter, with a few modifications, could be transformed into a powerful offensive weapon. Myron Wolbarscht, an ophthalmologist at Duke University and the author of a book on emergent technologies, warns: “Microwave weapons used to disrupt an opponent’s communications could ‘fry’ any soldiers hit by them as well.”[38]

Marconi and Thomson-CSF share a common interest in microwave communications. Devices like the troposcatter are in the same technical genus as the Gyrotron resonance maser, a machine that talks to the brain. An article in 21st Century Science & Technology outlines the workings of a resonance maser. The device surrounds and penetrates the entire body in an EM flux, and beams into it a microwave communications field. A laser, like the needle of light on a compact disk, reads changes in electrons after passing through the body. A computerized CAT scan sorts the frequencies of the brain and five senses. The maser, with pulsed-power source, fits inside a truck. With it, the encyclopedia claims, “special forces trained in radio-biological warfare could wipe out entire officer corps, divisions and battalions.”[39]

Masers, not lasers, are the hidden thrust of “Star Wars.” The weapon is an extremely sophisticated mind and body machine capable of thought transfer, manipulation of emotions and muscle control. Images, even dreams, can be beamed to the subject. A human or cybernetic controller can carry on a conversation telepathically, and at the same time instill physical sensations, subliminal commands, emotions and visual and aural hallucinations. Computerized EM devices that talk and transmit images to the brain were current when Reagan delivered his first SDI pitch in 1983. Harlan Girard, in his NATO address on emergent technologies eight years later, said: “Experiments had produced some communications equipment that far exceeded the ability to broadcast defeat into the minds of the enemy,” an objective of DoD brass. “It is not only capable of producing auditory hallucinations, but visual hallucinations as well.”[40]

“Is it possible,” asks John Lambros, a prisoner at Leavenworth and mind control experimentee (a claim he corroborates with an X-ray of four strand-shaped foreign objects in his head) “that the particle beam intended for enemy missiles alone might now be intended for human minds?”[41]

The electronic battlefield has been armed for some time. GTE, for instance, has had an electronic weapons division since the 1950s, then headed by William Perry, Clinton’s secretary of defense. And in the 1960s executives of Honeywell, the Franco-American computer firm (and Star Wars contractor), told author Lincoln Lawrence that the company was experimenting with machines that “penetrate a man’s mind and control his brain waves over long distance.”[42]

The Microwave Mafia often rely on the implantation of miniaturized radio receivers. The technique is known as intra-cerebral control and uses radio or ultra-sound. It was developed by the CIA’s MKDRACO and

HATTER brain telemetry projects. The implantation of a micro-receiver in the frontal or temporal lobes by trained teams of operatives is done with an "encaphalator," usually through the sinuses of a drugged subject.[43]

But the current state of the art in Radio-Hypnotic Intracerebral Control (RHIC) depends upon "Personal Radio and Electromagnetic Frequency Allocation," or PREMA, a frequency unique to the subject's brain. A "reading wand" is hidden near the victim, who is scanned by an instrument smaller than a briefcase. Once the "Freak" is determined, the brain becomes a link in a cybernetic system, and the subject (or a group) can communicate, be surveilled, guided, manipulated, harassed or controlled from afar.[44]

The mind-invasive technology lurking behind the Star Wars cover story became the fascination of Brian Wronge, a victim of prison experiments in New York state.[45] Wronge claims that the mind control fraternity has developed a "gallium scan" to map electrical activity of the brain, and in concert with a transmitter linked to the nervous system, beam radio-biological signals to an analog computer or satellite.

Skeptics should note that that implant technology is not strictly the domain of covert federal agencies. On October 17, 1994 the London Times ran a story on medical advances in microchip implantation, "Bionic Man Comes of Age," no less futuristic than gyrotronic mind taps or PREMA Freak scanners. "Over the past decade," the Times reported, "more than 15,000 people worldwide have had electronic components implanted into their brains. In a procedure confined until recently to the fantasies of science fiction, microchips are now being routinely placed beneath the skull into brain stems. In many cases, these devices are connected to platinum wires, which are then fused and buried in the brain."

Some of the commercially available implants can "think": "Through the use of microchip technology, they can interface with the brain, provide complex instructions to mechanical parts and monitor brain activity." In the last ten years, progress in microtechnology has made possible "artificial vision," and paralyzed patients have only to think to produce "a characteristic electrical wave pattern that is detected by sensors implanted in the brain. The sensors then send an electrical signal to a microprocessor chip implanted in the patient's shoulder." The chip responds with electrical instructions to a mass of tiny implants linked to several dozen nodes in the right arm. The paralyzed muscle fibers contract, and the arm lifts.[46]

The monitoring of a patient's vital signs from a remote source, discussed in the Journal of Biomedical Engineering in 1993, relies on an advanced VHF telemetry station, another commercially-available system. A computer amplifies and digitizes the signal from an implanted transmitter, analyzes it and displays the data on a personal computer monitor.[47]

But not all commercially-sold brain machines are approved by the AMA. Anyone with a bank account and a score to settle can order by mail the schematics for a crude "Electronic Brainblaster" from a small electronics firm in Alamogordo, New Mexico. The company bills itself as "the national clearinghouse for survival information," and claims that the machine was developed "to produce healing and curative effects." But "we coincidentally discovered that, if you use certain EM coil configurations, wave forms and intensities, a powerfully destructive, deadly-silent and instantaneous weapon is produced!"

The Brainblaster is a true electromagnetic-pulse weapon and—like the EM devices in the Pentagon's "non-lethal" arsenal—interferes violently with brain waves. The heart of the machine, according to company literature, is the formidable "Cycle Slicer": "simple and inexpensive to build… basically a crude, bludgeoning device used primarily to inflict physical pain and cause brain hemorrhaging." With exposure to the Brainblaster's EMFs, "severe behavioral changes, some associated with mental illness, can result. Behavioral changes include bizarre and erratic behavior, increased reaction times, panic, confusion, hyperactivity, manic-compulsive behavior, dizziness, hallucinations, personality disassociations, delirium, incoherence, frenzy, tremors and jerkiness, headache, ears ringing, nausea," and so on. The company recommends testing the Brainblaster on animals, since "the life of one strong, intelligent, and capable Freedom-loving patriot is more important than the lives of many animals." An EM Brainblaster, of course, "can provide the patriot and his loved ones with an effective weapon for destroying the enemies of his family, region, nation or culture."

If a neo-Nazi mail-order house can openly hawk the EM Brainblaster, the comic-book technology at the far end of the classified military technology lag must be breathtaking. Word of remote-viewing devices and cybernetic surveillance systems has leaked to the surface of the national security underground.

And the technology isn't gathering dust. Since the advent of SDI, reports of sadistic EMR harassment of private citizens have escalated. One report filed with the Association of National Security Alumni in February 1992 concerns "a woman in Dayton, Ohio, whose husband is employed at Wright-Patterson AFB as a civilian electronics engineer. Coincidentally, he works in a top secret vault on a project focusing on 'transitional technologies.'" The husband's top-secret work took him to the Industrial College of the Armed Forces (ICAF) in Fort McNair, Virginia in the mid-1980s. While he was away, college administrators insisted that his wife undergo extensive psychological evaluation. She was told that "data obtained from these exams would be used to keep their marriage and family intact, since her husband's job tended to be stress-inducing." She returned home from college and "became the target of massive electronic harassment and may have been drugged on recurrent occasions." She talked to doctors. None of them could explain her physical and psychological pain. Her husband took no interest. She asked him to sweep their home electronically, but he claimed to know nothing about the necessary equipment.

She contacted McKinney's Electronic Surveillance Project in Silver Spring, Maryland, a group that monitors EM harassment, in November 1992. (McKinney's project is a spin-off of the Association of National Security Alumni, an organization that opposes excesses of the intelligence community. Members on the ANSA board have written and lectured widely on America's covert misadventures, including Phillip Roettinger, David MacMichael, Peter Dale Scott, Phillip Agee and Daniel Ellsberg.) "Within two days," McKinney says, "her husband had her forcibly hospitalized in a psychiatric ward at Good Samaritan, claiming that she had established contact with a 'Jonestown'-type network and had become suicidal as a consequence. Her husband cooperated by lying in a court-approved affidavit for purposes of prolonging her hospitalization." During her forced restraint, the hospital ward was "flooded with patients who were complaining of 'hearing voices.'" They were prescribed stupefying drugs and left to their own devices. The electrical engineer's wife has since moved to Columbus, Ohio, but the EM assault on her continues.[48]

In this instance, the subject's torment was linked to a military base, but experimentation and harassment with classified EMR weapons can occur anywhere. The technology itself derives from any academic or commercial military-industrial sector. McKinney speaks of "active involvement on the part of the DoD and certain DoD contractors — the Boeing Corporation being one of many." She alleges that intensive R&D is also underway at Northrop, the Newbury Park, California aerospace firm. She suspects that EM stimulation from a remote source drove Alan Winterbourne, a computer systems engineer, to his killing spree at a Ventura County unemployment office on December 2, 1993.[49] Winterbourne, like the berserker SDI "suicides" in England, was engaged in highly-classified projects. He hinted darkly to his sister Carol, "they're working on terrible things at Northrop that would kill millions of innocent people. Things you can't imagine." Before resigning from Northrop, Winterbourne had complained that his co-workers were harassing him. He suspected that his phone was tapped. The paranoia began after he'd written a letter to his Congressman maintaining that the company was engaged in illegalities, and requested a federal investigation.[50]

McKinney has also found secret EMR weapons development at General Electric, Northern Telecom, TRW and other engines of the Defense Department. The number of firms engaged in mind control R&D is kept small by the need for secrecy. But "non-lethal" technology is increasingly in demand by police agencies. Army officials have taken to touting the new "dual-use" technology—a euphemism for weapons with military and law enforcement applications. (The Los Angeles Times noted without so much as a giggle that "experts" believed domestic proliferation of "non-lethal" weapons "could provide jobs for smaller firms.")[51]

But on inevitable occasions, the technology has found its way into the hands of terrorists. In September 1984, for example, the neo-Nazi cadre known as The Order launched the "Reliance Project" EM mind control operation. According to an FBI affidavit reprinted in The Brotherhood of Murder, by Thomas Martinez and John Guinther, Order leaders paid $100,000 to "two former government scientists who had been involved in a secret United States scientific experiment dealing with the transmission of electronic signals or waves at particular frequencies which serve to render people more docile and subservient." And "experiments were being conducted that will allow persons with the knowledge to take a lock of hair from another and by some scientific process, project a chemical imbalance in that person."[52]

The hinges of PANDORA's box creak in the wind. The American arsenal of psychoactive weapons, Michael Hutchinson writes in Megabrain, is the product of "a vast underground network of bio-electricians busily tinkering away with electromagnetic devices that could potentially change the world."[53] Instead, the technology is applied to "mind control, moving objects with mind power," to "the potential for mentally shutting down computers, missile-guidance systems, satellites." Hutchinson, once a mind control skeptic, concludes that his worst paranoid fantasies were "accepted by electronics experts as facts of life."

The growing importance of EM weapons to the DoD was implied in the promotion of William Perry to Secretary of Defense by Bill Clinton in 1994. Perry was "the favorite of the Joint Chiefs of Staff," noted the Los Angeles Times. He was chosen in 1954 by GTE to direct the company's electronic defense lab.[54] Twelve years later he was installed as president of ESL, Inc., an electronics company engaged in some of the Pentagon's murkiest black projects—including Area 51, the secret military base in the sprawling desert wasteland north of Las Vegas. (ESL has since been acquired by TRW, a key Star Wars contractor.)[55]

Periodically, Congress beats the drum for "strategic defense." If SDI advocates have their way, the EM-frustrating Faraday Cage may someday become all the rage, like the backyard bomb shelter of old.

Chapter Three

The False Memory Hoax

Part I: CIA Connections to the Mind Control Cults

Swiss newspapers described the carnage inside the charred farmhouse as a "wax museum of death." Within hours, 27 other members of the Sovereign Order of the Solar Temple were found dead at chalets in Granges, Switzerland and Morin Heights, Quebec. Luc Jouret, the Temple's grand master, the London Times reported, "espoused a hybrid religion that owed more to Umberto Eco's novel Foucault's Pendulum than to any bible. His followers called themselves 'Knights of Christ.' The crusading codes of the Knights Templar, the rose-and-cross symbolism of the medieval Rosicrucian Order, Nazi occultism and new age mysticism were joined together into a mumbo-jumbo mishmash that seemed more designed for extracting money from disciples than saving souls."

Jouret, born in the Belgian Congo in 1947, set out in youth as a mystic with communist leanings, but his politics apparently swung full circle. He has since been linked to a clutch of neo-Nazis responsible for a string of bombings in Canada. He told friends that he had once served with a unit of Belgium paratroopers.

French-Canadian journalist Pierre Tourangeau investigated the sect for two years. A few days after the mass murder, he reported that the sect was financed by the proceeds of gun-running to Australia and South America. Simultaneously, Radio Canada announced that Jouret's Templars earned hundreds of millions of dollars laundering the profits through the infamous Bank of Credit and Commerce International (BCCI), closed by authorities worldwide in 1991. Montreal's La Presse observed: "each new piece of information only thickens the mystery"—but the combination of international arms smuggling and BCCI presented a familiar enough picture of CIA sedition. The Manhattan D.A. who closed the American branch announced that 16 witnesses had died in the course of investigating the bank's entanglements in covert operations of the CIA, arms smuggling to Iraq, money laundering and child prostitution.

The average coffee table would crumple under the weighty BCCI Book of the Dead. Journalist Danny Casalaro and Vince Foster appear in it—grim antecedents to the Solar Temple killings. The cult's connection to BCCI (reported in Europe but filtered from American newspaper accounts) fed speculation among Canadian journalists that followers of Jouret were killed to bury public disclosures of gun-running and money laundering.

But the fraternizing of America's national security elite and the cults did not begin in Cheiry, Switzerland. Jouret's Order of the Solar Temple was but the latest incarnation of mind control operations organized and overseen by the CIA and Department of Defense.

> In a sense, we are in the same ethical and moral dilemma as the physicists in the days prior to the Manhattan Project. Those of us who work in this field see a developing potential for a nearly total control of human emotional status.

Scientists in the CIA's mind control fraternity lead double lives. Many are highly respected, but if the truth were known they would be deafened by the public outcry and drummed out of their respective academic haunts.

Martin T. Orne, for example, a senior CIA/Navy researcher, is based at the University of Pennsylvania's Experimental Psychiatry Laboratory. He is also an original member of the False Memory Syndrome Foundation's advisory board, a tightly-drawn coterie of psychiatrists, many with backgrounds in CIA mind control experimentation in its myriad forms. The Foundation is dedicated to denying the existence of cult mind control and child abuse. Its primary pursuit is the castigation of survivors and therapists for fabricating accusations of ritual abuse.

Dismissing cult abuse as hysteria or false memory, a common defense strategy, may relieve parents of preschool children. In a small percentage of cult abuse cases its possible that children may be led to believe they've been victimized.

But the CIA and its cover organizations have a vested interest in blowing smoke at the cult underground because the worlds of CIA mind control and many cults merge inextricably. The drum beat of "false accusations" from the media is taken up by paid operatives like Dr. Orne and the False Memory Syndrome Foundation to conceal the crimes of the Agency.

Orne's forays into hypno-programming were financed in the 1960s by the Human Ecology Fund, a CIA cover at Cornell University and the underwriter of many of the formative mind control experiments conducted in the U.S. and abroad, including the gruesome brainwashing and remote mind control experiments of D. Ewen Cameron at Montreal's Allan Memorial Institute. Research specialties of the CIA's black psychiatrists included electroshock lobotomies, drugging agents, incapacitants, hypnosis, sleep deprivation and radio control of the brain, among hundreds of sub-projects.

The secondary source of funding for Dr. Orne's work in hypnotic suggestion and dissolution of memory is eerie in the cult child abuse context. The voluminous files of John Marks in Washington, D.C. (139 boxes obtained under FOIA, to be exact, two-fifths of which document CIA interest in the occult) include an Agency report itemizing a $30,000 grant to Orne from Human Ecology, and another $30,000 from Boston's Scientific Engineering Institute (SEI)—another CIA funding cover, founded by Edwin Land of the Polaroid Corporation (and supervisor of the U-2 spy plane escapades). This was the year that the CIA's Office of Research and Development (ORD) geared up a study of parapsychology and the occult. The investigation, dubbed Project OFTEN-CHICKWIT, gave rise to the establishment of a social "laboratory" by SEI scientists at the University of South Carolina—a college class in black witchcraft, demonology and voodoo.

Dr. Orne, with SEI funding, marked out his own mind control corner at the University of Pennsylvania in the early 1960s. He does not publicize his role as a CIA psychiatrist. He denies it, very plausibly. In a letter to Dr. Orne, Marks once reminded him that he'd disavowed knowledge of his participation in one mind-wrecking experimental sub-project. Orne later recanted, admitting that he'd been aware of the true source of funding all along.

Among psychiatrists in the CIA's mind control fraternity, Orne ranks among the most venerable. He once boasted to Marks that he was routinely briefed on all significant CIA behavior modification experiments: "Why would they come to him," Martin Cannon muses in The Controllers, which links UFO abductions to secret military research veiled by screen memories of "alien" abduction, "unless Orne had a high security clearance and worked extensively with the intelligence services?"

To supplement his CIA income, the influential Dr. Orne has been the donee of grants from the Office of Naval Research and the Air Force Office of Scientific Research. "I should like to hear," Cannon says, "what innocent explanation, if any, the Air Force has to offer to explain their interest in post-hypnotic amnesia."

According to Army records, Orne's stomping grounds, Penn U., was a beehive of secret experiments in the Vietnam War period. The Pentagon and CIA—under the auspices of ORD's Steve Aldrich, a doyen of occult and parapsychological studies—conferred the Agency's most lucrative research award upon the University of Pennsylvania to study the effects of 16 newly-concocted biochemical warfare agents on humans, including choking, blistering and vomiting agents, toxins, poison gas and incapacitating chemicals. The tests were abruptly halted in 1972 when the prison's medical lab burned to the ground.

Testimony before the 1977 Church Committee's probe of the CIA hinted that, as of 1963, the scientific squalor of the CIA's mind control regimen, code-named MKULTRA, had abandoned military and academic laboratories, fearing exposure, and mushroomed in cities across the country. Confirmation arrived in 1980 when Joseph Holsinger, an aide to late Congressman Leo Ryan (who was murdered by a death squad at Jonestown) exposed the formation of eccentric religious cults by the CIA. Holsinger made the allegation at a colloquium of psychologists in San Francisco on "Psychosocial Implications of the Jonestown Phenomenon." Holsinger maintained that a CIA rear-support base had been in collusion with Jones to perform medical and mind control experiments at People's Temple. The former Congressional aide cited an essay he'd received in the mail, "The Penal Colony," written by a Berkeley psychologist. The author had emphasized: Rather than terminating MKULTRA, THE CIA SHIFTED ITS PROGRAMS FROM PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS TO PRIVATE CULT GROUPS, including the People's Temple.

Jonestown had its grey eminence in Dr. Lawrence Laird Layton of the University of California at Berkeley, formerly a chemist for the Manhattan Project and head of the Army's chemical warfare research division in the early 1950s. (Larry Layton, his son, led the death squad that murdered Congressman Leo Ryan, who'd arrived at Guyana to investigate the cult.) Michael Meiers, author of Was Jonestown a CIA Medical Experiment?, scavenged for information on the People's Temple for six years, concluding: "The Jonestown experiment was conceived by Dr. Layton, staffed by Dr. Layton and financed by Dr. Layton. It was as much his project as it was Jim Jones's. Though it was essential for him to remain in the background for security reasons, Dr. Layton maintained contact with and even control of the experiment through his wife and children." The African-American cult had at its core a Caucasian inner-council, composed of Dr. Layton's family and in-laws.

The press was blind to obvious CIA connections, but survivors of the carnage in Guyana followed the leads and maintained that Jim Jones was "an employee, servant, agent or operative of the Central Intelligence Agency" from 1963—the year the Agency turned to cult cut-outs to conceal MKULTRA mind control activities—until 1978. In October 1981 the survivors of Jonestown filed a $63 million lawsuit against Secretary of State Cyrus Vance and Stansfield Turner, former director of the CIA, currently a teacher at the University of Maryland and a director of the Monsanto Corporation. The suit, filed in U.S. district court in San Francisco, accused Turner of conspiring with Agency operatives to "enhance the economic and political powers of James Warren Jones," and of conducting "mind control and drug experimentation" on the Temple flock.

The suit was dismissed four months later for "failure to prosecute timely." All requests for an appeal were denied.

Ligatures of the CIA clung to the cults. Much of the violence that has since exploded across the front pages was incited by CIA academics at leading universities.

Small wonder, then, that Ted Goertzel, director of the Forum for Policy Research at Rutgers, which maintains a symbiosis with the CIA despite media exposure, should write that the most susceptible victims of "cryptomnesia" (a synonym for false memories) believe "in conspiracies, including the JFK assassination, AIDS conspiracies, as well as the UFO cover-up." The problem, Goertzel says, "may have its origins in early childhood," and is accompanied by "feelings of anomie and anxiety that make the individual more likely to construct false memories out of information stored in the unconscious mind."

This side of gilded rationalizations, the CIA's links to the cults are no manifestation of "cryptomnesia."

Like Jonestown, the Symbionese Liberation Army was a mind control creation unleashed by the Agency. The late political researcher Mae Brussell, whose study of The Firm commenced in 1963 after the assassination of John Kennedy, wrote in 1974 that the rabid guerrilla band "consisted predominantly of CIA agents and police informers." This unsavory group was, Brussell insisted, "an extension of psychological experimentation projects, connected to Stanford Research Institute, Menlo Park." (She went on to lament that "many of the current rash of 'senseless killings,' 'massacres,' and 'zombie-type murders' are committed by individuals who have been in Army hospitals, mental hospitals or prison hospitals, where their heads have been literally taken over surgically to create terror in the community.")

Evidence that the CIA conceived and directed the SLA was obvious. The SLA leadership was trained by Colston Westbrook, a Pennsylvania native. Westbrook was a veteran of the CIA's murderous PHOENIX Program in South Vietnam, where he trained terrorist cadres and death squads. In 1969 he took a job as an administrator of Pacific Architects and Engineers, a CIA proprietary in Southern California. Three of Westbrook's foot soldiers, Emily and William Harris and Angela Atwood (a former police intelligence informer), had been students of the College of Foreign Affairs, a CIA cover at the University of Indiana. Even the SLA symbol, a seven-headed cobra, had been adopted by the OSS (America's wartime intelligence agency) and CIA to designate precepts of brainwashing.

When the smoke cleared at SLA headquarters in L.A., Dr. Martin Orne was called upon to examine Patricia Hearst in preparation for trial. The government charged that she had participated voluntarily in the SLA's gun-toting crime spree. Orne's was a foregone conclusion—he sided with the government. His opinion was shared by two other psychiatrists called to appraise Ms. Hearst's state of mind, Robert Jay Lifton and Louis Jolyon West. Dr. Lifton was a co-founder of the aforementioned Human Ecology Fund. The CIA contractor that showered Orne with research grants in the 1960s. Dr. West is one of the CIA's most notorious mind control specialists, currently director of UCLA's Neuropsychiatric Institute. It was West who brought a score of mind control psychiatrists of the ultra-right political stripe to the UCLA campus.

Drs. Orne, Lifton and West unanimously agreed that Patty Hearst had been "persuasively coerced" to join the SLA. She had been put through a grueling thought reform regimen. She'd been isolated and sensory deprived, raped, humiliated, badgered, politically indoctrinated with a surrealistic mutation of Third World Marxism. Ms. Hearst was only allowed human companionship when she exhibited signs of submission. Orne and his colleagues assured that attention was narrowed to their psychologizing, conveniently rendering evidence of CIA collusion extraneous to consideration by the jury.

Another psychiatrist called to testify at the trial of "Tania" surfaced with Dr. Orne in 1991 on the board of the False Memory Syndrome Foundation. (The FMSF board is almost exclusively composed of former CIA and military doctors currently employed by major universities. None have backgrounds in ritual abuse—their common interest is behavior modification.) Dr. Margaret Singer, a retired Berkeley Ph.D., studied repatriated prisoners-of-war returning from the Korean War at the Walter Reed Army Institute of Research in Maryland, 1952–58.)

Singer turned up in 1982 on the book jacket of Raven—the CIA's codename for Jim Jones—by San Francisco Examiner reporters Tim Reiterman and John Jacobs, a thoroughly-researched account of the People's Temple that completely side-steps CIA involvement. Co-author John Jacobs was supposedly one of the country's leading authorities on CIA mind control, a subject he studied at length for a series published by the Washington Post. Reiterman had been the Examiner reporter on the Patricia Hearst beat. Yet both writers managed to avoid obvious intelligence connections. Dr. Singer commended the book as "the definitive psychohistory of Jim Jones." Raven, she opined, conveyed "the essence of psychological and social processes that Jim Jones, the ultimate manipulator, set in motion." The true "manipulators," of course, were operatives of the CIA, and the public disinformation gambit lauded by Dr. Singer was, according to Meiers, in tune with "a concerted attempt to suppress information, stifle investigations, censor writers and manipulate public information."

The CIA and Pentagon have quietly organized and influenced a long line of mind control cults, among them:

The Riverside Lodge of the Ordo Templis Orientis: Also known as The Solar Lodge of the OTO, which followed the teachings of cult messiah Aleister Crowley, whose fixed gaze on the astral equinox resulted in instructions from his deities to form a religious order. Crowley, high priest of the OTO and a British intelligence agent, gave Winifred T. Smith a charter to open an OTO lodge in Pasadena. The high priest of the lodge was Jack Parsons, a rocket expert and founder of the California Institute of Technology. Parsons, who took the oath of the anti-Christ in 1949, contributed to the design of the Pentagon under subsequent CIA director John J. McCloy. He was killed in a still unexplained laboratory explosion. There is a crater on the moon named after him.

The OTO's Solar Lodge in San Bernardino was presided over by Georgina "Jean" Brayton, the daughter of a ranking Air Force officer in the 1960s. The cult subscribed to a grim, apocalyptic view of the world, and like Charles Manson believed that race wars would precipitate the Big Cataclysm. In the Faustian Los Angeles underworld, the lodge was known for its indulgence in sadomasochism, drug dealing, blood drinking, child molestation and murder.

Candace Reos, a former member of the lodge, was deposed by Riverside police in 1969. Reos said that Brayton controlled the thinking of all cult members. One poor soul, she said, was ordered to curb his sexual urges by cutting his wrists every time he was aroused. Mrs. Reos told police, according to the report, that when she became pregnant, Georgina was angry and told her that she would have to condition herself to hate her child. Reos told police that children of the cult's 43 adult members were secluded from their parents and received "training" that took on "very severe tones."

"There was a lot of spanking involved," she said, "a lot of heavy criticism. There was a lot of enclosed in dark rooms." The teachers, she added, "left welts."

If so ordered, adult cultists would beat their children.

According to a Riverside County Sheriff's report, a six year-old child burned the group's school house to the ground. The boy was punished by solitary confinement in a locked shipping crate left in the desert, where the average temperature was 110 degrees, for two months. The boy was chained to a metal plate.

When police freed him, they were nauseated by the suffocating stench of excrement. The child was smothered in flies swarming from a tin-can toilet.

The Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh Movement: In 1985 the Portland Oregonian published a 36-part, book-length series linking the cult to opium trafficking, prostitution, money laundering, arson, slave labor, mass poisonings, illegal wiretaps and the stockpiling of guns and biochemical warfare weapons. The year-long Oregonian investigation revealed cult ties to CIA-trained mercenaries in El Salvador and the Far East. Domestically, Rajneesh's secret police force worked with Agency operatives.

Finders: On February 7, 1987 Customs agents raided a child-porn ring in Tallahasee, Florida. Eight suspects and six children were taken into custody. The children, according to a Customs Department memo, behaved "like animals in a public park," and "were not aware of the function and purpose of telephones, televisions and toilets."

The children told police that they were forced to live outdoors and were given food only as a reward. A check on the backgrounds of the adults turned up a police report, "specific in describing 'bloody rituals' and sex orgies involving children, and an as-yet unsolved murder." Customs agents searched a cult safe house and discovered a computer room and documents recording "high-tech" bank transfers, explosives, and a set of instructions advising cult members on moving children through jurisdictions around the country. One photographic album found in the house featured the execution and disembowelment of goats, and snapshots, according to a Customs report, of "adults and children dressed in white sheets participating in a bloody ritual."

An American passport was found. The investigating agents contacted the State Department and were advised to "terminate further investigation."

They investigated anyway, reporting that "the CIA made contact and admitted to owning the Finders ... as a front for a domestic training organization, but that it had 'gone bad.'" The late wife of Marion David Pettie, the cult's leader, had worked for the Agency, and his son had been an employee of Air America, the heroin-riddled CIA proprietary. Yet Pettie denied to a reporter for U.S. News & World Report any connection to the CIA. Police in Washington refused to comment. Officials of the CIA dismissed as "hogwash" allegations of any connection to the Finders cult.

MOVE: On May 13, 1985 MOVE's Philadelphia headquarters was firebombed by local police. Not only did the fire consume the cult's home—it devastated the entire neighborhood, leaving 11 dead and 250 homeless. The group was cofounded by Vince Leapheart, aka John Africa, a Korean veteran. His intellectual mentor and source of funding was Donald Glassey, a lecturer at the University of Pennsylvania's School of Social Work. Glassey was an admitted police "informant," but conducted himself like a paid provocateur. He purchased weapons for the cult with cash drawn from city coffers. John Africa, the cult's titular head, claimed to be a messiah, and like Jim Jones to have Godly "healing" powers and "total control" over his followers.

O.T.A.: The Order of the Temple of Astarte in Pasadena, California is a "hermetic" occult organization that practices "Magick in the Western Tradition." The cult is led by Fraters Khenemel, a police officer, and Aleyin, a veteran Green Beret. The cult's everyday language is unusual for a mystical order—one group schedule is laden with words like "operation," "sixteen-thirty hours," and "travel orders." Demonology is among the OTA's primary occult interests.

The police connection recalls the statement of Louis Tackwood, the former LAPD provocateur whose revelations of secret police subterfuge set off a political tempest in Los Angeles in 1973. "You don't know," he told journalist Donald Freed, "but there's a devil worship cult in Pasadena. Actually in Altadena." Tackwood alleged that the cultists were "on the LAPD payroll."

The CIA and Pentagon cooperate in the creation of cults. To be sure, the Association of National Security Alumni, a public interest veterans group opposed to covert operations, considers it a "primary issue of concern" that the Department of Defense has a "perceived role in satanic cult activities, which qualify in and of themselves as very damaging exercises in mind control and behavioral modification."

It is beginning to dawn on the psychiatric community at large that the CIA's mind control clique is a menace reminiscent of Nazi medical experimentation. In 1993, Dr. Corydon Hammond, a professor at the University of Utah's School of Medicine, conducted a seminar on federally-funded mind control experiments. Topics covered by Hammond included brainwashing, post-hypnotic programming and the induction of multiple personalities by the CIA. Hammond contended that the cult underground has roots in Nazi Germany, and that the CIA's cult mind control techniques were based upon those of Nazi scientists recruited by the CIA for Cold Warfare. (Researcher Lenny Lapon estimates in Mass Murderers in White Coats that 5,000 Nazis resettled in the U.S. after WW II.) Hammond was forced to drop this line of inquiry by professional ridicule, especially from the CIA's False Memory Syndrome Foundation, and a barrage of death threats. At a recent regional conference on ritual child abuse, he regretted that he could no longer speak on the theme of government mind control.

The psychological community is waking to the threat in its ranks, to judge by APA surveys and personal communications with ranking members of the mental health field, but the world at large remains in the dark. The "mass hysteria" and "false memory" bromides disseminated by the establishment press obscure federal and academic connections to the mind control cults, which are defended largely by organized pedophiles, cultists and hired guns of psychiatry. An ambitious disinformation gambit has led the world at large to side with cultists operating under federal protection. As at Jonestown and Chiery, Switzerland, the denouement of cult activity often ends in the destruction of all witnesses. This cycle of abuse and murder can only be ended by full public awareness of the federal mind control initiative.

Part Two: The CIA, The False Memory Syndrome Foundation & The Politics of Ritual Abuse

The conference session bears a passing resemblance to a 12-Step meeting. Assembled in a Portland religious retreat, members of the False Memory Syndrome Foundation (FMSF), all accused of child abuse, are encouraged to unload their anguish. Only women take the stage (they leave reporters with a sympathetic impression—men stigmatized by child abuse do not). Pamela Freyd, a Foundation founder, assures these victims of pernicious therapies they are not alone. The Foundation's office in Philadelphia, she says, takes 60 calls on a typical day from distraught adults hounded by their own confused children, rogue therapists and sensation-seeking pack journalists.

The number of dues-paying members (each contributes $100 a year) varies according to the source. The group reported in January 1993 that 1,200 families had made contact in its first year of operation. The same month, the San Jose Mercury News declared flatly that "nearly 3,000 families" from across the country had been recruited. The FMSF now claims 5,000 families. Time magazine raised the figure to "7,000 individuals and families who have sought assistance."

The Foundation's distinctive handling of statistics is incessant. In April of this year the FMSF claimed 12,000 families have been strained by false child abuse allegations. A month later, the figure dropped to "9,500 U.S. families." Yet the Foundation prides itself on accuracy. One FMSF newsletter advises members to insist the media "report accurate information. The rumors and misinformation surrounding the false accusations based on recovery of repressed memories are shocking." The same author regrets that "65% of accusations of abuse are now unsubstantiated, a whopping jump from 35% in 1976." This figure, once gleefully disseminated by such pedophile defense groups as NAMBLA (North American Man/Boy Love Association) and VOCAL (Victims of Child Abuse Laws) was debunked years ago. It was fabricated by Douglas Besherov of the American Enterprise Institute, a hard right-wing propaganda factory fueled by the Olin Foundation, a CIA funding cover. (Christian conservatives are often accused of propagating ritual abuse "hysteria," yet in the 1992 presidential election the para-conservative wing of the Republican Party slipped into its platform a strategy to put an end to investigations of child abuse.)

The FMSF selectively ignores child abuse data that disagree with their own. Judith Herman, author of Trauma and Recovery, reported in the Harvard Mental Health Letter that false abuse allegations by children "are rare, in the range of 2–8% of reported cases. False retractions of true complaints are far more common, especially when the victim is not sufficiently protected after disclosure and therefore succumbs to intimidation by the perpetrator or other family members who feel that they must preserve secrecy."

Other statistics shunned by the False Memory Syndrome Foundation include a survey presented at a 1992 psychiatric conference that found that a full 88% of all therapists in a large sampling consider ritual child abuse to be a very real social problem with devastating emotional effects. Another: In 1990 the State University of New York at Buffalo polled a national sampling of clinical psychologists on ritual abuse. About 800 psychologists—a third of the poll—were aware of treating at least one case. Only 5% of all child abuse cases ever enter the courtroom—half of these end with the child in the custody of the abusive parent.

The recovered memory debate was discussed at a 1993 conference on multiple personality disorder. Richard Lowenstein, a psychiatrist from the University of Maryland Medical School, argued that the Foundation is "media-directed, dedicated to putting out disinformation."

Other conference participants contemplated funding sources and "possible CIA connections."

Therapists accused of implanting memories of abuse

■ In depth: Recollections of incest are questioned in court.

BY S.L. WYKES
Mercury News Staff Writer

Stanford University psychiatrist Saul Wasserman and his wife began a quick slide into parental hell a year ago. Their only child accused them and her grandfather of sexual abuse, the Wassermans say, and then she threatened to have her parents killed if they came near her.

Wasserman, a therapist who treats abused children, denies the charges and believes his daughter's claims were induced by improper psychological treatment — that she might be under the spell of false memory syndrome.

Characterized by a belief in events that never took place, the false memory syndrome label has emerged amid a wave of attitudinal change about sexual abuse.

For years, incest and sexual abuse were never discussed or admitted, but gradually the subject has come out in the open and gained understanding and legal and medical attention.

No one questions the legitimacy of many histories of incest and abuse, but a wave of litigation has begun to hit the courts as some accused parents challenge childhood memories dredged up during therapy.

An association of parents who say their children have accused them falsely of sexual abuse has grown in less than a year to nearly 3,000 families. The False Memory Syndrome Foundation has members from every state, including 366 Californians, and there are members from Canada, England, France and Germany.

Stanford psychiatrist Saul Wasserman contends improper psychological treatment caused his daughter to accuse him of abuse, then threaten to have him killed.

False recollections dredged up by psychologists, parents say

'It's going to become the psychologic quackery of the 20th century, without any doubt. It's a phenomenon of epidemic proportions and it's growing.'

— Richard Ofshe, sociologist, University of California, Berkeley

The Devil Denuded

The CIA, in fact, has several designates on the FMSF advisory board. They have in common backgrounds in mind control experimentation. Their very presence on the board, and their peculiar backgrounds, reveal some heavily obscured facts about ritual child abuse.

Martin T. Orne, a senior CIA researcher, is an original board member of the Foundation, and a psychiatrist at the University of Pennsylvania's Experimental Psychiatry Lab in Philadelphia. In 1962 his forays into hypno-programming (the elicitation of "anti-social" behavior, dissolving memory and other mind-subduing techniques) were financed by a CIA front at Cornell University. He was also funded by Boston's Scientific Engineering Institute, another front, and a clearinghouse for the Agency's investigation of the occult.

The CIA and Pentagon have formed a partnership in the creation of cults. To be sure, the Association of National Security Alumni, a public interest veterans group opposed to clandestine ops, considers it a "primary issue of concern" that the Department of Defense has a "perceived role in satanic cult activities, which qualify in and of themselves as very damaging exercises in mind control."

The smoothing over of the national security state's cult connections is handled by academic "experts."

A forerunner of the Foundation is based in Buffalo, New York, the Committee for Scientific Examination of Religion, best known for the publication of Satanism in America: How the Devil Got More Than His Due, widely considered to be a legitimate study. The authors turn up their noses to ritual abuse, dismissing the hundreds of reports around the country as mass "hysteria." Cult researcher Carl Raschke reported in a March, 1991 article that he coincidentally met Hudson Frew, a Satanism in America co-author, at a Berkeley bookstore. "Frew was wearing a five-pointed star, or pentagram, the symbol of witchcraft and earth magic," Raschke says. Shawn Carlson, a contributor to the book, is identified by the media as a "physicist." Yet he runs the Gaia Press in El Cerrito, California, a New Age publishing house with an emphasis on witchcraft and occultic lore. Carlson is also a "scientific and technical consultant" to the Committee for Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal (a promoter of the "false memory" theory of ritual abuse and UFO abductions), publisher of the Skeptical Inquirer.

The FMS Foundation is no less eccentric. Within two years of its founding, it was clear that the Foundation leadership was far from disinterested on the workings of childhood memory, and concealed a secret sexual and political agenda.

FMSF founder Ralph Underwager, director of the Institute of Psychological Therapies in Minnesota, was forced to resign in 1993. Underwager (a former Lutheran pastor) and his wife Hollida Wakefield publish a journal, Issues in Child Abuse Allegations, written by and for child abuse "skeptics." His departure from the False Memory Syndrome Foundation was hastened by a remark in an interview, appearing in an Amsterdam journal for pedophiles, that it was "God's Will" adults engage in sex with children. (His wife Hollida remained on the Foundation's board after he left.) As it happens, holy dispensation for pedophiles is the exact credo of the Children of God cult. It was fitting, then, when Underwager filed an affidavit on behalf of cult members tried in France in 1992, insisting that the accused were positively "not guilty of abuse upon children." In the interview, he prevailed upon pedophiles everywhere to shed stigmatization as "wicked and reprehensible" users of children.

In keeping with the Foundation's creative use of statistics, Dr. Underwager told a group of British reporters in 1994 that "scientific evidence" proved 60% of all women molested as children believed the experience was "good for them."

Dr. Underwager invariably sides with the defense. His grandiloquent orations have graced courtrooms around the world, often by satellite. Defense lawyers for Woody Allen turned to him, he boasts, when Mia Farrow accused her estranged husband of molesting their seven year-old daughter. Underwager is a virtual icon to the Irish Catholic lobby in Dublin, which raised its hoary hackles against a child abuse prevention program in the Irish Republic. He was, until his advocacy of pedophila tarnished an otherwise glittering reputation, widely quoted in the press, dismissing ritual child abuse as a hysterical aberration.

He is the world's foremost authority on false memory, but in the courtroom he is repeatedly exposed as a charlatan. In 1988, a trial court decision in New York State held that Dr. Underwager was "not qualified to render any opinion as to whether or not (the victim) was sexually molested." In 1990 his testimony on memory was ruled improper "in the absence of any evidence that the results of Underwager's work had been accepted in the scientific community." And In Minnesota a judge ruled that Underwager's theories on "learned memory" were the same as "having an expert tell the jury that (the victim) was not telling the truth."

Peter and Pamela Freyd, executive directors of the Foundation, joined forces with Underwager in 1991, and their story is equally wretched. Jennifer Freyd, their daughter, a professor of psychology at the University of Oregon, openly leveled accusations of abuse against her parents at an August 1993 mental health conference in Ann Arbor, Michigan.

"My family of origin was troubled in many observable ways," she said. "I refer to the things that were never 'forgotten' and 'recovered,' but to things that we all knew about." She gave her father's alcoholism as an example. "During my childhood, my father sometimes discussed his own experiences of being sexually abused as an 11 year-old boy, and called himself a 'kept boy.'" Peter Freyd graduated to male prostitution as an adolescent.

At the age of 13, Jennifer Freyd composed a poem about her father's nocturnal visits:

I am caught in a web,
A web of deep, deep terror.

she wrote. The diaries of her youth chronicle the "reactions and feelings (guilt, shame and terror) of a troubled girl and young woman. My parents oscillated between denying these symptoms and feelings... to using knowledge of these same symptoms and feelings to discredit me."

"My father," she says, "told various people that I was brain damaged." The accusation was unlikely. At the time, Jennifer Freyd was a graduate student on a National Science Foundation fellowship. She has taught at Cornell and received numerous research awards. The "brain damage" apologia did not wash. Her mother suggested that Jennifer's memories were "confabulations," and faulted therapeutic intervention. Pamela Freyd turned to her own psychiatrist, Dr. Harold Lief, currently an advisory board member of the Foundation, to diagnose Jennifer.

"He explained to me that he did not believe I was abused," Jennifer recalls. Dr. Lief's diagnosis was based on his belief that Peter Freyd's fantasies were strictly "homoerotic." Of course, his daughter furrows a brow at the assumption that homoerotic fantasies or a heterosexual marriage exclude the possibility of child molestation. Lief's skewed logic is a trademark of the Foundation.

He is a close colleague of the CIA's Martin Orne. Dr. Lief, a former major in the Army medical corps, joined the University of Pennsylvania faculty in 1968, the peak of federally-funded behavioral modification experiments at Holmesburg Prison. Dr. Orne consulted with him on several studies in hypnotic programming. His academic writing reveals a peculiar range of professional interests, including "Orgasm in the Postoperative Transsexual" for Archives of Sexual Behavior, and an exploration of the possibility of life after death for a journal on mental diseases edited by Foundation fellow Paul McHugh. Lief is a director of the Center for Sexuality and Religion, past president of the Sex Information and Education Council.

And an original board member of the False Memory Syndrome Foundation. Two others, Jon Baron from Penn U. and Ray Hyman (an executive editor of the aforementioned Skeptical Inquirer), a professor of psychology at the University of Oregon, resigned from the board after Jennifer Freyd went public with her account of childhood abuse and the facetious attempts of her parents and their therapist to discredit her. They were replaced by David Dinges, co-director—with the ubiquitous Martin

Orne—of the Unit for Experimental Psychiatry at the University of Pennsylvania.

"At times I am flabbergasted that my memory is considered 'false,'" Jennifer says, "and my alcoholic father's memory is considered rational and sane." She does not, after all, remember impossible abuses: "I remember incest in my father's house.... My first memories came when I was at home a few hours after my second session with my therapist, a licensed clinical psychologist working within an established group in a large and respected medical clinic.

"During that second visit to my therapist's office, I expressed great anxiety about the upcoming holiday visit from my parents. My therapist asked about half way into the session, whether I had ever been sexually abused. I was immediately thrown into a strange state. No one had ever asked me such a question. I responded, 'no, but....' I went home and within a few hours I was shaking uncontrollably, overwhelmed with intense and terrible flashbacks." Jennifer asks herself why her parents are believed. "In the end, is it precisely because I was abused that I am to be discredited despite my personal and professional success?"

Pamela Freyd published an open letter defending her husband in Ralph Underwager's Issues in Child Abuse Accusations in 1991. It was reprinted in Confabulations, a book published a year later. Laced with lubricious sentiment, the book bemoans the "destruction of families" brought on by false child abuse accusations, and maligns "cult-like" support groups and feminists, or "lesbian cults." Executive director Freyd often refers to the feminist groups that have taken up the cause of child abuse survivors as "lesbians," after the bizarre Dr. Underwager, who claims, "these women may be jealous that males are able to love each other, be comrades, friends, be close, intimate."

Pamela Freyd's account of the family history, Jennifer insists, is patently false. In an electronic message from her father, he openly acknowledged that in his version of the story "fictional elements were deliberately inserted."

"'Fictional is rather an astounding choice of words," Jennifer observed at the Ann Arbor conference. The article written by her parents contends that Jennifer was denied tenure at another university due to a lack of published research. "In fact," Jennifer counters, "I moved to the University of Oregon in 1987, just four years after receiving my Ph.D. to accept a tenured position as associate professor in the psychology department, one of the world's best psychology departments.... My mother sent the Jane Doe article to my colleagues during my promotion year—that is, the year my case for promotion to full professor was being considered. I was absolutely mortified to learn of this violation of my privacy and this violation of truth."

Manipulative tactics are another Foundation imprimatur. Lana

Alexander, editor of a newsletter for survivors of child sexual abuse, observes that "many people view the false memory syndrome theory as a calculated defense strategy developed by perpetrators and the lawyers and expert witnesses who defend them."

A legitimizing barrage of stories in the press has shaped public opinion and warmed the clime for defense attorneys. The concept of false memory serves the same purpose as Holocaust denial. It shapes opinion. Unconscionable crimes are obstructed, the accused is endowed with the status of martyr, the victim reviled.

The emphasis on image is obvious in "How Do We Know We are Not Representing Pedophiles," an article written for the February 29, 1992 FMS Foundation Newsletter, by Pamela Freyd. In it, she derides the suggestion that many members of the group could be molesters because "we are a good-looking bunch of people, greying hair, well dressed, healthy, smiling; just about every person who has attended is someone you would surely find interesting and want to count as a friend."

The debate's bloodiest stage is the courtroom. The hired guns of Martin Orne's circle of psychiatrists are constantly called upon to blow smoke at the jury's gallery to conceal CIA mind control operations. This branch of the psychiatric community is steeped in the programming of serial killers, political assassins and experiments on involuntary subjects. Agency psychiatrists on the witness stand direct the press away from the CIA, and the prosecution to a predetermined end.

Orne's influence contributed to the outcome of a high-profile abuse case, the $8 million lawsuit filed by Gary Ramona of Napa, California against child therapist Marche Isabella and psychiatrist Richard Rose. Ramona charged that his daughter Holly's therapists elicited from her flashbacks of sexual molestation that never occurred, decimating his marriage and career as a vice president at Robert Mondavi wineries. His wife and employer, note, immediately believed Holly's accusations. In May of 1994 Ramona received a $500,000 jury award. He hailed the decision as a "tremendous victory."

Nevertheless, Holly Ramona still maintains that she was sexually abused by her father, though no criminal charges have been filed. Holly first confronted her father with the allegations on March 15, 1990, with her mother and Isabella present. She filed a civil action against him in Los Angeles County, but before it went to trial her father's suit got underway in Napa.

The suit turned on the use of sodium amytal to resurrect buried memories. Holly Ramona exhibited telltale symptoms of abuse—fear of gynecological examinations, a phobia of pointy teeth, like her father's—and asked to be treated with sodium amytal. Dr. Rose wrote in his notes that under the influence of the drug, Holly "remembered specific details of sexual molestation." But Orne, who has pioneered in the use of sodium amytal in hypnosis research, cautioned in a court brief that the drug is "not useful in ascertaining 'truth.' The patient becomes receptive to suggestions due to the context and to the comments of the interviewers."

Yet the jury foreman stated for the record that Isabella and Rose did not implant false memories of abuse, as Holly's father had complained, but were negligent in reinforcing the memories as Holly described them under the influence of the barbiturate. The court considered it irrelevant whether Holly actually suffered abuse, narrowing the legal focus instead to the chemical evocation of Holly's recollections and her therapist's leading questions.

Left hanging was the question of Ramona's guilt or innocence, not exactly an irrelevant issue. Orne offered no opinion. The "tremendous victory" in Napa, given these facts, begins to look like a manipulation of the court system, especially the use of "expert" testimony.

The therapists did not, contrary to most press reports, bear the full brunt of blame. The jury found that Ramona himself bore 5% of the blame for what happened to him, Holly's therapists 55%, and 45% by the girl's mother and the Robert Mondavi winery.

But the 55% solution is diluted by Holly's memories. Contrary to the impression left by the press, her past has not been explained away. "I wouldn't be here if there was a question in my mind," she testified in Napa.

False memory had no clinical history or symptomology (repressed memory has both), but the concept had held up in court.

All that remained was to provide a scientific explanation. The Foundation had spread the word that a "syndrome" was winding through society and "destroying families." But what is the origin of false (not inaccurate or clouded or fragmented) memories? What are the symptoms? It remained to supply a cognitive model for false memories of ritual molestation.

One of the most prolific and quotable popularizers of false memory is Elizabeth Loftus, a professor of psychology and law at the University of Washington in Seattle, and an advisory board member of the Foundation. Her dual academic interests have fueled suspicions that the organization is more committed to defending perpetrators than ferreting out the facts. Loftus testified in over 150 criminal cases prior to joining the Foundation, always on behalf of defendants. In 1991 she published a professional autobiography, Witness for the Defense, a study of eight criminal trials in which she appeared as an expert witness. In her book, Loftus—billed as "the expert who puts memory on trial"—conceded that her critics deem her research "unproven in real-life situations," and her courtroom dissertations "premature and highly prejudicial."

One book reviewer for the New York Times grumbled: "Her testimony would be less controversial if she could distinguish between the innocent and the guilty and reserve her help for the former."

Elizabeth Loftus has two criteria for taking the stand. The first is when eyewitness identification is the sole or primary evidence against the defendant. Secondly, the accused must act innocent—she regrets testifying on behalf of Ted Bundy because the serial killer once smiled at the prosecutor, which she regards as an expression of guilt—and defense attorneys must believe it.

Loftus stood at the Harvard Medical School podium in May, 1994 to inform a conference on false memory of her research, "in which false memories about childhood events were created in 24 men and women ages 18 to 63." Dr. Loftus reported that the parents of volunteers "cooperated to produce a list of events that had supposedly taken place in the volunteer's early life." Three of the events actually took place. But one, a shopping trip, never happened. Some of the volunteers had memories, implanted by suggestion, of wandering lost on the fictitious shopping expedition.

Karen Olio, the author of scores of articles on sexual abuse, complains that Loftus's memory studies "examine only the possibility of implanting a single memory with which most people could easily identify (being lost in a mall, awakened by a noise in the night). The possibility of 'implanting' terrifying and shameful memories that differ markedly from an individual's experience, such as memories of childhood abuse in individuals who do not have a trauma history," remains to be proven.

Psychiatrist John Briere of the University of Southern California has found that nearly two-thirds of all ritual abuse survivors report episodic or complete amnesia at some point after it occurred. The younger the child, the more violent the abuse, the more likely that memory lapses occurred. These findings have been duplicated at the University of California at San Francisco by psychiatrist Lenore Terr, who concluded that children subjected to repeated abuse were more likely to repress memories of it than victims of a single traumatic event.

Clinical psychologist Catherine Gould has treated scores of ritually abused children at her office in Encino, California. At the September 1993 National Conference on Crimes Against Children in Washington, D.C., Gould objected that the studies of Elizabeth Loftus ignore past research on trauma and its influence on memory.

"My concern about Elizabeth Loftus," Gould says, "is that she has stated in print, and correctly so, that her data tells us nothing about the nature of memory of traumatic events. And yet she has failed to protest the misapplication of her findings by groups who are involved in discrediting the accounts survivors are giving of their traumatic history. I believe that Dr. Loftus, like other psychologists, has an ethical responsibility to do everything possible to ensure that her research findings are interpreted and applied accurately, and are not manipulated to serve the political agenda of groups like the False Memory Syndrome Foundation. I question whether she has met this ethical responsibility."

Her study did not live up to its promise. But now that she had "proven" that a false memory could be implanted, friends of the Foundation at the Harvard conference announced they'd identified the neurological and cognitive causes of disorder. Daniel Schacter, a Harvard psychologist and conference organizer, claimed that the "confabulator" selects a fragment of a real memory, "but confuses its true context, and draws on other bits of experience to construct a story that makes sense of it." Dr. Morris Moscovitch, a neuro-psychologist at the University of Toronto, claimed that "brain damage" could also evoke false memories. He noted that mental patients with frontal lobe defects frequently confuse imaginary stories with actual memories.

A superficially plausible revelation was provided by Cornell psychologist Stephen Ceci, who reported on five studies of 574 preschool children. After 10 weeks of repeated questioning, 58% of them concocted a false account for at least one fictitious event.

But like the studies of Elizabeth Loftus, Ceci did not attempt to explain the supposed amnesiac effect of severe trauma on children and adults alike (veterans of WW II and Vietnam have been known to "forget" atrocities of war). Besides, the average preschooler is bound to invent at least one fantasy in 10 long weeks of repetitive questioning. Toddlers aren't known for their consummate adherence to objective reality. An invisible playmate and the Cat in the Hat are not "false memories."

The research results presented at the Harvard conference were not exactly staggering. All that had been proven was that children forget, become confused and make things up.

Seattle therapist James Cronin, one of the Foundation's harshest critics, believes that the false memory concept is promoted by "fact and artifice" to a public "conditioned to the fragmentation of knowledge, intellectual charades, elitism and the sterile abstractions that often pass for university education and expertise. The so-called experts now jumping on the side of false memory and therapist 'bias' are opportunists."

Yet the New York Times hailed the Harvard conference as "epic." The conference had given a gracious "scientific nod to the frailty of memory." Victims of aggravated child abuse had nothing to celebrate, but the Times reporter was ecstatic. At long last, scientists everywhere had arrived at "a consensus on the mental mechanisms that can foster false memories." A consensus? Actually, the "consensus" of psychologists, at least the 88% mentioned earlier—only a vast majority—believe it to be a very real scourge.

The Times story is typical of the scorn the press has shown ritual abuse victims and their therapists.

60 Minutes, for example, publicly exonerated Kelly Michaels, a daycare worker in New Jersey, of charges that she sexually molested dozens of youngsters in 1984. Michaels was sentenced to 47 years in prison for sodomizing the children in her care with kitchen implements, among related charges. Her conviction was overturned in March 1993 when the state appeals court ruled that Michaels had not had a fair trial.

But in its rush to present Michaels as a blushing innocent, the 60 Minutes research department somehow overlooked a May 1991 New York Times story on the abuse trial, and the testimony of four Essex County corrections officers who witnessed Miss Michaels and her father kissing and "fondling" one another during jail visitations. Jerry Vitiello, a jailer, said that "he saw Ms. Michaels use his tongue when kissing his daughter, rub her buttocks and put his hand on her breasts." Similar incestuous liaisons were detailed in the courtroom by three women working in the jail. The bizarre sexual antics of Kelly Michaels—damningly chronicled in Nap Time by Lisa Manshel in 1990—were nixed from the one-sided 60 Minutes account, which made her out to be grist for the meat grinder of wrong-headed child abuse laws.

The Forgettable "Remembering Satan"

The False Memory Syndrome Foundation made its collective debut in "Remembering Satan," a two-part story by Lawrence Wright in the New Yorker for April and May 1993. The story (republished in 1994 in book form) concerns a ritual abuse trial in Olympia, Washington that culminated with a 20-year prison sentence for Thurston County Sheriff Paul Ingram, chairman of the local Republican Party. Ingram has since filed motions to withdraw his guilty plea, a move rejected by an appellate court in 1992. Also charged, but not convicted, were Jim Rabie, a lobbyist with the Washington State Law Enforcement Association and a former police detective assigned to child abuse cases, and Ray Risch, an employee of the State Patrol's body-and-fender shop. Wright's conclusion, however, is based on the opinions of False Memory Syndrome Foundation psychiatrists: that accusations made by Ingram's two daughters, and his own confession to police, were fantasies misinterpreted by Ingram himself and his daughters as actual memories.

Wright fumigates any question of abuse with false memory theory. Among the authorities consulted by Wright was Foundation board member Paul McHugh, director of the department of psychiatry and behavioral sciences at Johns Hopkins. Like Margaret Singer, he is a veteran of the Walter Reed Army Institute of Research (1961–64) and moves in political circles. For three years (1986–89), McHugh was chairman of the bio-psychology study section of the National Institutes of Health, and a former member of the Maryland Governor's Advisory Commission.

McHugh is an unshakable skeptic of repressed memories. He told Wright that "most severe traumas are not blocked out by children but are remembered all too well." Most, in fact, are. But McHugh's own professional opinion leaves open the possibility that some severe traumas are repressed.

He cites as an example the children of Chowchilla, California, who were kidnapped in a school bus and buried alive. McHugh claims they remembered the horror "all too well." Not exactly. In fact, the FBI's subsequent use of investigative hypnosis was largely the result of the Chowchilla children's failure of memory. After their release, none of the children had a clear recollection of the kidnappers, could not identify them—and neither did the bus driver, Ed Ray, who managed to recite the license-plate number of the abductor's van under hypnosis.

Wright's defense of Ingram turns on the opinion of Richard Ofshe, a Berkeley psychologist, reputed mind control expert and friend of the False Memory Syndrome Foundation. Ofshe has written, Wright explains, "extensively about how the thought-control techniques developed in Communist china, the Soviet Union and North Korea had come to be employed and refined by various religious cults in the United States." Pointing to mind control in Communist countries is a favorite tactic of the American mind control fraternity to divert attention from the highly sophisticated techniques employed in "democratic" countries (often in the form of experimentation on unknowing subjects). This historical revision is a fine example of "mirror imaging," the CIA technique of vilifying others, and ignoring the Agency's own role in the formation and manipulation of mind control cults. Ofshe has not been directly linked to the CIA, but his work parrots the writings of UCLA's Louis Jolyon West and other psychiatrists with Agency credentials.

Wright somehow failed to mention that Ofshe is sharply at odds with much of the American Psychological Association. He has filed a suit, with Margaret Singer, for $30 million against the APA for engaging in a "conspiracy" to "destroy" their reputations and prevent them from testifying in the courtroom. Both Ms. Singer and Richard Ofshe derive a significant part of their incomes as consultants and expert witnesses on behalf of accused child abusers. Their complaint, filed under federal racketeering laws—tripling any financial damages—claims that members of the APA set out with "repeated lies" to "discredit them and impair their careers."

The Association flatly denied the charges. Two courts quickly dismissed the case. The APA released a statement to the press stating that the organization had merely advised members against testifying in court on the subject of brainwashing with "persuasive coercion" (a concept, after all, used during the Korean war by the CIA to justify barbaric mind control experimentation on American citizens), and had in no way conspired to impair the careers of Ofshe, Singer or anyone else.

Many in Ofshe's own profession believe him to be a world-class opportunist. He is a constant in newspaper interviews and on the talk show circuit, where he claims there is "no evidence" to support ritual abuse allegations. His categorical denial ignore's Ingram's own confession and a number of jury decisions across the country. And then there are, to cite one documented example of evidence from the glut that Ofshe ignores, the tunnels beneath the McMartin preschool, the most widely-publicized case. And a raid on the Children of God compound in Argentina in 1993 turned up videos of ritual abuse and child pornography. Evidence does exist—Ofshe simply refuses to acknowledge the fact. A cult specialist with Ofshe's credentials would surely explore the abundance of evidence if he was a legitimate psychologist. Instead, he chirps a categorical "no evidence," perfectly aware that most mental health professionals will see through him. A credulous public will not.

On the December 3, 1993 Rolanda talk show, a woman was interviewed who'd had flashback memories of abuse before consulting with a therapist. Dr. Ofshe appeared on the program, his silver beard groomed, looking every inch the authority. Rolanda asked Ofshe if "a terrible childhood memory, as bad as child abuse, (can) actually be repressed?"

"There is absolutely no reason to think that that is true," Ofshe told her. "And it's not just what I say—this is the sum and substance of everything science knows about how memory works." This, of course, is a transparent lie. Ofshe dismissed repressed memories of abuse as the reigning "psychological quackery of the 20th century."

Dr. Daniel Lutzker, a psychologist at the Milton Erickson Institute, was sitting in the audience—turning crimson with rage at Ofshe's misrepresentations of the psychology of trauma. He stood up and argued that sex abuse can indeed begat buried recollections. "Repressed memories," Lutzker countered, "are not only important, they are the cornerstone of most psychotherapies. The fact is that the more awful the experience, the more likely it is to be repressed!"

Ofshe responded that there was "no evidence" so support such "nonsense."

Grimacing with disbelief, Lutzker said that Ofshe wouldn't make such outrageous comments if he bothered to pick up "any basic textbook on psychotherapy."

"Your making it up!" Ofshe spat. Lutzker stared at him in disbelief.

But the crowning contradiction to Ofshe's "expert" opinions appeared in a September 1994 L.A. Weekly article on alien abductions (another phenomenon said by the Foundation to breed "false memories").

"There are a lot of not particularly well-certified people out there," Dr. Ofshe told Dave Gardetta, "using very powerful techniques on people. Visualizing this kind of stuff under hypnosis—abduction, Satan cults, sexual abuse—is the closest thing that anyone can experience short of the experience itself. That's why it's so traumatic to the individuals undergoing hypno-therapy, and why the hypno-therapist today can be seen as a new form of sexual predator."

But one morning, shortly thereafter, Gardetta awoke to find a triangular rash on the palm of his left hand.

"It didn't surprise me," Gardetta wrote. "Things around the house—which sits on a hilltop in a semi-rural area—had been getting weird. A jet-wash noise buzzed some afternoons around the house, its origin impossible to discern. Lights were turning themselves on, and the alarm system's motion sensor was tripping itself every morning between 5 and 6. One early evening, small footsteps crossed the roof. I ran outside to find the electrical wires leading to a nearby telephone pole swaying in the windless dusk."

The mysterious federal mind control fraternity had struck again, leaving behind more memories to be denounced by the "skeptics" of the FMS Foundation—the CIA's answer to the Flat Earth Society.

Chapter Four

Ray Buckey's Press Corps & the Tunnels of McMartin

A fusillade of press reports, OpEd Columns and television documentaries have dismissed the McMartin case as a "witch hunt" born of mass hysteria, coercive therapy, false memories and greed. Yet all seven jurors attending a press conference after the second trial raised their hands when asked who among them believed children had been abused at the preschool. So why the call to public denial from the press?

After the initial flurry of press coverage of the McMartin Preschool molestation case, a number of sympathetic reporters and psychiatrists publicly exonerated Ray Buckey and his co-defendants. This observer's gallery of "skeptics" also deny that ritual abuse is a social problem.

The argument consistently leads to the lament that the McMartin allegations were incited by mass hysteria, an ambitious district attorney and an incompetent child therapist. The hysteria thesis, promoted by a small group of pedophile defense psychologists, mostly, has appeared in publications of stature including the Los Angeles Times, San Francisco Chronicle, Wall Street Journal, Village Voice, Harper's, New Yorker and Newsweek. The McMartin case was the subject of an Oliver Stone cable feature.

Media boosters of the defense neglect to acknowledge the most damning evidence in the McMartin case. Instead, they explain away superficial, carefully-sifted pieces of the case. In preparation for the trial, 389 toddlers were interviewed—nearly all of them described abuse at the preschool, and do to this day. Some 80 percent had physical symptoms, including blunt force trauma of sexual areas, scarring, rectal bleeding and sexual diseases.

Interestingly enough, skeptics of ritual abuse in the public print often have dubious bona fides themselves. Some even participate secretly in the pedophile and occult undergrounds, most notably a couple of Los Angeles writers who have written the only two book available on McMartin, taking mental health professionals, police, the press and prosecutors to task for pursuing false allegations of abuse.

The Politics of Child Abuse, by Paul and Shirley Eberle, purports to be something of a definitive investigation. A blurb for the book exults: "This has got to be one of the most devastating political detective stories of all time. The authors smashed open the child abuse witch-hunt so everyone can see it for what it is—the way it really happened, and why. Here is the amazing story, starting with the first spectacular accusations, the marathon pre-trial hearing, the endless series of false accusations."

Since the Eberles' first McMartin book appeared in 1986, they have achieved national status as child abuse experts. In courts of law their work is frequently cited, and they lecture widely to receptive audiences. The Eberles once appeared as featured speakers at a conference held by Victims of Child Abuse Laws (VOCAL), an organization that feted The Politics of Child Abuse as positively revelatory.

But Paul and Shirley Eberle can hardly be considered credible reporters. Blurbs in their own pornographic tabloid, L.A. Star, failed to mention that in the 1970s the authors once ran an underground tabloid for pedophiles in Los Angeles, Finger, which delved heavily into sadomasochistic sex, sex with children and sex acts involving human excrement. Finger contained sexual drawings by children and pedophile erotica, including "My First Rape," "She was Only Thirteen," "Sexpot at Five," and "What Happens when Niggers Adopt White Children." One issue featured a cover photo of two naked adults reclining amid a pile of inflated dolls. A letter to Finger declaimed: "I'm a pedophile and I think it's great a man is having sex with his daughter.... Would like to see pics of nude girls making it with their daddy, but realize it's too risky to print."

The book's publisher, Carole Stuart of Lyle Stuart & Co., told Ms. magazine that the Eberles have been "friends of the family for years."

In The Politics of Child Abuse, the Eberles claimed that since the McMartin arrests, "we have been barraged with hundreds of sexual abuse cases, in which many people have been sent to prison for staggeringly long terms on little or no evidence." That the Eberles themselves remain at large would seem to contradict the notion that child abuse laws are stringently over-enforced.

The Eberles attempt to portray every abuser as a victim of the justice system:

> We believe that every molestation case in which there has been a conviction should be reopened and reviewed. There is convincing evidence that innocent people have been imprisoned, that naive juries and judges were unable to believe the defendants would be brought to trial if no crime had occurred, > and defense attorneys have not been allowed to bring all the pertinent facts before the public.

Los Angeles attorney Sally Dichter, in a book review, argued that the Eberles have "nothing to offer to any discipline." The book, she lamented, "is an attempt to vindicate every individual who has been convicted of child abuse." Considering their credentials as child pornographers, of course the Eberles, as Dichter discovered, believe "every molestation case in which there has been a conviction should be reopened and reviewed." Dichter found this point of view unbelievable: "The Eberles seem intent on convincing the reader that child abuse never occurs."

The authors' "skepticism" of ritual child abuse is shared by Gerald Larue, professor emeritus of Biblical history and archeology at the University of Southern California. Larue is one of the principals behind the Noah's Ark hoax, which culminated in February 1993 with a two-hour CBS prime-time special, "The Incredible Discovery of Noah's Ark," billed by CBS as a documentary. Scholars immediately denounced it. The network refused to retract.

Satanism in America, a book that Larue co-wrote, attributed the McMartin case to a "satanic panic" incited by wild-eyed "religious fanatics, opportunists and emotionally unstable survivors whose stories simply are not to be believed"—an agonizing irony given Larue's instigation of the Noah's Ark hoax. He argues that the "child abuse hysteria sweeping the country is being fueled by people for whom facts have no meaning. They invent 'facts.'"

Langley Connections and the Rise of the Child Abuse Backlash

Another "expert" who has dismissed McMartin as a classic witch-hunt is Dr. Douglas Besherov, once the director of the National Center on Child Abuse and Neglect. He is also a director of the rabidly right-wing American Enterprise Institute, a Washington D.C. think tank.

To supplement his weighty credentials, Besherov writes for academic social and political quarterlies with long histories of collaborating with the CIA for propaganda purposes. He is a coeval of Irving Kristol, a veteran CIA psychological warfare specialist. In 1976, the Congressional Church Committee hearings revealed that the CIA is deeply entrenched in the American press. Some 400 journalists, it emerged at the hearings, had collaborated with the Agency at least once. CIA propagandists like Besherov and Kristol provide others in the field with a scholastic support base, and mold opinion on campus with such CIA-anchored academic journals as Encounter and The Public Interest, both edited by neo-con Kristol.

In 1986, Public Interest published a monograph by Dr. Besherov entitled "Unfounded Allegations—A New Child Abuse Problem." Besherov opens with the observation of legal scholar Sanford Katz that "the maltreatment of children is as old as recorded history. Infanticide, ritual sacrifice, exposure, mutilation, abandonment, brutal discipline and the near slavery of child labor have existed in all cultures."

Dr. Besherov, left dry-eyed by such conditions, blamed the media and mandatory reporting laws for dragging child abuse out of the closet (where he seems to prefer it) and blowing the severity of the problem out of proportion.

Besherov's influential follow-up article, "Doing Something About Child Abuse: The Need to Narrow the Grounds for State Intervention," was published in 1985 by Irving Kristol and the American Enterprise Institute. In it, Besherov argues that most allegations of child abuse are statistically unfounded. His slipshod use of statistics drove the Child Welfare League of America (CWLA) to publicly find him responsible for leading the public "to believe that child abuse is leveling off or that, as reports increase, the level of substantiation decreases." The CWLA notes that its survey results indicate a "substantial increase in reports," and "a stable rate of confirmation," directly contradicting Besherov's statistical red herring.

Turning to the children removed from their homes by social workers, Besherov states flatly: "According to data collected by the federal government, it appears that up to half of these children were in no immediate danger at home and could have been safely left there."

The government "data" cited by Besherov derive from a study conducted by the National Center on Child Abuse and Neglect. The authors of the study told New York Times reporter David Hechler that "the information is not there" to support Besherov's assertion that half of all abused children left in the custody of their parents are in "no immediate danger."

"He has used our statistics in this case to prove a point when (he) simply can't do it," a Center researcher told Hechler. When asked for his response, the AEI scholar refused to comment.

By fabricating statistics, Besherov reveals himself to be a propagandist.

Have unfounded allegations led to a national McCarthyite frenzy, as Besherov contends? "I'm sure there are false allegations," concedes David Finkelhor, a sociologist specializing in child abuse. "I'm sure when people are caught up in false allegations it's terrible." But in criminal cases of all kinds, "there's always the possibility of false allegations, and I don't think they're more severe in the area of child abuse that they are in—I want to say something innocuous—people making false allegations about having had money stolen from them, or false allegations of embezzlement."

Besherov's work has given rise to such hysteria-producing diatribes as "False Accusations of Child Abuse: Could it Happen to You?" (Women's Day, July 8, 1986), and "Invasion of the Child Savers: No One is Safe in the War Against Abuse" (Progressive, September, 1985)—both are adventures in hyperbole, like Besherov's cooked statistics.

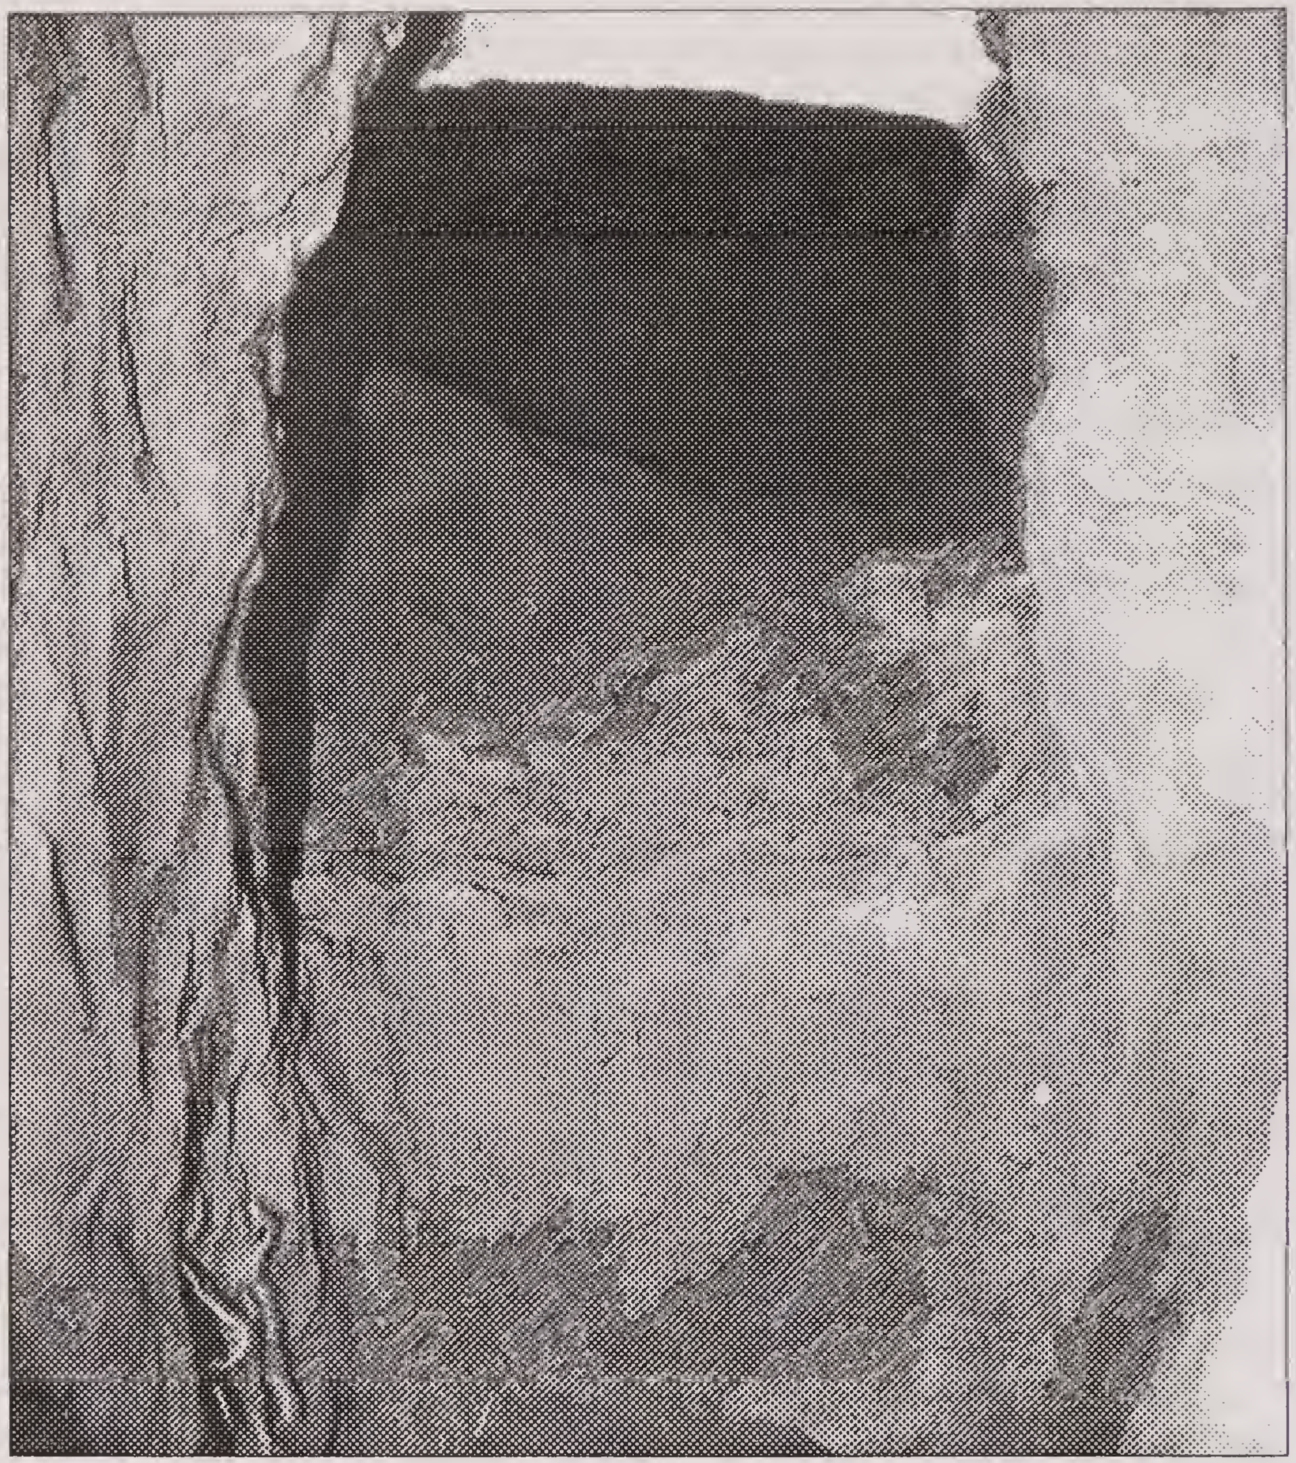
"Family abuse," by A.C. Carlson, another protégé of Irving Kristol. appeared in Reason magazine, a publication that frequently runs CIA disinformation. Hechler writes that Carlson has gone "even further than Besherov, inflating the unfounded rate beyond belief." Erroneously, in fact, Carlson laments that "the victims pile up," like corpses on a pyre, and commiserates needlessly with "the sky-rocketing number of parents and teachers falsely accused of child abuse."

Ritual abuse "skeptics" with CIA connections are covering up the latest phase in Agency-sponsored mind control experimentation. For thirty years Agency scientists have collaborated with cults (many of them founded by the government) to conceal the development of mind control technology. Jim Jones and the People's Temple were one product of the alliance. McMartin was another. Both episodes have been buried in disinformation. The campaign to mislead the public about ritual abuse is ambitious, rivaling the campaign to conceal the facts in the murder of John F. Kennedy.

The smokescreen is also explained in part by reports implicating the CIA in child prostitution for the purposes of political blackmail—a variation on the age-old sex trap. CIA agents have been directly involved in organized child sex rings. In Enslaved (1991), an investigation of the worldwide slavery underground, Gordon Thomas found Agency participation in the kidnap of Latin American children "flown across the border in light aircraft, and sold to child sex rings, or sold so their organs could be used in transplants." Some of the pilots, Thomas discovered, "made two or three flights a day. The more experienced used Beech 18s because of the aircraft's capacity and maneuverability. The majority of the fliers were mercenaries who had flown for the CIA."

Ray Buckey's father, Charles, worked for Hughes Aircraft. There is an old adage that holds "Hughes is the CIA." Charles Buckey built the McMartin Preschool. The tunnels unearthed beneath the preschool were dug in 1966—the year the school was built.

Buckey Sr. testified on the stand that there were no tunnels. The media have been completely silent on this score, which brings us to....



This arch was pounded through a concrete footing in the foundation beneath the McMartin Preschool. Best estimates date the digging of the tunnels to circa 1966, the year the preschool was built by Charles Buckey, father of the key defendent. Photo: Dr. Roland Summit

The Tunnel Cover-Up

El Paso reporter Debbie Nathan, utterly convinced of the defendants' innocence, entered the fray in The Village Voice, and has appeared in newspapers across the country, including The L.A. Weekly, Sacramento Bee, San Francisco Chronicle, and elsewhere. She has been honored with the Free Press Association's H. L. Mencken Award, and Northwestern University's Medill School of Journalism prize.

She is a leading proponent of the "mass hysteria" thesis, the notion that many child abuse allegations are "unfounded." Her cavalier dismissal is not supported by objective research. Dr. David Chadwick of San Diego's Childrens' Hospital, in the Journal of the American Medical Association (May 26, 1989), contends that 8% of all abuse allegations are unfounded, at most, and are "rather easily distinguishable in a careful review."

At times it is difficult to tell whether Nathan is a "skeptic" or an apologist of sexual abuse. "Most pedophilia," she contends, "consists of caressing and fondling. For most children, these experiences appear to be at best confusing, at worst traumatic. But others seem to willingly participate, and some adults recall that while still legally minors they accepted, even welcomed, sex with grown-ups."

Nathan doesn't condemn the abuser. After all, "compared to the abuses of a child protection movement gone mad, could incest be any worse?"

Alex Cockburn is a Nathan supporter, and has on occasion gotten caught up in her pro-pedophilic obfuscations, as in this diatribe from The Nation for March 8, 1993:

> As a Miami-based anthropologist, Rafael Martinez, consultant to the Dade County Medical Examiner's Office, told Nathan, in traditional Latin American cultures "kissing and hugging is common with children up to three or four years old." It is common for females to kiss children all over the place—including on the genitals.

The practice of kissing children on the genitals may be traditional in some cultures, but it is frowned upon by the Manhattan Beach preschool licensing board.

Alex Cockburn's skepticism toward ritual abuse was summed up in an editorial appearing in the February 8, 1990 Wall Street Journal, "The McMartin Case: Indict the Children, Jail the Parents." The son of a British spy, and a loquacious defender of the Warren Commission, Cockburn has such strong feelings about the McMartin case that he once publicly maligned an editor of the L.A. Weekly for refusing to print a recommendation that "the tots bearing false witness in the McMartin preschool case be jailed for perjury."

His primary source on the subject of child abuse, Debbie Nathan, is herself something of a false witness. In "What McMartin Started: The Ritual Abuse Hoax" (Village Voice, June 12, 1990), Ms. Nathan moaned that "children at McMartin told of being molested in tunnels under the school. None were ever found, but until recently parents were still digging."

In fact, 30 days before Nathan's article appeared, the tunnels were discovered beneath the preschool by scientists hired by the parents, confirming the testimony of the children. The project employed a team of archeologists from local universities, two geologists, a professional excavator, a carbon-dating specialist and a professional photographer to document the dig's progress and findings.

The longest tunnel was six feet beneath the preschool, running eastward 45 feet from the southwest wall, and ten feet along the north wall. The tunnel walls were held in place by support beams and a roof of plywood and tarpaper. A branch of the tunnel led to a nine-foot chamber (the "secret room" described by the children?). Another extended from the preschool to the triplex next door, surfacing beneath a roll-away bathtub. Forensic tests on thousands of objects found at the site—including two hundred animal bones—were conducted.

Until the tunnels were found, the L.A. Times covered the dig—with a smirk. The parents and scientists involved were portrayed as crack-pots until the existence of the tunnels was substantiated by experts, at which time the newspaper abruptly stopped reporting the story. The public was left with the false impression that the search had failed.

Critics of the excavation pointed out that District Attorney Ira Reiner had already searched for tunnels. At best, this is a half-truth. Reiner's team tore up a bit of floor tile, but did not even bother to remove the glue that held it in place. The D.A.'s team, as it happens, dug up the lot next to the preschool, not underneath.

"Actually," McMartin mother Jackie MacGauley, who supervised the excavation, notes, "we were the first to dig on the property." The search for the tunnels was undertaken with ground-penetrating radar to probe for inconsistencies in the soil. A bell-shaped area of disturbed earth was discovered along the foundation of the west wall.

The tunnel beneath the opposite wall was unearthed (precisely where the children said it would be found all along) beneath the foundation. A passage had been knocked through the concrete. "It was interesting," MacGauley told L.A.'s Pacifica Radio, "because a lot of the child development specialists, psychiatrists and therapists across the country thought that it was some psychological phenomenon that the kids would talk about tunnels. Somehow that idea got 'planted,' and they had all these theories as to why all the kids would talk about something like this. It obviously couldn't be true. And the district attorney at the time just flatly did not believe it, and really didn't want to look."

Neither did the press.

A Cottage Industry of Child Abuse Debunkers

MODERN WITCH-HUNT—CHILD ABUSE CHARGES

bawled a Wall Street Journal editorial for February 22, 1993. But the tone of the column was dry and high-toned. Dr. Richard Gardner, professor of clinical psychiatry at Columbia University, cautioned that "a great wave of hysteria" had gripped the country.

In the early 90s, the mass hysteria premise was touted by big city newspapers and magazines of elite stature, all attempting to persuade—with evident bias and inflated "expert" opinion—that false child abuse charges were endemic. This school of disinformation coaxed public opinion with dire exhortations of a child abuse witch-hunt.

In his Wall Street Journal comments, Dr. Gardner warned of a great wave of hysteria, "by far the worst" in history, the most devastating "with regard to the number of lives that have been destroyed and families that have been disintegrated."

Gardner's basic argument is that allegations of child abuse are often fabricated by parents embroiled in custody disputes—another explanation not supported by statistics, the ones Gardner ignores. One study found that a mere two percent of all abuse accusations stem from visitation and custody disputes. (Other researchers have placed the percentage slightly higher.)

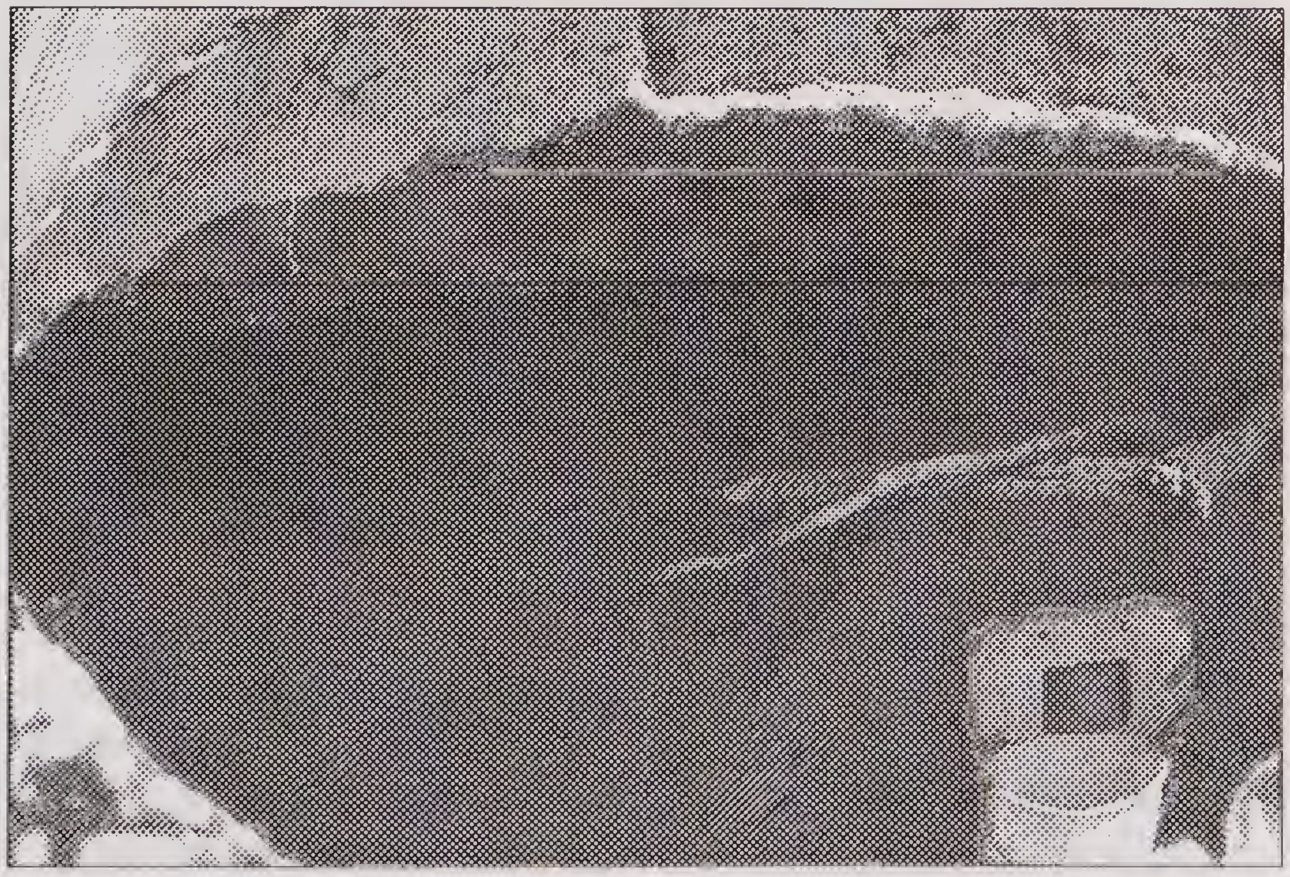
As for "mass hysteria," one of the earliest promoters of this thesis was Ralph Underwager, co-author with his wife, Hollida Wakefield, of Accusations of Child Sexual Abuse. "Few physicians will wish to invest the time and money ($70) to own or even read this book," complained a reviewer for the Journal of the American Medical Association. "It is of little value to those who work with abused children except as it may be important to be aware of all points of view. The book will be doubtless be useful to attorneys defending persons accused of sexual abuse of children. It appears to have been written particularly for that audience.... The authors cite over 700 references, but they do not really review this body of literature. When a given reference fails to support their viewpoint, they simply misstate the conclusion."

Since 1974, Dr. Underwager has been the director of the Institute for Psychological Therapies in Northfield, Minnesota. He has since been frequently called upon to provide expert testimony—in the late 80s he spent 60-70% of his professional life shuttling between courtrooms. He is the author of numerous articles debunking the credibility of ritual abuse victims. Dr. Underwager has frequently been cited by Debbie Nathan as a leading authority on the subject. Lisa Manshel, author of Nap Time, an account of the New Jersey ritual abuse case, found that "child sexual abuse was not his field of knowledge," but "it was his field of courtroom practice." He proliferated the opinion, 'No one knows how to tell accurately whether a child's been abused' throughout the nation's courts. He has testified in most states, and by satellite in foreign countries, before at least 200 juries.

Dr. Underwager once stated on the stand that he considered it "more desirable that a thousand children in abuse situations are not discovered than for one innocent person to be convicted wrongly."

Dr. Underwager, a founder of the False Memory Syndrome Foundation, is an ordained Lutheran minister. He believes, he once said in an interview appearing in an Amsterdam journal for pedophiles, that sex with children is not only acceptable, but "God's will."

> Q: Is choosing pedophilia for you a responsible choice for the individual?
> Underwager: Certainly it is responsible. What I have been struck by as I have come to know more about and understand people who choose pedophilia is that they let themselves be too much defined by other people. That is usually an essential negative definition. Pedophiles spend a lot of time and energy defending their choice. I don't think a pedophile needs to do that.



An outside entrance to the tunnels beneath the preschool partially filled in with soil foreign to the site.

Underwager insisted that pedophiles "should attack the concept, the image, the picture of the pedophile as an evil, wicked and reprehensible exploiter of children." Following the interview, Underwager was forced to resign as a founding member of the False Memory Syndrome Foundation (which is largely directed by CIA psychiatrists with backgrounds in mind control experimentation).

The London Observer for December 12, 1993 reported that Dr. Underwager denied ever condoning sex with children. He added, however, that "scientific evidence" had demonstrated that "60 percent of women sexually abused as children reported that the experience was good for them." He contended the same could be true for boys involved with pedophiles.

The Descent of Mann

In a five-part series that appeared after the hung jury verdict of Ray Buckey's first trial, Los Angeles Times reporter David Shaw found that the newspaper's research files explained little of "the crucial behind-the-scenes role played by screenwriter Abby Mann." Mann's writing staff and circle of disinformationists have shaped public opinion on the McMartin case.

Noel Greenwood, an L.A. Times editor, has described the wall of pro-Buckey PR thrown up by Mann and friends as "a mean, malevolent campaign conducted by people… whose motives are highly suspect and who have behaved in a basically dishonest… and dishonorable way."

Abby Mann, is an Oscar recipient for a film about the Nazi war crimes trial, Judgment at Nuremburg (an oxymoron, since there was precious little justice at Nuremburg, a carefully-managed show trial that culminated with the execution of a small clutch of Nazis, minor prison terms for some—and recruitment of thousands of others by the CIA.)

From the beginning, Mann was a vociferous advocate of the McMartin defendants. "We like to think we are different from Salem," Mann sniffed at the resolution of Ray Buckey's first trial. "I don't believe that anything happened at that school."

Abby Mann has worked diligently, largely back-stage, on behalf of The Buckeys. It was Mann who first interested 60 Minutes in the McMartin case. The November 2, 1986 broadcast was decidedly biased in favor of Ray Buckey. Defense attorney Danny Davis characterized the segment as "wholly sympathetic to the defense point of view."

60 Minutes led off with the camera panning a long couch and five of the original defendants. Mike Wallace asked: "Do these women look like child molesters?"

New York Times reporter David Hechler noted "gaping holes in the story. Why were no police or D.A.'s investigators interviewed or even mentioned? And if Ira Reiner believed the case was so weak against the five defendants, why did he wait until the five-month preliminary hearing was completed before dropping the charges? These questions were never asked." The innocence of the defendants was assumed by Wallace and crew as a foregone conclusion, and the charges against them were framed as the aberrations of nattering lunatics.

Most of the 60 Minutes segment on McMartin was taped in Abby Mann's living room.

But heavily-biased media coverage was only one of the strategies quietly enacted by Abby Mann. When Deputy District Attorney Glenn Stevens was caught leaking information on the prosecution's case to Mann, he was forced to resign. No charges were brought against him.

From the Los Angeles Times:

> Gaining the confidence of the McMartin defendants, the Manns were ultimately hired as "investigators" for the defense. That and their earlier alliance with former prosecutor Glenn Stevens sparked charges from parents of alleged child molestation victims of a conspiracy to obstruct justice for monetary gain.

After Los Angeles Times reporter Bob Williams met Abby Mann, he wrote a flurry of memos charging the coverage of Lois Timnick, the paper's reporter on the McMartin beat, with extreme bias favoring the prosecution. The accusation was investigated by Noel Greenwood, the regional news editor at the Times. Greenwood concluded that it was Williams who'd acted with extreme bias, not Timnick. Greenwood's memos state that Williams' memos were "reckless and irresponsible." Williams had "undermined a fellow reporter and seriously harmed the credibility and effectiveness of the Times."

Williams was temporarily suspended without pay. Shortly thereafter, he went to work for Abby Mann.

Williams surfaced next as a consultant to Mary Fischer, whose "A Case of Dominoes" in Los Angeles magazine drew upon the argument (first postulated by the child pornographers Paul and Shirley Eberle), that former District Attorney Robert Philobosian initiated the McMartin prosecution for political gain.

Fischer once admitted to the late Wayne Satz, the KABC television reporter who broke the McMartin story, that she wrote the article under the direction of Abby Mann.

"There was never any case at all," Fischer wrote with absolute certainty. "At the very least, it is a blueprint for preying on public fears." Fischer has gone so far as to claim that therapists, parents and children attending McMartin masterminded a "conspiracy" to harass and imprison innocent people. When pressed on one occasion by Carole Hemingway, a Los Angeles talk show host, Fischer was unable to offer supporting evidence of conspiracy (as McMartin parents did), nor could she explain the motives of the conspirators.

Fischer did her utmost to dismiss the medical evidence that molestation took place at the preschool. In October, 1988 the Los Angeles Times reported that medical examiners of the original 13 children scheduled to testify found "scars, tears, enlarged body openings or other evidence indicating blunt force trauma consistent with the repeated sodomy and rape they described."

One of the children bled from the anus. Some contracted venereal infections.

Yet Fischer found relevant the findings of a Fresno pediatrician who refused to testify at the first McMartin trial. The 1987 study, summarized by Fischer, concluded that "any kind of irritation—not just sexual abuse—may damage children's genitals." This reader, at least, was left to ponder forms of "irritation" that might leave the McMartin children with chlamydia, confirmed by medical examinations and difficult to explain away.

Fischer's follow-up McMartin story in Los Angeles for October, 1993 opined that a "hysterical tone" in press reports on McMartin was established by Wayne Satz, who died of heart failure in 1992, "causing some to speculate it was karma," wrote Fischer, an ersatz and mean-spirited elegy.

"I still don't know how anyone could believe all that bull," Virginia McMartin told her. "Especially with a school as wide open as ours and people coming and going at all times. Or who could actually believe there were tunnels." (The archeological team that led the excavation—ignored by Fischer—could have given her a guided tour.) "It shows the power of the media."

Apparently Abby Mann has a need for Ms. Fischer and the other writers in his employ. A best-selling Hollywood biographer (speaking on condition of anonymity) offers this insight into the career of Abby Mann. "He's incapable of writing scripts himself. It's true," he said, "he can't write. Abby keeps a fairly large stable of ghost writers to produce scripts in his name."

Who is Abby Mann? Mae Brussell, the late Carmel-based political researcher, speculated in a November, 1987 radio broadcast that Mann is a covert operator posing as a Hollywood progressive, plying extensive media connections to influence public opinion. Mann's behind-the-scenes manipulations, ghosts and an exhaustive supply of funds and press contacts support the hypothesis that Abby Mann is a media mole.

Indictment, yet another disinformation effort supposedly written by Abby and Myra Mann, premiered on May 20, 1995 on HBO. The movie was produced by Oliver Stone. As a political researcher, I had taken more than a passing interest in Stone's film JFK, and couldn't help but note that the media assault on Stone bore a resemblance to Mann's campaign to discredit the McMartin children. The day after an announcement of the "secret" project already underway appeared in Variety, I contacted Stone's office and spoke with Jean Marie Burke, a researcher for Ixtlan Productions, Stone's company in Santa Monica. I informed Ms. Burke that much of the information about McMartin in the corporate media was disingenuous, beginning with the Eberles.

She brightened up. "Oh, the Eberles—I have their books right here!" She went silent when I told her that Paul and Shirley Eberle were child pornographers. I sent her a package of accurate information on the case by certified mail, then contacted her boss with a letter informing him simply that he had hold of a bad project, which had already been shot and was in the editing stage. Stone wrote back, asking me to clarify. My response follows:

> Mr. Stone:
> McMartin is poorly understood by most people because a disinformation gambit is afoot to discredit the childrens' testimony—a fusillade, in fact, similar to the one you were treated to after JFK. You asked me to clarify my objections.
>
> Consider how difficult it was to sort through and communicate the multitude of facts relevant to the killing of John Kennedy. And then recall how a carefully-conceived film on the assassination can be explained away with a glib "no evidence" from an Edward Epstein or Dan Rather. This is the problem I'm up against with McMartin. There is a complex story behind the abuse—it involves CIA mind control experiments, and this is largely what the plants in the establishment press, and fronts like the False Memory Syndrome Foundation, are concealing. (Nine out of ten psychiatrists in both the U.S. and Great Britain from large samplings believe ritual abuse to be a very real social problem. But the media inevitably talks only to the one of ten who deny, and many of those are experimental scientists on the CIA payroll.) You now find yourself on the same side (of the McMartin argument) as Alex Cockburn, you recall the knock-down-drag-out Nation debate with a leading progressive who rejects key crimes of government (including the Kennedy assassination, for high-toned, but ultimately silly reasons), Newsweek, etc. That alone should make you uncomfortable in the extreme.
> One of your researchers brightened up when I mentioned the only two books available on McMartin, both written by Paul and Shirley Eberle. She knew those books inside out. The problem is the Eberles published child pornography in the 1970s—garishly packaged in an underground rag called Finger—featuring adults having sex with children, children with excrement smeared on them, children in lewd positions and posing provocatively. This ludicrous pedophile sheet ran stories with such unsavory testimonials as "She was Only Thirteen," "What Happens when Niggers Adopt White Children," "My First Rape," and so on. Don't bother to read the McMartin books, if you haven't already. Each page is full of factual errors and conscious distortions. Your movie will perpetuate the Eberles' disinformation. But the LA Times will love it. (Buffy Chandler told a source of mine, in a moment of rage at her family, that her parents (the owners of the L.A. Times) funded weird genetic experiments years ago. This is no more bizarre than some of the things done in pre-schools around the country, and may explain the newspaper's change of attitude after the initial reporting.)

But Noel Greenwood, a Times editor, knew what he was talking about when he said there is a "mean-spirited campaign" in play to slant the truth about McMartin.

Abby Mann is a key proponent. His attorney threatened to sue if I didn't retract my comments when an early version of my research appeared several years ago. I did not retract. In fact, the newspaper, Random Lengths in Long Beach, backed me. Others appearing in the story threatened me. They did not sue. Why not? They made such a noise. Now they are the sources of your movie, still making noise about "innocence abused," and it's hollow.

They contend there is no evidence that children were abused at McMartin. On the contrary, there is an abundance of evidence. But the DA had no real intention of gathering it. Neither did the press. Same as JFK, eh?

The CIA connection to cults around the country began in 1963. The story was told by a Berkeley psychologist in a thesis entitled "The Penal Colony," which was presented at a psychiatric conference in San Francisco by Congressional aide Joe Holsinger after Leo Ryan was killed at Jonestown. The hybrid was conceived because people were asking questions about experiments at McGill, the University of Pennsylvania, John Hopkins, UCLA, Honeywell, and other haunts of the CIA's MKULTRA mind control fraternity. Jonestown was one product of the association. Another, more recent example was the Solar Temple killings in Switzerland. The British press reported that this cult was running arms to Australia and South America, and laundering the proceeds at BCCI. The American press couldn't find this information. What does this tell you?

Buckey Sr. testified that he did not have tunnels dug beneath the preschool. Why would anyone do that? Five scientists have > put their reputations on the line to confirm that there are tunnels. One, a carbon-dating specialist, opined that the tunnels were excavated in 1966. That was the year the preschool was built. It was built by Charles Buckey. He lied on the stand. The kids gave fairly accurate descriptions of the tunnels. Did Abby?

> Regards,
> Alex Constantine

Despite this protest, and threats of a boycott of HBO from children's advocacy groups around the country, Indictment aired anyway. The movie simply reinforces the many misconceptions the public has been force-fed since Abby Mann became involved in the case.

The Most Hated Man at the L.A. Times

In January, 1990, after the anti-climactic, deadlocked verdict of the second trial, the Los Angeles Times ran a four-part series by media critic David Shaw, trashing the paper's own coverage of the McMartin case. Shaw described press coverage as a "media feeding frenzy" ranking with exposes of Gary Hart, Oliver North and Dan Quayle.

"More than most big stories," Shaw explained, "McMartin at times exposed basic flaws in the way the contemporary news organizations function. Pack journalism. Laziness. Superficiality." Daily newspaper coverage, he argued, was contaminated by "cozy relationships with prosecutors," and a competitive furor "that sends reporters off in a frantic search to be the first with the latest shocking alllegation."

Shaw's McMartin series won the Times its 18th Pulitzer, but few reporters attended the champagne party thrown in his honor. "Most people don't like him," Times staffer Lee Dye told a reporter for Los Angeles magazine. "He really is disliked at the Times," said restaurant critic Ruth Reichl. Bill Boyarsky, another staffer, says "everyone around me hates him."

The harshest opinion of Shaw came from the late Glenn Binford, the paper's late night editor at the city desk, who refers to Shaw as "an oily little prick." The nickname stuck. "Even the late Dial Torgerson," reported Los Angeles, "a droll, dry-witted newsman's newsman ... adopted the moniker, though it was uncharacteristic of Torgerson to disparage anyone."

Reporters for the "Metro" section particularly harbor a keen disdain for David Shaw.

Why is so much animosity directed his way? Most of Shaw's colleagues at the Times feel that he receives special treatment. He is contracted to write a mere four stories a year. He moonlights as the monthly "Dining Out" columnist for GQ magazine. As the official ombudsman of the Times, one reporter complains, "Shaw plays favorites and purposefully ducks anything that may really irritate his superiors, tending instead to aim at those with no actual power."

Two of his primary targets were staff writer Lois Timnick and Cathleen Decker, whose McMartin coverage was hardly "frantic" or "superficial." Shaw's depiction of them as reportorial McCarthyites is not borne out by a review of the newspaper's McMartin coverage, and the air around Times Mirror Square has, since his series appeared, been thick with acrimony.

A week before Shaw received the Pultizer, Timnick (who has since stopped talking to him) threatened to organize an office "suicide party" if he won. When he did walk away with an award, the Pulitzer committee stated that it was given to Shaw not on the merits of his writing, but because the Times permitted him to criticize the paper's own coverage of a landmark trial.

Shaw was born on an Air Force base in Dayton, Ohio. He was educated at Pepperdine and UCLA. His career took off when, as a reporter for the Long Beach Independent Press-Telegram, he published a scalding investigative story on Max Rafferty, the Republican opponent of Alan Cranston for a Senate seat. Shaw's five-part series killed Rafferty's political prospects with allegations of draft dodging. Shaw received an award from the Los Angeles Press Club for the story and a job offer from the Times.

That was 19 years ago. He was informally assigned to "the sex beat." Shaw plied his investigative skills with titillating exposes of massage parlors and strip clubs. His piece on a nightspot featuring live sex with a dog threw the newsroom into turmoil—this is the same commentator who later dismissed most press coverage of McMartin as "sensational" and "superficial."

Shaw defines himself publicly as a "liberal," but he frequently expresses right-wing sentiments, and his writing can be fairly summed up as propagandistic. He chose to write on McMartin, Los Angeles magazine reported, "because he needed an excuse to stay in town. 'My wife was eight months pregnant, and I was looking for a story that would keep me in L.A. so I would be here for the birth."

"Experts" on the McMartin debacle—Shaw, the Eberles, Dr. Underwager, Abby Mann and others—have, in violation of their own admonitions, retried it in the press. Ray Buckey is supposed to be as innocent as Ceasar's wife. If so, why do Buckey's supporters ignore critical evidence? Why the statistical fabrications? Why lament repeatedly that the case took five years to try when dragging it out was a conscious defense strategy? Why ignore the tunnels and the bones?

And, most troubling off all, why has so much effort been put into propagating mass deception on Buckey's behalf?

Chapter Five

"What is that Odor?"

Mystery Fumes, the Poisoning of the Los Angeles County Commission for Women's Ritual Abuse Task Force & the Los Angeles Times

Introduction: Cults, Chemo-Terrorism and the CIA

After the deadly March 1995 subway gassing in Japan, 1200 police and military troops raided the "sixth santium" of Aum Shinri Kyo, one of the country's 17,000 religious cults, in the shadow of Mount Fuji. Sporting chemical gear, they cut their way into the Kamikuishiki warehouse with circular saws and oxyacetylene torches. On the first floor, police stumbled upon a "Perfect Salvation Initiation," a yogic ritual that employed electrical skull caps to deliver four-to ten-volt shocks to the novitiate in an attempt to open his chakras, the body's centers of spiritual energy. Among the healing rites practiced by the sect was the imbibing and vomiting of whole gallons of water, electric jolts and the "Christ Initiation," an arduous regimen of enemas and scalding hot baths.

Former members of the sect, according to a Los Angeles Times report, "paint a chilling picture of psychological indoctrination… sleep deprivation, mind control techniques and enforced isolation from the outside world. Access to family and friends—even newspapers and TV—is prohibited"[1] The cultists exhibited an alarming degree of mind control. Police freed a screaming woman from a stainless steel pod, and fifty cult members were found sprawled unconscious in a chapel on the second floor, six others in a drug-induced coma.[2]

Police announced that the stockpile of noxious chemicals discovered at the compound was the source of the nerve gas released in a Tokyo subway, killing ten people and injuring 5,000, with 70 in critical condition. Sadly enough, the neurotoxic effect of the gas is likely to be severe. Medical research has shown that acute exposure to toxic levels of sarin (a poison developed at chemical laboratories in Nazi Germany as a war gas) produces prolonged changes in brain function.[3] It was the first use of a chemical warfare agent on a large group of people by a non-military group[4] (though the apocalyptic sect is believed to have had a hand in an unexplained sarin "leak" in the Japanese Alps in 1994 that left eight dead and sickened 212.[5] "Birds dropped from the sky," one abashed correspondent wrote from Tokyo. "Dead dogs and cats lay in the gutters, and dead carp and yabbies floated to the surface of an ornamental pond"[6]).

It was not the first time that a cult has been accused of waging chemical warfare on unsuspecting civilians. In Los Angeles, for example, a series of mysterious attacks on members of the local County Commission for Women's Ritual Abuse Task Force in 1992 led to complaints of nausea, blurred vision, dizziness, headaches and elevated blood pressure. Eight of these cases had been independently confirmed by blood tests—yet, incredibly, Los Angeles Times coverage made light of the victims, blaming the outbreak of symptoms on the fertile imaginations of professional paranoiacs.[7] After all, allegations of abuse at McMartin Preschool in Manhattan Beach had been debunked. The expert opinions of "reputable" academics had shown that organized cult activity in southern California was non-existent, the zaniest of "urban legends." Hadn't they?

Surely the task force was laboring under another bout of cult "hysteria." The Times reassured the community that, once again, a few fevered brains had made monsters where none existed. The newspaper adhered to its position even when Dr. Catherine Gould, chairwoman of the Ritual Abuse Task Force, fired off a letter of rebuttal, pointing out that the allegations were backed up by blood-test reports verifying that members of the group had, contrary to the Times report, been exposed to organophosphate poisons.[8]

The Times did not print the letter. Dr. Gould, a licensed clinical child therapist, countered that she had found it shocking a major metropolitan newspaper would "deliberately bypass the available data in favor of a series of emotional charges which essentially amount to a chorus of 'it couldn't be true.'" She also bemoaned the newspaper's "pattern of biased and inaccurate reporting" on ritual child abuse, a tendency to side with perpetrators of Satanic Ritual Abuse (SRA) and promote the small minority of psychologists—only one out of ten, in fact—who deride recovered memory therapy and have largely succeeded at discrediting therapists who work with children abused by mind control cults.[9]

This small but highly "skeptical" school constitutes the pool of academic psychologists available to defense attorneys. They have received much play in the press, champions of the false memory theory of ritual abuse—though most are not licensed to practice child therapy. Ubiquitous in the media, this circle of academic psychologists includes Drs. Richard Ofshe, Margaret Singer and Elizabeth Loftus of the False Memory Syndrome Foundation, all of whom have made lucrative careers testifying on behalf of accused pedophiles. The therapists who actually treat the young victims are not sought out by reporters. This inequity, biased in favor of the False Memory Brigade, amounts to blanket censorship of all qualified professionals on the subject of ritual abuse. The press has thus become the sole domain of a small minority of defense psychologists.

Lopsided media coverage of ritual abuse amounts to a virulent form of disinformation. The perps and their hired guns in academia have a monopoly on the molding of public opinion. They are not representative, but they are quoted time and again by the press.

Their bona fides are often in CIA mind control experimentation. These include UCLA's Louis Jolyon West (LSD experiments) and Berkeley's Margaret Singer (brainwashing studies), both "experts" on cults. Dr. Ofshe, who turns up constantly in the newspapers to call recovered memory therapy a "quack" science, writes monographs on mind control strongly influenced by Dr. West's academic writing. Dr. Martin Orne, an original board member of the False Memory Syndrome Foundation, studied hypnotic persuasion at the University of Pennsylvania for CIA and Naval Intelligence paymasters.

What the Los Angeles Times neglected to tell its readership is that CIA behavior control scientists and the cults have formed an alliance.

The Agency uses the cults to further the techniques and technology of mind control.[10] In exchange, the CIA provides behind-the-scenes legal assistance and public relations. A perpetrator of ritual abuse, when nabbed, is often treated to friendly press coverage. In contrast, ritually abused children and their therapists have been targetted for harrassment because they threaten perps, cults and the Agency alike with exposure. Competent psychologists are, in the public print, made to appear greedy, incompetent opportunists practicing a medieval science based on quack theories of memory. Stories critical of those in the field of ritual abuse often bear an uncanny resemblance to a CIA disinformation campaign—and that, if the truth be known, is no accident.

Despite public pronouncements to the contrary, the CIA is still very actively engaged in mind control research. Communities around the world have been converted into laboratories. Cults in their midst are led by operatives practiced in the techniques and technology of behavior manipulation.

And media disinformation conceals the work of this mind control fraternity.

How the Times Suppressed the Medical Evidence

"In January of 1992," Dr. Gould recalled in her letter to the Times, "I became aware of a strange pattern of illnesses (affecting) both Los Angeles therapists treating ritual abuse patients, and individuals engaged in support and advocacy work on behalf of ritually abused children and adults." The afflicted complained not only of a general malaise that might be expected to accompany a demanding career, but also of such unusual symptoms as numbness in the face and extremities, blurred vision, muscle tremors and weakness, memory loss and even "incontinence."

The first to complain of symptoms saw a physician, who diagnosed her as suffering from diazinon poisoning. (Diazinon, like the sarin unleashed in Japan, is an organophosphate.[11]) Independently, another member of the task force had a blood test performed at Kaiser Hospital in Los Angeles, and was handed the same diagnosis. A third member of the group, an SRA survivor, was examined at the Glendale Adventist Medical Center and told that she had "organophosphate poisoning." Yet another member, a therapist suffering a constellation of toxic symptoms, bought a pesticide detection kit. She tested samples of food from the kitchen one evening when she discovered that her home had been broken and entered. A half dozen of the food samples proved positive for pesticide poisoning.

The therapist (requesting anonymity) claimed in a letter to the task force, "our home has been broken into several times, even during the day when witnesses were on the property. Neighbors inform us of continual nighttime surveillance. We have been followed several times by a variety of vehicles. On at least three occasions the interior of our home has been splattered with blood, and two birds have mysteriously died."[12]

Concerns were raised at the panel's March, 1992 meeting that some people engaged in helping ritual abuse survivors escape cult influence might be victims of pesticide poisoning. By that time, a number of therapists suffering from symptoms of organophosphate poisoning had contacted their physicians.

Satanic cult survivors on the task force also exhibited symptoms of toxification, including a young woman and incest survivor—referred to here as M—who received the following recorded message from her sister shortly after taking a blood test:

> I talked to mom this morning—she's very upset! She said she had a phone call yesterday about a meeting and that she wanted to tell you that any files, any medical reports that you go or that anyone else goes looking for will not be found, We know what you're up to and you're not going to get away with it. I repeat, anything you look for—medical files, reports—will not be found. Don't do this.... I'm telling you this to beware—you're > treading on thin ice—mom told me to tell you you'd better be careful. You'd better watch who you talk to. Watch what you say, because you're marked and you know that. We know what school (your child) goes to. You'd better be there for him. You'd better watch out for him. Anything can happen. Have a nice day!

Medical reports from clinics across the county vouch for members of the task force who reported toxic effects. Still, the Los Angeles Times took the position that they were suffering paranoid aberrations.

The adamant editors of the Times turned up their noses not only to the medical reports, but also to a number of letters from other therapists of ritually abused children in Los Angeles—they, too, exhibited symptoms of organophosphate poisoning.

One mother of two, after leaving a local cult, contacted Gould's task force in November, 1992 about the Times story: "I was alarmed, since I had all the symptoms last year, as had my children." Another mother wrote to say that in February, 1985 she'd discovered that her youngest daughter had been sexually abused in a day-care center in the San Fernando Valley. Her daughter's intense emotional trauma persisted, though she frequented a therapist for over a year.

Then the toxic siege began...

> In 1988 I started to experience physical problems. I was severely tired much of the time. It felt as if I had been drugged. Soon after that I started to have occurrences of tachycardia (rapid heart beat), headaches, shortness of breath, loss of memory, blurry vision, sweats, and at times I noticed a strange odor in my clothing, not to mention the female problems I was having. Doctors tested me every which way and yet every test was negative. They told me I was suffering from stress. I argued that I felt drugged, that I had some kind of chemical imbalance. They insisted it was stress, and I was referred to various stress programs, given tapes to listen to and forced to leave a very lucrative job. In July 1989, I was put on disability. Today I am considered permanently disabled. Early in 1992 it was suggested to me that I might be a victim of pesticide poisoning. Truth is I didn't believe it. I was afraid my doctor would think I was crazy. I eventually did go to him and asked his opinion. I was surprised at what he told me in a phone conversation the next day. He had consulted with two other doctors, and it was their opinion that I was suffering from chronic pesticide poisoning.[13]

Having amassed a bulky file of medical documentation to establish that members of the task force had been poisoned, Dr. Gould was still reluctant to contact the local press until she'd gathered enough evidence to convince even the most obstinate skeptic. In Los Angeles, the legal victory of Ray Buckey on molestation charges, after a five-year travail of public debate, had prompted a heated backlash against child therapists.

The task force was still collecting medical evidence and discussing possible courses of action when Stephanie Sheppard, a cult survivor, broke ranks and phoned the Times and a local television station to "blow the lid" off the group's "psychotic" belief they'd been poisoned.

Ms. Sheppard's admission was made to therapist David Neswald prior to a meeting of the panel. Dr. Neswald recalls that Sheppard "apparently mistook me for Dr. Papanek and called me out to the hallway to speak privately."[14] The agonizing irony in the confusion of identity is that Dr. Paul Papanek has long been a medical champion for the spraying of technical-grade malathion (an organophosphate and known neurotoxin) in densely-populated Southern California neighborhoods, a practice he commends as safe and effective to rid the region of periodic medfly infestation, despite growing evidence that the insecticide has adverse, often severe effects on human health.

A mother of two, referred to here as N.R., once sought advice from the task force when she suspected her two daughters had been abused. She struggled with an undiagnosed illness for a year before it occurred to her that the cause might be toxification. She phoned the task force office and was referred to Stephanie Sheppard, then acting as "contact person" on questions concerning poisons. Sheppard, the woman complained, "proceeded to question me at length," and gave several "lectures about how all of these symptoms I was having could be from other causes, including 'getting old' (I am forty)." N.R. became "very suspicious of her intentions and did not wish to talk to her again."[15]

After a routine blood test, Ms. R.'s doctor received not one, but three phone calls from Stephanie Sheppard. She asked how the tests had come out, and informed him that she seriously doubted anyone on the task force had been poisoned. When Stephanie rang N.R., "I told her that I had found out that she had called my doctor and that I was very angry. Her voice took on a tone that was obviously aimed at shaming me for questioning her. I told her in a strong voice not to call again and I hung up." Alarmed, she called the clinic, only to discover that Stephanie had called there repeatedly for a copy of the blood test results. (As it happens, the test proved negative. This means little, though, because Mrs. R. learned later that it was a test capable of detecting only high levels of toxicity from recent exposure.)

Ms. R. complained to the task force that her doctor had "no experience with ritual abuse. Now she certainly has a first-hand experience of cult attempts to sabotage all exposure of their violent harassment techniques. I am totally outraged." She characterized Stephanie Sheppard's intrusions as "a total red alert" to "infiltration."

But the quickest cuts, the harshest treacheries, were yet to come—from the Los Angeles Times.

British journalist Piers Brendon, in The Life and Death of the Press Barons, found in the course of researching the book in 1983 that "as an integral part of the country's power structure, the Times tends to overlook its public responsibilities."[16] But then, dodging responsibility is something of a tradition in the press, Brendon observed: "The First Amendment was drafted on the understanding that newspapers would be voices crying in the wilderness. It did not matter how raucous or even how deceitful they were."

The very paragon of this principle is the Los Angeles Times.

Catherine Gould is cautious of the press. She and other therapists working with ritual abuse victims have been repeatedly besmirched for shattering the spell of public denial woven by the media around any mention of ritual child abuse or cult mind control.

"We considered it too early to make any kind of definitive determination about the nature or extent of the poisonings," Dr. Gould says, "and had in no way thought to publicize our concerns at this time." She was still collecting medical reports when the Times came a-calling.

A cursory treatment of the story was written up by staff reporter Aaron Curtiss and appeared on December 1, 1992. It was founded solely on allegations, not hard evidence. Curtiss promised the group a follow-up story based on the medical data they'd collected. Gould agreed to give him the blood test results.

But the Times pulled a switch. Curtiss phoned Gould to say he'd been pulled off the story. It was instead assigned to John Johnson, the author of an earlier, heavily-biased pooh-poohing of ritual abuse that appeared in the Times on April 23, 1992.[17] Dr. Gould was still aching with resentment at the paper for printing Johnson's condescending denial of underground cult activity in Los Angeles. Gould told Curtiss that she saw no purpose in working with Johnson. Curtiss passed on Gould's concerns to his editor.

Stephanie Sheppard

The next day Curtiss called to say that his editor had agreed that Gould could give the medical reports to the Times and expect fair treatment. He assured her that the information would be accurately reflected in the story written by Johnson. Thus assuaged, she turned over the medical reports.

Quite suddenly, without explanation, Curtiss went incommunicado. Gould phoned the Times repeatedly over the next ten days—Curtiss refused to either take or return her calls. Gould had a cold sensation in the pit of her stomach that the paper would cover up the poisonings.

"I was appalled," Gould later wrote to editors of the Times, "when the article appeared on the front page of the 'Metro' section with none of the available data included. The article represents a breach of ethics on the part of John Johnson and the Los Angeles Times, and a breach of promise made by a staff member."

The Times story that appeared on December 13, 1992 glossed over the medical evidence entirely, depicting the task force as a collection of paranoiacs who "claimed they are slowly being poisoned by those who want to silence them." The paper noted that there were "43 reported victims of the alleged poisoning," but "so far, there is no proof that anyone was poi-

long discussion

The first task force member to report toxic symptoms, a therapist, consulted her physician and discovered that she was suffering "Diazinon posioning (Insecticide)." Diazinon is classed as an organophosphate toxin. The doctor's notes mention a "long discussion regarding cults." The treatment, prescribed here, atropine, is used to counter the effects of chemical warfare agents.

soned and skeptics abound." Johnson cited as an example Paul J. Papanek, chief of the county's toxins epidemiological program and the most reviled public official in Los Angeles County—the very "authority" who has repeatedly sanctioned malathion spraying in Southern California despite overwhelming medical data, a multitude of case histories, and strident city hall testimony indicating that the pesticide is harmful to humans.

Dr. Papanek "attended a recent task force meeting and branded as 'outrageous' the poisoning claims." He sharply faulted the commission for not attending to "common sense rules of evidence." On the heels of this "controversy," nameless authorities had "begun an investigation into the activities of therapists and an acupuncturist linked to the poisoning claims by task force members."

Other "skeptics" were "turning up the heat for answers." Johnson reported, among them Tom O'Connor, executive director of the Board of Psychology. "Are they diagnosing diazinon poisoning?" O'Connor asked. "That's beyond the scope of their license. This sounds like some sort of mass hysteria."

Another categorical denial came from Stephanie Sheppard, who "said she checked out the claims of pesticide poisoning and found no facts to back up the allegations."

The Times had only to cite the medical reports supplied by Catherine Gould to silence these critics of the task force. The spurning of the blood tests reduced the story to a transparent smear, probably to discredit Gould and other therapists treating victims of ritual abuse. The deliberate distortions of most news reports on cult conditioning of children inspired San Francisco therapists Bruce and Dale McCulley, at the Seventh International Conference on Multiple Personality in Chicago in 1990, to object in a paper entitled "Disinformation, Media Manipulation & Public Perception" that "media misreporting of ritual abuse blurs public perception of the issue, and contributes to the continued vulnerability of children to this most heinous form of abuse.... If there is anything more bizarre than the atrocities revealed by ritual abuse victims, it is the ludicrous explanations advanced by the professional disinformationists."

More "Mass Hysteria" & the Magical Mystery Fumes Molecule

The abysmal ethics of the Times in its handling of the task force poisonings extended to the paper's reports on a related story, the logic-defying "Mystery Fumes" case in Riverside, California. The half-dozen accounts of the case published by the newspaper were the exclusive domain of staff writer Tom Gorman.

In February, 1994 six emergency room attendants at Riverside

Hospital fainted after inhaling an "ammonia-like" odor discharged by the blood of Gloria Ramirez after drawing a sample with a syringe. "In the ensuing confusion," Gorman reported, "two people unaffected by the fumes tended to her as she went into full cardiac arrest. Within minutes, the 31-year-old woman—suffering from cervical cancer and weakened by nausea—died." State health officials and toxic specialists had no idea what prompted the incident, and Gorman reported that the Riverside Fire Department's hazardous materials squad found nothing peculiar in air samples taken from the emergency room.[18] (Five months later, however, Gorman reversed himself and reported that a chemical compound derived from ammonia had been found in the air samples.[19])

Dr. Huberto Ochoa, director of the emergency room staff, noticed white crystal spikes in the syringe used to draw blood from the dying Gloria Ramirez. "I'd never seen anything like it," he said. OSHA technicians detected an unidentified derivative of ammonia in Ramirez's body bag.[20] Nevertheless, one state hygienist blamed "stress" or "anxiety." This explanation, however, failed to account for the profound memory loss of Maureen Welch, a respiratory therapist. The strain of overwork seemed a lame explanation for the gangrenous knees of Dr. Julie Gorchynski after her blood had been contaminated, killing the supply of oxygen to her bones. She also suffered from breathing difficulties, muscle spasms and other symptoms reported two years earlier by members of the task force. In fact, the New York Times noted, medical professionals held that 'the toxic substance that felled the emergency room workers may have been an organophosphate, a chemical used in pesticides and military nerve gas."[21] (On the West Coast, the heirs of General Otis Chandler never once raised the possibility that Gloria Ramirez may have been exposed to organophosphates, quite possibly to avoid linking Dr. Gould's task force with the mystery fumes case in the minds of readers.)

"I had chemical burns in my throat and nose," Gorchynski told reporters, "lungs working at half capacity, biopsies showing dead knees, a drop of enzyme levels and crystals in my blood as well. It's all medically documented."[22] But the Los Angeles Times—which had ignored medical data in its reporting on the poisonings of ritual abuse task force members—also neglected to discuss Julie Gorchynski's medical examinations.

The Times wasn't the only local news outlet to spin a cloud of disinformation around the mystery fumes case. Dean Edell, a local talk show doctor for KFI, an AM radio station in Los Angeles, dismissed the incident as "mass hysteria."[23]

This diagnosis outraged Dr. Ross Kussman, Gorchynski's physician, who called in to explain that the hospital personnel displayed symptoms of toxicity.

"It doesn't fit the grounds for mass hysteria," Kussman said. "Julie became very ill from the toxin, developed pancreatitis and hepatitis, which are known to kill bone tissue." Dr. Edell scoffed, as though this diagnosis was the most preposterous abuse of medical science he'd ever heard. What poison could possibly account for Gorchynski's litany of symptoms, he asked.

"Organophosphates are well known to cause pancreatitis," Dr. Kussman offered. He explained that pancreatitis, in turn, is a known precursor of bone necrosis, the condition afflicting Dr. Gorchynski's knee. Edell asked why health authorities hadn't come to the same conclusion.

"Because," Kussman returned, "the county was uncooperative in helping us find out where it came from." (Gorchynski also claimed that county authorities were "stonewalling" her.)

"Trust me," Edell snorted with psychic confidence, "there ain't no fumes!"

This appeared to be the official position of the Times as well. Gorman parroted the statements of state health officials when, two weeks later, they too attributed the swooning at Riverside Hospital to "mass hysteria" (failing to point out, however, that this is formally considered to be a "diagnosis-by-exclusion"—meaning that if no other cause is detectable, mass hysterics could account for a spread of physical symptoms.[24])

At any rate, this explanation didn't wash well in the public print. But before the sighs died down another diagnosis was offered by Riverside County Coroner Scotty Hill. The coroner released a report from Lawrence Livermore labs—a few days before ballots were cast in Hill's run for reelection—concluding that the noxious fumes discharged by Gloria Ramirez were created internally from the bodily absorption of the pain remedy DMSO, chemically transformed by her unique bio-chemistry into dimethyl sulfate, a chemical warfare agent.[25]

But the DMSO theory had as many gaping holes in it as "mass hysteria." "DMSO is commonly used," Dr. Kussman pointed out, "and they're saying now that everyone who uses it emits a nerve gas?"

The Ramirez family denied that the patient had ever used DMSO. Besides, said Ron Schwartz, an attorney in the case, "the coroner's office is still saying that she died of cervical cancer, but now they're saying she created a chemical warfare agent that didn't hurt her. That doesn't make sense to me."

The Los Angeles Times neglected to report a second outbreak of mystery fumes that further decimated the DMSO hypothesis. After initial treatment at Riverside Hospital, two of the poisoned hospital employees were transferred to Parkview Hospital, according to a local television news report.[26] "What few people know," an excited reporter announced from Parkview, "is that four of the workers who treated them here were ill themselves. A poison expert examined the four new patients—he said the same symptoms at two different hospitals argues against a DMSO reaction, and points to an entirely different poison."

Lawrence Livermore chemists also overlooked an outbreak of mystery fumes in Bakersfield a week after the Riverside poisonings. The emergency room at Mercy Hospital was evacuated after doctors inserted a breathing tube in the trachea of a 44-year-old woman struggling with shortness of breath. As at Riverside, emergency room personnel noticed a gaseous cloud rising from the patient. They complained that a potent chemical odor originating with the patient's blood left them with burning eyes, nausea and headaches. [27]

The growing list of tenuous explanations contributed to suspicions of a cover-up. These were augmented by the announcement that the syringe used to draw blood from Gloria Ramirez had been thrown away.[28] And in the course of lawsuits filed by the Ramirez family, Dr. Gorchynski and nurse Sally Balderas, attorneys for Riverside County filed a court motion to destroy all of the evidence gathered from the contaminated emergency room. As it was, entire barrels of evidence had been kept secret from the Ramirez family. They and others filing suit therefore had no chance to have the contents of the barrels examined by toxicologists. An attorney for Sally Balderas complained that he had not been notified that the county wanted to destroy the evidence, or even that a hearing had been scheduled. Judge Richard Van Frank refused to give the county its way, ruling that interested parties work out a plan for the evidence before the hearing continue.[29]

Coverage of the mystery fumes case by the Los Angeles Times did not extend to the evidentiary hearing. The residents of L.A. were not told that the very "stonewalling" officials charged with investigating a case of mass poisoning wanted to burn every scrap of evidence to minimize "storage costs."

By suppressing significant details (medical evidence documenting a toxic assault on the ritual abuse task force, or symptoms of organophosphate poisoning in the mystery fumes case) the Times plays an insidious game. The newspaper has clearly distorted the chemo-terrorism of cults in the Southern California with a disinformation gambit that shields the culprits and defames victims (Gloria Ramirez?) for breaking out, talking to reporters, striking back or otherwise interfering with domestic CIA mind control operations.

Holsinger offered as evidence "The Penal Colony," an essay written by a U.C. Berkeley psychologist. Chapter Six

A Map of Hell

Devil Cult Mayhem—A Global Perspective

BRAZIL: In July 1992 a surly mob in Rio de Janeiro was dissuaded by state troopers with machine guns from lynching the wife of a small-town mayor accused of sacrificing a six year-old boy. The woman, her daughter and three male suspects who confessed to the killing were escorted from the police station under armed guard.

CANADA: As of 1977, Victoria had a black witchcraft population of about 1,000. Five of the cells were branches of the Canadian Church of Satan. Many of the witches were "prominent business people," according to a story in the Victorian, "and a substantial number (were) newspaper people."

In Montreal, a group known as the Continental Association of Satan's Hope (CASH) advises prospective members to "turn your fantasies into reality and discover for yourself the infernal power of mighty Satan."

ENGLAND: Newspapers in the UK insist that ritually abused children are suffering "false memories"—despite a survey by the British Psychological Society, published in January 1995, stating flatly that nine out of ten therapists believe that ritual abuse is real. The Society also found that the mental health community overwhelmingly endorsed recovered memory therapy. The prevalence of ritual abuse in Great Britain is difficult to pin down, but in June 1994 a research team at Manchester University released a study estimating that nearly 1,000 children were victims of organized sexual abuse over a four-year period. "Another 86 were allegedly subjected to ritual abuse," the Daily Telegraph reported, "in the same period up to 1991." The study encompassed every police force and child service organization in the country. Yet only a small minority of abusers were convicted.

Despite the assurances of Britain's False Memory Society, press accounts of cultic outrages appear at a regular pace. The London Times ran a news brief on June 26, 1993 reporting succinctly that "two men found dead in a fume-filled car surrounded with flowers at Fareham, Hampshire, were due to appear in court today." Both men had been "accused of offenses involving schoolboys and an animal."

In 1994 Princess Diana's brother, Earl Spencer, let on, in the House of Lords no less, that devil worshipers had been holding ceremonies on the estate where she was raised. "We have had everything from fences being pulled down and burned, animals killed, devil worship and motor-bike racing." Spencer claimed that "things" had been left behind by the devil worshippers. "It's just a diversion," he said, "I don't think it's serious."

In Leeds, the Sorcerer's Apprentice "magick" shop offers books on the occult, leather bullwhips, idols, spell-kits, pentacles, altar drapes, chalices and embalming fluid. Chris Bray, the shop's proprietor, boasts a clientele roster of some 300 self-avowed Satanists.

Mind control, torture and politics converged in the death of a Labor councilor in Manchester, a self-proclaimed sadomasochist and Satanist, who boasted of his involvement in the murder of several young men. The politician, Chris Rogers, was stabbed to death by cult leader Colin Henry, as reported in the Guardian for February 2, 1994. Dr. Gill, a psychiatrist, said that Henry feared his mentor, who he believed had "mental powers to manipulate him."

GERMANY: In Magicians of the Golden Dawn, Ellic Howe allows that "the belief in Crowley's authority survives even today in certain German and Swiss groups, notably at Stein near Zurich, where the Ecclesia Gnostica Catholica, a branch of the Order of the Templars of the Orient (OTO), still performs his Gnostic mass.

The Third Order of the Golden Dawn, vestiges of the original organization's inner order, is said to be highly political and still active in England, Switzerland and Germany.

GREECE: In December 1993 a pair of Greek military conscripts confessed to kidnapping, murder, rape, and the grisly murders of two women in Satanic rituals. Six others in the cult were charged with complicity in human sacrifices and black magic rites. On December 30, the Daily Telegraph reported, "the sect was discovered to have head-quarters on the northern outskirts of Athens after one of four women being readied for sacrifice at Christmas reported the rituals to police."

HONDURAS: The establishment of U.S. military bases in the 1980s gave rise to a high incidence of child prostitution. Newspaper articles from Honduras complained bitterly of the off-duty diversions of servicemen. America magazine ran a story in 1987 on a series of Satanic murders of children in the town of Comayagua, near the Palmerola military base. No arrests were made.

MALAYSIA: The dismembered corpse of Mazlan Idris, a Pahang legislator, was found in his country home in 1993, surrounded by black magic paraphenalia. In nearby fields, police found the remains of other victims.

THE NETHERLANDS: Unaccountable reports of child abuse in Oude Pekela, the proverbial sleepy village, population 8,000, near the German border, began to surface in May 1987 when two children, ages 4 and 5, exhibited physical symptoms of sexual assault including, in one case, persistent bleeding from the anus. The examining physicians reported "large-scale ritualistic abuse." Some fifty children may have been involved. The children disclosed "watching a videotape and seeing their friends on the screen" engaging in lewd acts, a tactic used to overcome the children's resistance and fear. Then parties were held, and the children were instructed to undress. They remembered sitting on the floor naked, being forced to lick the genitals and breasts of adults and walking around in circles with little leather belts tied around their penises. They also told of swimming in pools where their heads were dunked under water, of being washed with "colored shampoo."

Other substances given them included drugs, sometimes applied by injection or balloons placed over their mouths, and "feces rubbed on them." The children were ordered to hit a black child. This, they were instructed, was not a bad thing to do. Interviewers asked the children whether the victim of this moral exercise might have been a doll. They denied it, although some of them offered that they had played with decapitated dolls. When interviewed in groups, they often corrected each other and added significant details. One psychiatrist reported that many of the children discussed being abducted on several occasions. The children were approached by men and women on bicycles or in cars, dressed as clowns. The abductees were rendered compliant to the sexual abuse with drugged candy, ice cream and lemonade.

PANAMA: Jack Anderson's February 27, 1992 column reported, "U.S. military officials in Panama have uncovered a Satan-worshiping ring of about 20 American teenagers at an Air Force base there." The military attempted to contain the story, but Panamanian sources said "the cult was discovered by parents just in time to prevent a mass suicide the teenagers had planned. The teenagers were students at Corundu Junior High, a Defense Department school on Panama's Pacific coast. They ranged in age from 13 to 15, and most were children of military personnel at Howard Air Force Base."

SOUTH AFRICA: In Johannesburg, doctors contemplated sex-change surgery for a toddler with sex organs mutilated in a witchcraft ritual. The child was discovered in a Soweto field. His thumbs had been cut off and someone had attempted to gouge out his eyes.

UNITED STATES:

Alabama: In April 1986 cattle were mutilated by cultists in Gunterville and cattlemen were threatened.

Arizona: Confirmed cult activity near Tucson, and a long litany of cattle and goat sacrifices.

California: On December 19, 1987 in the town of Lancaster, Andra Reynolds stabbed her four year-old boy to death, then turned herself into the 700 Club hot line. "She had some problems," a neighbor told the Los Angeles Herald. The child suffered multiple stab wounds. Two open Bibles were found on either side of the body, which was sprawled on his mother's bed. Two full-grown dogs and three puppies had been drowned in the bathtub.

In February 1984, five residents of Newport Beach stole off with body parts from a mausoleum.

To curb the rise in animal sacrifices, the Los Angeles City Council approved an ordinance banning occult-style killings. A spokesman for the Department of Animal Regulation estimated that as many as 300 animal sacrifices had occurred in L.A. in the previous year, with reports coming in from every community in the city. Councilman Richard Alatorre said that he feared "these incidents are only the tip of the iceberg."

Connecticut: In Wilton, a satanic cult desecrated churches and threatened to murder young children.

Florida: In West Palm Beach, a gang of youths known as the Legion of Doom passed a death penalty on anyone who married outside the group. The Legion boasted 15 to 20 members who "played at Satanism," according to the New York Times. A search of the Legion HQ after the murder of 18 year-old Troy Collins produced a bloody chain, a baseball bat with hair on it and bloody clothing. Some play. The walls were decorated with Satanic inscriptions. Four adults were charged with the beating death of Mr. Collins.

Day-care center operator John Shaver of Fort Lauderdale was charged by police in 1990 with taking nude photographs of children in his care. As 14 of the children began medical and psychological exams, a hotel maid discovered him with his right wrist slashed. Child pornography was found in his home. Three of the children attending Shaver's day-care center were found to have gonorrhea.

In Stuart, Florida, Montessori school principal James Toward pleaded guilty to child abuse charges and received a 15-year sentence. His secretary, Brenda Williams, was convicted to six years.

Illinois: In 1980 a self-proclaimed witch in Chicago beat her roommate, who was left alone for six days to die. Four years later four Chicago area cultists were, according to police, believed to have been responsible for 18 murders. The victims were slashed, their body parts used in rituals.

Du Page County: In 1986 a series of murder trials of four men belonging to a Satanic cult was held. The prosecution charged that the men raped, killed and mutilated up to 18 young women, including Carole Pappas, wife of former Chicago Cubs pitcher Milt Pappas.

Also in 1986, a police officer was shot by hit men for the owner of "an unorthodox church." A Chicago Tribune article reported that the owner of the church was "a City Hall big shot." The hit men told police that they were on their way to Bridgeport to beat up a pastor when the officer intervened.

Maine: Desecration of churches a real problem.

Massachusetts: A cultist in Fall River ripped the head off of a prostitute with his bare hands in 1981. Cape Cod has been plagued by reports of repugnant cult activity since the early 1970s. The naked and mutilated bodies of four young women, their hearts cut out, were exhumed from shallow graves near the Cape in 1971.

In September 1984 parents in Malden worried about their daughter's inability to urinate. After a police investigation, a woman, her son and daughter were picked up on charges of child rape. Other children told of being forced to take part in animal sacrifices. Gerald "Tookey" Amirault was accused of dressing as a clown and abusing children in a "magic room." Amirault was sentenced to 30 to 40 years, and the women received terms of 20 years each.

In 1987 a Christmas creche was burned in Boston. A dead sparrow and a beef tongue were found nailed to the creche.

Missouri: In Carl Junction, the southwest corner of the state adjoining Arkansas and Kansas, several cults are said to be active. Favorite ceremonial sites are the dozens of abandoned lead and zinc mines scattered throughout the region. In December 1987 a boy was given 60 blows to the head. His body was found in a cistern. Three classmates arrested for the murder confessed that they'd been exposed to a local devil cult

Montana: Serial killer Stanley Baker confessed to eating the heart of one of his victims. He was recruited from a Wyoming campus by a cult based in California known as the "Four P" movement. The Four P's subscribe to a hybrid of Nazi beliefs and occultic lore. The cult has been known to sacrifice victims on an altar decorated with dragons. Baker, who has shown no remorse, formed his own cult of prison inmates.

New Jersey: Church and graveyard desecrations in several towns.

New York State: Police raided a Bronx apartment in 1980 and rescued 62 caged animals intended for sacrifice.

At West Point military academy, 58 children claimed to have been ritually abused by their preschool teachers, forced to play "Marry the Devil," swallow excrement, etc. The Army, parents alleged, launched an ambitious cover-up. Investigators insisted that abuse took place, but the case was plagued by a lack of material evidence and was dismissed. Some of the children contracted venereal diseases.

Jeanette Martin, an unlicensed day care operator in White Plains, was accused of molesting children and urinating on them. The defense claimed that child questioning techniques were tainted and charged that the children only gave "bizarre" accounts of abuse after coercion. Eighteen children testified in an 11-month trial. One perp was convicted on felony charges and received a 25-50 year sentence.

Ohio: In Cincinnati a loosely-organized circle of black magicians made their presence known in the late 1960s by leaving pierced sheep hearts in public parks—meant, white witches in Cincinnati feared, as a curse on the city.

Oregon: A nine year-old boy told friends that he wanted to grow up to be like his mother—a high priestess who "eats babies." The boy recruited 24 children into his cult of child witches.

In December 1987, in Roseburg, three Christian day-care centers were the source of allegations resulting in the sentencing of a minister, and his wife and son.

Rhode Island : Two boys were murdered within a week in late 1987. William Sarento, 21, was charged with the killings—ordered, he said, by Satan.

Texas: In Houston, a man was caught in flagrante delecti with an eight-year-old boy in the midst of a Satanic initiation ceremony in October 1980. An infant's body was discovered in a black box owned by a teenaged Devil devotee four years later.

In Fort Worth a babysitter received a 70-year prison sentence without probation for killing a two year-old child in her registered day-care center. The child was killed after the sitter repeatedly struck the baby's head against a blunt object.

Hard on the 1989 police raid on the Matamoros cult, the Houston Post reported that the name of a suspect in the case, Rick Block, had turned up in documents seized from the Southern Air Transport C-123K cargo plane downed by the Nicaraguan Sandinistas, kicking off the Iran-Contra revelations.

Near Austin, Daniel and Francis Keller, operators of a day-care center, were convicted in November 1992 for aggravated sexual abuse of a 3-year-old girl. Molestation aside, three children from the center alleged they'd had "giant germs" implanted in their bodies and been forced—at gunpoint—to participate in the making of pornographic movies.

Washington: Animal sacrifices and mutilations. Cult members were observed near ritual sites.

Chapter Seven

The "Fatal Vision" Murders & the Nomenclature of an American Death Squad

The Army's Body-Bag Heroin Connection and a Triple-Murder in Vietnam Era North Carolina

Dr. Jeffrey MacDonald's prospects appeared far from grim. At 26, the Princeton graduate had attained the rank of captain in the Army Medical Corps at Fort Bragg, ten miles northwest of Fayetteville, North Carolina. He was a talented physician; his contributions to emergency medicine have been adopted by paramedic and trauma units across the country. Acquaintances maintain that he doted on his family. Colette, his wife, was pregnant with her third child when her life ended and his was coldly dismantled.

On February 17, 1970 Colette MacDonald and Kimberly, age 5, and Kristen, 2, were bludgeoned and stabbed to death. Military police responding to MacDonald's call for help found him unconscious with multiple stab wounds, one of which, examining physicians later testified, collapsed a lung. He was hospitalized for ten days. Despite the severity of his injuries, the government concluded they were "superficial" and "self-inflicted." MacDonald was charged, tried and acquitted in 1970 at an Army hearing. He was retried in the summer of 1979, found guilty, acquitted by an appellate court a year later, and sentenced yet again by Supreme Court decision in 1982. He is currently serving three life terms in a medium-security prison in Sheridan, Oregon.

The official account of the killings was packaged as a mass-market book, a critically-acclaimed popularization of the government's case against MacDonald. Before Joe McGinniss vilified Edward Kennedy in The Last Brother, which promptly backfired (one Washington Post reviewer described the biography as "shoddy, slimy and unrelievedly rotten"), he was the celebrated author of Fatal Vision, widely considered to be the authoritative account of the brutal triple homicide. Fatal Vision, MacDonald insists, was equally disingenuous, larded with long sections of imaginary dialogue and erroneous conjecture about his involvement in the killings. Unfortunately, the widespread critical condemnation of McGinniss for the Kennedy biography wasn't retroactive. The press asked no questions about the author's earlier production.

Did MacDonald, for example, really suffer "malignant narcissism" and acute "amphetamine psychosis"—two core premises of the book—rendering him capable of killing his own family? The drug theory, at least, is ruled out by periodic blood tests administered at the hospital where MacDonald worked. These proved negative, as did the blood test taken after the murders. His medical examination before surgery on the collapsed lung found no drugs or alcohol in his system.

MacDonald's defense attorney, Michael Malley, offers that "McGinniss simply made up this theory"—as he would later fabricate details about the life of Edward Kennedy.

In Fatal Vision, McGinniss promotes the government's unlikely revelation that MacDonald's knife wounds were self-inflicted, a false lead for the authorities to follow. Of course his 17 stab wounds—one life-threatening—could be viewed as confirmation that the family was, as MacDonald claimed, attacked by knife-wielding intruders.

Who is Joe McGinniss? It has not occurred to the press gang (which has done much to burnish his reputation) to ask. In the Kennedy book, the mass-market journalist admits, without explanation or detail, that his source was "FBI wiretaps" for the allegation that Ted's brother John defeated Hubert Humphrey for the Democratic nomination in West Virginia by promising to "bribe local sheriffs and other election officials" with funds from Chicago mobsters. Melinda Stephens, a friend of Jeffrey MacDonald and editor of a newsletter about the case, contends the author collaborated with the government's prosecutors "to present false statements about the evidence" in an attempt to mold public opinion. In both books, McGinniss gleans incriminating information from federal sources.

Fatal Vision is, like the Kennedy biography, a political hit piece. The small but vocal ranks of MacDonald supporters believe he is a surrogate for shadowy figures in the intelligence community with connections to public office and the Pentagon, imprisoned to obscure their crimes. The paperback indictment of MacDonald has reinforced the public perception of MacDonald's guilt, and kept dormant one of the most unconscionable scandals in American military history.

Three suspects in the murders have confessed. MacDonald's version of events has been confirmed by some 40 witnesses. Fatal Vision is myopic in its exclusion of any evidence that might clear MacDonald. McGinniss's claim to impartiality eroded completely in his flat refusal in 1980 even to look at the 1200-page report compiled by MacDonald's defense attorneys. This report, taken together with the sworn depositions of witnesses, press accounts and interviews with investigators, combine in a case sharply at odds with the government's.

Jerry Potter, co-author of a recent reinvestigation of the MacDonald case, Fatal Justice (Norton, 1995), contends "every piece of evidence that the government brought against Jeffrey MacDonald at trial can be destroyed by their own hidden documents. And every piece of evidence found at the crime scene that would have helped him was suppressed." Moreover, evidence that MacDonald was framed, as he has maintained consistently since his conviction, manifests the identities of the actual assailants of MacDonald's family, and their motive.

"Malignant narcissism," drugs and "rage at the female sex" aside, another perspective of the case begins with a young criminology student and police informant from Nashville, Tennessee—Helena Stoeckley.

In 1968 Stoeckley, whose information on the narcotics underground resulted in over 200 arrests in the Fort Bragg area (though she was ruled not credible by Judge DuPree, who presided over the MacDonald case), was transferred by her police contact, Lieutenant Rudy Studer, to the office of Detective Everette Beasley, a new cop on the narcotics squad. Beasley didn't know it, but Stoeckley had fallen in with a circle of Vietnam vets running heroin into the Fort Bragg area.

On one occasion, Stoeckly told Beasley, "drugs, primarily heroin, were being smuggled into this country in the body cavities of casualties returned by air from Vietnam. She named Ike Atkinson as the ring leader." Atkinson was assigned to Seymour-Johnson Air Force Base in Goldboro, North Carolina. He was "in the service," Stoeckley said, "but subsequently got out and continued his business in drugs with the same contacts."

In a 1985 deposition, Beasley stated that a shaken Helena Stoeckley contacted him after the murder of Jeffrey MacDonald's family. She told him that she had been in the MacDonald house in the early morning hours of February 17th. She also provided him with details about the drug operation. The recipients of the heroin, she said, had contacts in Vietnam who placed it in the bodies of war casualties. The bodies were re-stitched and shipped to Johnson Air Base and other installations around the country. When the bodies arrived in the U.S., they were met by a military contact and the heroin were removed. The bodies were then sent on to their final destinations.

"The person who met the bodies at the respective air bases knew which bodies to check, based on a predetermined code," Beasley says. "Helena told me that the people who handled the assignments in Vietnam, and those who met the planes in the United States, were military personnel."

She also told him that the couriers made their pick-ups at Fort Bragg. Distribution was handled by enlisted men, civilians, police officers. "Local attorneys and Army officers as high as generals were part of the operation. She stated that she would name and identify the people if given immunity by the U.S. government."

Beasley believes the workings of the drug operation were part of the "bomb-shell" she promised to drop at the trial of Jeffrey MacDonald. But the government would not offer her immunity. (Facing a conviction for participation in the killings, she admitted later, Stoeckley overdosed herself with drugs before appearing at MacDonald's trial. She was reeling under the influence when she recanted on the stand, and was dismissed as a witness.)

If granted immunity, Stoeckley's testimony would have surely drawn national attention to an obscure chapter of the war in Southeast Asia. Had she lived, Stoeckley might well have toppled an international drug empire.

During the war in Vietnam and after, small contingents of American soldiers settled in Thailand to enter the world heroin trade. Among the Yank opium gangs was a syndicate of G.I.'s known as the Black Masonic Club, led by Leslie "Ike" Atkinson, nicknamed "Sergeant Smack." They called Jack's American Style Bar in Bangkok, a favorite watering hole for Black G.I.s on furlough and a notorious drug dispensary, their home.

Atkinson was identified by Helena Stoeckley as the leader of the umbrella group linked to the MacDonald killings. Atkinson had no role in the killings, but a sub-group in Fayetteville reportedly did. One of this group, Cathy Perry, confessed to the FBI in 1984 that she took part in the killings. The word "cult" surfaced much earlier.

In December 1970, Perry confided to a friend that she had "killed several persons." She complained that "the Black Cult" had pressured her to do "things" against her will.

On the East Coast, said Stoeckley, the heroin was unloaded at Fort Bragg and Johnson-Seymour Air Force Base. The heroin was distributed along the eastern and southeastern states. According to a 1973 issue of Time, casualties of war were indeed used as couriers. The opiate was stuffed into coffins, body-bags and internal organs. The Time report described the scandal as "the most vicious case of war-profiteering" in American history.

Military police, looking into the black market in stolen supplies and narcotics, periodically snagged an enlisted man or petty officer. Pressured to plea bargain, they often named senior officials. One team of drug agents filed reports at military bases around the country. Eye-witnesses at Norton Air Force Base in California agreed to roll over under immunity and testify that incoming bodies, stuffed with as much as 50 pounds of heroin each, were surgically relieved of the contraband. Wall Street

Journal reporter Jonathan Kwitny reports in The Crimes of Patriots, published in 1987, that "corrupt U.S. and Vietnamese officials" arrested for complicity in the heroin pipeline turned evidence on "senior U.S. officers."

"These reports checked out," Kwitny affirmed (leaving the identities of said officials a lingering mystery).

The Army acted quickly—not by rounding up the ring leaders, but by dismantling the investigative team and packing them off to combat duty in Vietnam. Skittish military officials, alleges Ted Gunderson, former agent-in-charge of the FBI's Los Angeles office and a long-time MacDonald supporter, only pursued low-level couriers in the drug transfers. "High-ranking Army officers," he says, "were in charge of this drug ring (and) have never been identified. Informants have advised that the Army investigation of the operation was controlled and manipulated to conceal its magnitude and the extent of (official) participation."

This gruesome successor to Air America began to fall apart in 1972 when federal agents were tipped off that 20 kilos of heroin could be found aboard a KC-135 bound for Delaware's Dover Air Force Base. The plane was ordered to land in Maryland, and the agents searched the transport. The search proved futile until one agent noticed that a body in the cargohold had been freshly stitched. The agents arrested Thomas Southerland, an Army veteran from North Carolina. His bail was set at $50,000. The jury was informed that Southerland was an operative in an international opium ring.

The DEA soon made the arrest of Ike Atkinson, currently serving a forty-year prison sentence. Federal authorities are convinced that he still has $85 million cabbaged away in offshore accounts. (Atkinson has since changed his name. He has told fellow prisoners that he was used in CIA mind control experiments. He was, apparently, a pawn, not a true Insider. Federal documents released under FOIA have since established that the Agency used the military as cover for experiments in behavior modification.) The stiff sentence is inconsistent with the fate of James Smedly, who directed the Thai end of the operation. Smedley spent two years in a Bangkok prison and was released to enter a guilty plea in a Raleigh, North Carolina courthouse. He walked away with a reprimand and parole. Jasper Myrick, a courier, did not fare so well—he was arrested in Bangkok and sentenced to 33 years in a maximum-security cell.

In Fayetteville, an accused drug dealer, Spider Newman, consented to turn state's evidence on his suppliers. The case was heard in federal court. During a break in the trial, Newman disappeared. His body was found in his car, behind his home. He'd been shot in the head. Police ruled the death a suicide.

But in 1970 the Atkinson syndicate was still operating undetected. Some of the local distributors feared and loathed one Dr. Jeffrey MacDonald. The primary aim of any murder investigation is the establishment of motive. The prosecution, and later McGinniss, smeared MacDonald by falsely attributing the murders to amphetamine abuse. Actually, according to testimony that surfaced in the 1970 military trial, addicts on base considered MacDonald a threat because he actively opposed drug use, and attempted to get to the bottom of the supply. As an Army drug counselor, he routinely treated soldiers who were down-and-strung-out at Fort Bragg, among them a boyfriend of Cathy Perry (whose murder confession has long been shunned by the prosecution's office) named Warmbrod. MacDonald couldn't help but notice the rising glut of hard narcotics at Fort Bragg. One study concluded there were 800 to 1,000 heroin addicts at the Fayetteville base alone. MacDonald pressured those in his treatment program to name sources of supply. Army Major Jim Williams, a drug counselor who worked closely with MacDonald, testified at the Article 32 hearing that his colleague had waded into perilous waters.

"I became very concerned not only for my health but for Dr. MacDonald's," he testified.

But MacDonald was increasingly disturbed by the prevalence of narcotics on the base. He persisted in his one-man crusade against the warnings of Major Williams. Major Williams's concern gave way to alarm. He felt that MacDonald was "way over his head."

Among the details that Stoeckley gave Beasley in 1970 were the names of police officers entangled in the body-bag operation. One of them was Lt. Rudy Studer, the informant's former contact. Shortly after the MacDonald murders, Studer was promoted to Captain, Chief of Detectives. The promotion was short-lived, however. Studer was soon forced to resign after "misappropriating" pornographic material seized in a police raid. Stoeckley said Studer supplied her with heroin for sale in Fayetteville. His partner in the drug trade was allegedly William Ivory of the Army's Criminal Investigations Division (CID).

This was a very pertinent bombshell because Ivory, the agent on duty the night of the murders, directed the search of MacDonald's home, and was placed in charge of the CID investigation—despite his age, 26, and the fact that he had absolutely no experience directing a murder probe. His immediate background was a stint as MP, investigating traffic mishaps and interrogating drug suspects. Ivory was clearly not qualified to head an investigation of this magnitude.

MacDonald's defense attorneys have probed Ivory's acquaintance with members of the Atkinson drug syndicate. In February 1991, MacDonald wrote in a letter to his attorney, Harvey Silverglate, that "Ivory perjured himself at the Article 32 trial over when his relationship began with Helena Stoeckley. We now know from recent informants in the CID that Ivory knew her pre-February 17th (prior to the murders), and secretly had her in a safehouse two days later for an 'interview.'"

In other words, the same military official who indicted MacDonald had an undefined working relationship with a confessed participant in the murders. Afterwards, an investigative turf war was waged between the FBI and CID. The Bureau was shut out. Ivory took over the investigation.

Consistently, the same military personnel entangled in the body-bag connection figured prominently in the MacDonald killings, as Ivory did in the subsequent investigation.

Detective Studer's partner, Lt. Sonberg, disappeared immediately after the murders. It was bruited around the Fayetteville police department that he had double-crossed a ring of drug dealers. A police informant, Joseph Bullock, has stated to Fayetteville police that on more than one occasion he'd witnessed Studer and Ivory exchanging envelopes at a local Dunkin' Donuts shop. Shortly after talking to police, Bullock was ambushed in his home and, like Spider Newman, received a fatal bullet in the head.

City officials fingered by Stoeckley in the body-bag drug syndicate also had a direct role in the prosecution of Jeffrey MacDonald. "Helena once mentioned the name Proctor to me," Beasley recalled in a signed statement. James Proctor, a prosecuting attorney in the MacDonald case, was the former son-in-law of Judge DuPree, a certain conflict-of-interest in a case this sensitive

Alan Mazorelle, a drug courier named by Stoeckley, "was in the Army," stationed at Fort Bragg, and took part in the killings. She said Mazorelle was dealing drugs quite heavily by this time. He married, produced a daughter, but spent most of his time away on "military business," shuttling between military bases, mixing with smugglers and avoiding the MPs. Mazorelle once boasted to friends that he was assigned to the CID. Of all the underworld figures with whom she dealt, Stoeckley feared him most. "Mazorelle would kill you in a minute," she said.

Her dread was shared by Mazorelle's daughter, who alleges that he prided himself on homicides made to appear to be accidents. She told investigative reporter Ted Schwartz that her father was fascinated with mind control. He had learned hypnosis, and through it attempted to divide her into two distinct personalities. Schwartz's investigation of Mazorelle confirmed that he was active in cult activity. Beasley maintains that he compiled extensive intelligence files on all of Stoeckley's associates, "but this information has since disappeared from the Fayetteville police files," he said. Beasley discovered that the files had vanished in 1979. "During the MacDonald trial I was given a subpoena to bring these records to trial. It was then I discovered they were gone," he says.

Among them the file of Greg Mitchell, a G.I. placed by Stoeckley at the crime scene, one of several mysterious "Fatal Vision" casualties. His wife recalls that Mitchell once explained to her how drugs were smuggled into the country in the body cavities of soldiers killed in Vietnam. Mitchell was questioned by the FBI in 1982. Shortly thereafter he told friends he was leaving the country to evade arrest for "serious crimes," notably the murder of MacDonald's wife and children. Two reliable witnesses, Ann Sutton Cannady and Juanita Sisneros, found the words:

"I KILLED MACDONALD'S WIFE AND CHILDREN"

scrawled by Mitchell in red paint on a farmhouse wall. Unfortunately, Mitchell's travel plans were canceled by sclerosis of the liver. Sclerosis, normally a lingering illness, was also the instantaneous cause of Helena Stoeckley's death seven months later. Before she died, Stoeckley complained to friends that "two men in suits" were tailing her. Neighbors have since confirmed that a couple of well-dressed strangers parked for long periods in front of her apartment, according to Potter and Bost in Fatal Justice.

"Shockingly," Ted Gunderson gradually realized, as his own investigation for MacDonald's defense team led him from one witness to the next, "the group MacDonald described existed, was drug- and violence-oriented, was seen going to and coming from the house, was seen in bloody clothing, and fits his descriptions."

MacDonald passed a polygraph. He submitted to five independent forensic examinations. The government's own lab specimens link Fort Bragg's body-bag ring to the crime scene, including a long synthetic blonde strand corroborating MacDonald's contention that Stoeckley wore a blonde wig the night of the murders. A bloody syringe found in his home was "lost" by the prosecution.

In fact, Government files released since the trial verify that William Ivory, the CID investigator and alleged body-bag drug courier, misplaced or destroyed most of the evidence corroborating Dr. MacDonald's version of events. The defense team never knew that Stoeckley's bloody boots and clothing were turned over to the Army CID by a friend of Helena Stoeckley. Or that blood samples conforming to Greg Mitchell's type were taken from the MacDonald house, as were seven fingerprints of persons unknown—discarded because "they kept getting mixed up with the known prints." And federal prosecutors violated federal rules of evidence by bluntly refusing to provide MacDonald's attorneys with the addresses of witnesses required in preparation for trial. They were only given the list of addresses after the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals ordered the prosecution to relinquish them.

Twenty-five years ago, MacDonald's life was turned upside down. All evidence that could reverse a conspicuous case of malicious prosecution is systematically rejected upon appeal—very comforting to the coterie of military officers and public officials connected by CID investigators, Stoeckley, Perry, Mitchell and others to the importation of heroin from Southeast Asia by casualty-courier to Fort Bragg.

But another motive was rough-sketched in 1987 by Melinda Stephens, a tenacious supporter of Jeffrey MacDonald, in I Accuse: The Torturing of An America Hero, a self-published debunking of the government's case. The suspects described by MacDonald "all existed," she observes, "all knew each other and all had a motive to kill... drugs. The Army had a motive for covering up their crimes, stemming from the fact that they were government informants involved in illegal LSD experiments at Fort Bragg." Her source of information was Major Jim Williams, MacDonald's colleague and the witness at the 1970 hearing who testified that he feared MacDonald had carried his investigation of drugs on the base too far, and had thereby exhorted disaster. Williams also stated on the record that the confessed "Fatal Vision" killers were "government informants."

As noted, Ike Atkinson has alleged that he was used in a CIA mind control operation involving brain telemetry.

All of this is consistent with CID Investigator William Ivory's recruitment of Dr. James A. Brussel, a mental health commissioner for the state of New York. Brussel has claimed to be an agent of the CIA and an adviser to the CID's counter-espionage division. He also, according to Potter and Bost, was "an innovative researcher into novel methods for controlling inmates in psychiatric institutions. Lamenting the frustrations of managing unruly patients and the cost of housing them in the late 1940s, Brussel and an associate instituted electric shock experiments on the brains of female inmates." Dr. Brussel's early ECT "treatments" were performed on 50 female mental patients, in some cases at the rate of 40-50 sessions per patient. Brussel also experimented with amphetamines and methedrine on depressed patients. He was recruited by Ivory in 1971 as a secret consultant to the government.

Yet another CIA mind control researcher brought into the MacDonald case was the infamous William Kroger, author of Hypnosis and Behavior Modification (1963), with a preface by MKULTRA's Martin Orne and H.J Eysenck. Kroger's work for the Agency involved hypnosis as an espionage tool. Of particular interest to Kroger was the development of a drug-assisted, hypnotic means of programming intelligence operatives to carry out an assignment and obscure any memory of it. Whether these mind control specialists had a direct role in the killings is not clear, but the confessions of Helena Stoeckley and Cathy Perry both mention dim recall of events of February 17, 1970, as if they'd dreamed the killings.

They have provided MacDonald's defense team with a wealth of details, confirming that the only "Fatal Vision" in the case is the government's own. McGinniss's version of events has had the effect of drawing attention from the body-bag connection and the CIA's attempts, in violation of repeated Congressional injunctions, to commandeer the mind.

Fatal Vision is their cover story.

Chapter Eight

Family Ties

The Mephistophelian World of The Children of God

The fatal speedball seizure of River Phoenix on Halloween night, 1993, coincided in the media with the apocalyptic fire storm in Malibu and the death of Federico Fellini. In early September, newspapers in London and Buenos Aires headlined a story that directly concerned River Phoenix but, after the initial burst of coverage, was conspicuously absent from the American press—a raid on the Pilar, Argentina compound of the Family of Love, formerly the Children of God sect.

Police confiscated videos and magazines of children engaged in sex acts with adults. Also seized was a book for children, The Life of Little David, a Bible parody and tale of sexual initiation as told by "Sister Sarah." In one home video, naked young girls danced with silk scarves. Some 136 children were taken into protective custody, and 68 adults were detained for interrogation. The London Times reported that the children were "living in compartmented cells and answered questions like automatons. Whenever one of them tried to say something, another would look at him and he would fall silent, terrified." One cult house functioned strictly as a punishment facility, imprisoning some 50 adolescents.

Somos magazine reported on September 13, 1993 that the group's compound in Pilar is situated on "five kilometers of land hidden by high walls, constructed like a fortress off the Pan American highway." When Argentine authorities flew over the estate in a private plane, they discovered three observation posts on the roof. With binoculars, Police Commissioner Hugo Gabutti spotted three rondina units, or armed guards, on the roof. "They operated in a military fashion," Gabutti said, "looked and acted military. The security measures taken by the sect are incredible. They have received military training to protect themselves from outsiders."

Police in Buenos Aries were quickly inundated by "hundreds of telephone calls from the public requesting a special investigation,' according to the daily Clarin. After the raids, the New York Times, Time, Espanol, NBC and CNN all chimed in with prominently-placed features on the Family.

The investigation rapidly spread to Paraguay, Peru, Colombia and Venezuela. NBC's Prime Time Live interviewed disaffected Family members and flashed sexually-explicit videos: "We have had to edit them carefully," warned senior correspondent Fred Francis. The videos bore witness to intercourse with minors, "hooking for Jesus" and evangelical "sex orgies in rows of groaning bunk-beds." All over Latin America, Clarin reported on September 12, "Satanic and esoteric rites have been the subject of complaints concerning the sect." Silvina Cangaro, an interior decorator and former Family member, spoke to Gente, Argentina's answer to People, of her recruitment: "When I became a member, I immediately took part in Satanic rites. After I left the group and complained to the police, I received many death threats."

The Times of London reported on September 3 that video tapes seized by police—and broadcast on Argentina's nightly news—depicted "abhorrent Satanistic acts… in uncensored extracts of the videos after late-night news programs on Wednesday."

David "Moses" Berg, founder of Children of God, opened the door to esoteric religions and promiscuity in the 1970s, when in a letter to disciples he endorsed spiritism, witchcraft and astrology, according to W. Douglas Pritchett, who has compiled a book-length bibliography on the sect. Berg deified himself and proclaimed, "God is a pimp!" He claimed to have had sexual encounters with "goddesses," to have visited hell.

Ruth Gordon left the congregation in 1977, summing them up as a "pseudo-Christian" sect that dabbles in the occult. Other former disciples have described Berg as "Satanic," a charge first made by former members in 1973. Devil worshiper or not, he has long been a pugnacious anarchist, declaring "war" in 1968 "on the hypocritical old bottles of the religious system who were lined up on the back seat, and I cast in my lot with outlaws, drug addicts, maniacs, and the younger generation."

The allegations of former sect children were corroborated by the medical evidence—despite widespread and deceptive syndicated news stories like the one released by Reuters on September 5 claiming that "physical examinations carried out on the children turned up no signs of abuse." There followed a lull in the American press, a virtual news black-out.

Meanwhile, developments in the case continued to appear prominently in Latin American and European newspapers. On September 11 the Manchester Guardian reported that medical examinations of cult children did in fact find boys with "rectal bruises and excoriations," girls nine years old with "torn hymens and flayed vulvas": "Physical examination of children in Argentina's Family of Love sect has produced evidence of sexual injuries, according to a prosecutor in the case. "Those examinations, combined with psychological tests of the children and documents seized in the raids, are the basis for charges laid against the sect." Psychological profiles of the children detail characteristics of dementia and a trend of mental and psychological degeneration. Joyanne Treadwell Berg, 29, granddaughter of the sect's founder, told a magazine in Buenos Aires of her cousin Mene's sexual torment by leaders of the cult. "When my grandfather initiated her," Ms. Berg said, "he abused her sexually. She rebelled and endured all kinds of punishment. They used to hit her, tie her up in bed. They wrapped barbed wire around her body. They hit her so much—then they spread the news that she was mentally ill."

The Family fought back with denials that children had been harmed, accusing police of "religious persecution," of "stealing" and "torturing our children with physical examinations," as the Paraguayan branch of the sect maintained at a demonstration in Montevideo—itself under scrutiny for kidnapping and child abuse. Around the world, angry Children held outraged signs aloft:

"ARGENTINA ABUSES CHILDREN LIKE ME!"
"THE GESTAPO STOLE OUR CHILDREN!"

Gideon Scott, the "house shepherd" in Leicaster, England told reporters: "Nothing could be further from the truth than the wild allegations that our members abused or neglected their children. We do not promote or encourage sexual activity between adults and minors."

The group has long claimed to be the target of political oppression, especially when routed by police. Political martyrdom was a fundamental teaching of Moses Berg, the reclusive "prophet" who foretold the coming of the Anti-Christ in the form of a powerful dictator and the ascension of a One World Government. This, of course, is far-right religious programming—disseminated by Pat Robertson.

The cult's disavowals were echoed by Daniel Mujica, president of Argentina's Superior Council of Catholic Education, who said the allegations were inflated by the press. "The media are trying to make a big thing out of nothing," he said. "The sect isn't doing anything illegal." But his disavowals ran counter to the evidence: investigators in several countries have laid hands on a small library of photographic adventures in pedophilia printed by the Children. Most of the group's more lurid literary efforts were destroyed in 1987, including The Davidito Letter, written by Sara Davidito, a nurse in charge of group child care instruction. On October 10, 1993 the Houston Chronicle reported, "she writes of and is pictured having oral sex with the child. There are pictures of the child masturbating and being placed in a copulatory position with a small girl.

"The nurse writes of the boy sitting by while three couples, including his mother, have group sex. She describes giving him 'swigs of wine' so he would 'get happy,' then climbing into bed with him and asking if he was 'in the mood.'" Abigail Berry, a former member born inside the group, says she was coerced at age 13 into a carnal relationship with a minister. She can quote from The Davidito Letter by heart, and considers it "the child care manual for the Children of God."

The Family has a reputation as the ultimate in sackcloth-and-ashes millenarian cults, but sex with children has been a constant. A pamphlet written by Berg for his adherents twenty years ago, My Little Fish, had in it a photo of an unidentified adult stroking the penis of a boy of about three years in age. Heaven's Girl, an illustrated primer for teen-age girls, told the adventure of a young heroine who, while out flirty-fishing, is brutally gang-raped but perseveres to convert her attackers to Christianity.

Hooking for Jesus, sect leaders argue, was halted in 1987, when Berg instituted the great "Reformation and Revolution." They say that AIDS was a factor in the discarding of the Family's salacious sexual doctrine, provoking an argument from the Houston Chronicle on October 10, 1993. The "reformation" was extreme, though possibly not as complete as described by Family members. A January 1990 letter from Maria Berg's second-in-command ordered female members to require their "fish" to wear condoms. It also contained a section on "Which outsiders to still have sex with!" and advised them to restrict outside sexual activities to men in the "well-known" category.

Berg's disciples insist that the Argentine arrests are the latest instance of authoritarian jackboots tramping on their religious freedoms. Christie

A selection of the child porn confiscated from the COG's Argentina compound in 1993.

Richards, a sect leader in Cleveland, Ohio maintains that "flirty-fishing" is "something we totally stopped." Ostensibly, Berg has proscribed sexual proselytizing, but former Children only shake their heads. Berg himself has, in a "Mo" letter to his congregation, warned that "sexual freedom must never be indulged in or practiced openly in the presence of visitors, strangers or uninitiated relatives or friends."

Julia Berg, his granddaughter, has quit the sect. She now lives in a mountain canyon two hours from Los Angeles, where she looks back with anger on her life in the COG. Women in the community, she says, "including pregnant girls, were ordered to do 'flirty-fishing' at night to bring in new members." She says that she learned by the "love of God" to conceal from outsiders the sexual teachings of Moses Berg.

Political Sugar-Daddies

The Children of God have gathered alms from powerful admirers. Chief Inspector Juan Carlos Rebello, who led police in the COG raids, said "we found evidence suggesting that the Family was funded by influential businessmen worldwide." One Argentine magazine found that some financial supporters of the cult were "well-known and powerful people," and pondered whether Berg's disturbed mental state "is being exploited by a network of powerful people to sexually control an army of children." Julia Berry, the prophet's own kin, has said that it was her "privilege" to be paired sexually with "very important men—men from the government." The Children of God, she said, "always had very powerful friends.... I met presidents from around the world. The children's chorus gave us an image of purity and innocence. It was a seduction."

According to the Washington Post for June 2, 1993, "the Family's leadership follows a policy of lying to outsiders, is steeped in a history of sexual deviance and has even meddled in Third World politics." Edward Probe, a Canadian who once edited Family publications, worked in the Philippines from 1986 to '88. He told the Post that "Family officials openly sympathized with right-wing military officers who tried to overthrow the government: What we were doing was supplying all the moral support." One former member from Costa Rica told Argentina's Gente magazine on September 9 about her life inside the cult: "My father used to have certain privileges inside the organization," she said. "He was considered a very important person for public relations. His paternal grandfather, the criminal lawyer, Guillermo Padilla, was a close friend of Chile's military dictator Pinochet, and Juan Carlos, the king of Spain." Pinochet and Carlos became financial and political benefactors of the cult.

The Family, according to David Hubert, a former member, contends that sexual evangelizing was used to curry political favor. "They would target special people," he told the Washington Post, "in the media, lawyers, in the government."

The guiding inner-circle of the Family is known as the Royal Family, and blue-bloods have in fact been sought out by Berg. In the 1970s, the prophet's "official representative" and second-in-command was Barbara Convair, the Italian duchess of Zoagli and Castelvari, rechristened Queen Rachel. Then in her twenties, the "ravishing, long-haired No. 2 leader" was rumored to have been a Berg consort. In 1973 she married Duke Emanuel Convair, a sect member, who invited the Family of Love to his estate, a wine-producing farm near Florence. The Duke graciously donated a vineyard to the cult. Germany's Stern reported in 1977 that a school on the estate trained women in the ancient art of religious prostitution. When Time asked her about the allegation, she denied it... but insisted: "There is nothing wrong with a sexy conversion. We believe sex is a human necessity, and in certain cases we may go to bed with someone to show people God's love."

In Bromley, south London, a recruit's millionaire father donated an abandoned factory, adapted as the Family's headquarters in England.

And they could not resist the call of the Holy Land, migrated to Egypt, and were expelled in November, 1985. Egyptian law, it seems, forbids the unorthodox sexual and religious practices of the cult. In 1977 the Children of God found a new messiah in Colonel Muommar Ghaddaffi, who offered them sanctuary from police investigations in California and New York. Louis Lefkowitz, the attorney general of New York, had charged them with kidnapping, brainwashing, imprisonment, enslavement, prostitution, incest and rape. But the U.S. Justice Department unexpectedly dropped the case, concluding, "'brainwashing' and 'mind control' do not constitute violations of federal law.... We have also concluded that the possibility of drafting effective federal criminal legislation in this area is unlikely." The New York attorney general's fraud division also lost interest in the case. "When it came time to prosecuting the group," reported the Los Angeles Times, then Atty. Gen. Lefkowitz sidestepped the issue with the claim that the Children "were protected by the First Amendment—a baffling rationale that later aroused suspicion the report was issued mainly to placate influential parents who had lost children to the sect. Lefkowitz, now retired, says he doesn't recall the matter."

The Justice Department probe hardly amounted to a bloody inquisition, but the Children cried religious persecution and fled the country. They left behind some nagging questions, foremost among them: Who murdered one of the Children in 1976, the body discovered with crushed internal organs at a medieval Belgium fortress? And who killed Berg's son, found in the same condition in Switzerland a few years earlier? Berg accused unnamed "enemies" of the Children for the murders. His critics blamed the sect. The public statements of some of Berg's followers fed their suspicions. In Canada, the Children declared on a national network that they were capable of lies, theft, murder, anything if so ordered by Berg. In 1972 a COG defector told NBC that she had been trained to commit criminal acts, including murder.

In Libya, Colonel Ghaddaffi was enamored with the cult. He provided them sanctuary, counsel, and even penned a song, addressed to "all industrial countries," performed at Children of God songfests around the world:

Do as I do.
I pray to God.
I'm very happy
Because I found the road
With Allah, Allah, Allah.

You hate Negroes.
You do not pray.
You have lost your way.
You're life is a falsehood
Without Allah, Allah, Allah.

The Children rechristened the budding psalmist "Godhaffi." Moses Berg enthused in New Nation News, a sect newsletter: "There has not been another worldly political leader in modern times as this young prophet of the seemingly impossible. There has hardly been such a godly world political leader since the days of his own prophet Mohammed... Jesus." Berg portrayed Ghaddaffi—now a deity—as "the savior who will ignite the young and rescue them from those twin forces of evil, godless Communism and American materialism."

Berg's politics were shared by messiah Ghaddaffi. Muommar Ghaddaffi was a product of the Libyan secret service, a branch of government assembled by Adolph Eichmann, Otto Skorzeny, Heinrich Muller and other engineers of the Final Solution who, like Berg, enjoyed the protection of totalitarian Middle Eastern despots. (Besides the Children of God, Ghaddaffi was also the patron of the infamous Paladins, a coterie of Nazi mercenaries from West Germany. Founded by Colonel Skorzeny, Hitler's commando chief, and the CIA, the Paladin group was responsible for a 1973 airport bombing in Rome that claimed thirty-two lives. They have linked up with death squads in Latin America and terrorists in Europe, South Africa and elsewhere.)

But the Libyan leader's fascination with the Children of God quite possibly ran through religion and politics to unconventional sex. His personal life is rarely discussed. He is said to be sexually eccentric, another trait he shares with Moses Berg.

Berg and his "prophet of the impossible" also found common ground in violent opposition to Israel. Reclusive, eccentric Moses David held a peculiar set of political beliefs for a demigod. One of his commentaries insisted that a small group of international Jews lurk behind a worldwide conspiracy. Berg assailed Jews again in a 1982 "Mo letter," and "their stooges, the Negroes... the curses of the world," the source "of everything that's evil." Berg claimed that his hatred of Jews and blacks sprang from a higher authority—"I'm a racist because GOD is!" he exulted in one of his delirious "Mo" letters.

In 1978 the COG changed its name to the Family of Love (and so continued to operate in Argentina after the Children were banned). By this time they boasted some 250,000 converts in 60 countries. The sect currently estimates that its ranks number about 300,000.

In the United States the political pull of the sect extended to the Bush administration. A chorale of Family children kicked off a Christmas show in 1992 for Barbara Bush in the East Room of the White House, for which they received certificates of appreciation signed by President Bush. The sect also sang for Bush after he toured the ravages of Hurricane Andrew in south Florida. (It wasn't the first time Bush's name arose in connection with a child prostitution cult. At the 1988 national Republican convention in New Orleans, Larry King of Omaha—a ranking GOP figure and convicted credit union rip-off artist—sang the National Anthem. In 1990, Nebraska state senator Schmit set out to investigate King and his circle of political operatives and business tycoons, alleged to have operated a national child prostitution network that catered to wealthy patrons. Shortly thereafter, Schmit received an anonymous phone call warning him off.)

The Family's political clout tends to put a damper on judicial investigations. Julia Berg recalls that adults in the Buenos Aries chapter "talked very openly about sex in front of children." At the age of 13, she alleges she was forced into a sexual relationship with a local pastor, and after leaving the Children attempted to press for his prosecution. But the judicial system, she says, flatly ignored her. After a police raid in 1989, Berry requested that a court-appointed physician examine her. The judge complied, but the doctor refused, explaining that he didn't want her "traumatized" by the examination—an ordeal, she says, incomparable to the trauma of molestation. "The doctor wouldn't accept my word that I wanted the examination." Family officials like to point out that "not once have we been found guilty of any kind of child abuse." This is true even in cases backed by solid evidence. The suggestion is that they are blameless, but another interpretation is that strings are pulled by well-heeled patrons to stifle public disclosure.

Police came away from the 1989 raid with cocaine, pornographic video tapes and childrens' books with condoms adhering to the pages. No Family members were prosecuted. Likewise, investigations in Brazil and Spain also fell apart. In May 1992 police in Australia swept into six Family communes, removing 142 youngsters. A key witness for the prosecution recanted his testimony and charges were suspended. Another case in Melbourne awaits trial. In June 1993 French authorities raided 12 of the sect's homes, but the court ultimately returned 40 children to their parents. Another raid in Spain also unraveled. Likewise, the September '93 raids in Argentina led nowhere. In December it was determined that a federal judge had no jurisdiction the case, and the sex abuse charges were dropped.

The Family is most assuredly not suffering religious persecution for their admittedly "controversial sexual beliefs," as the cult leadership often claims.

"Who Killed River Phoenix?"

The fatal overdose of River Phoenix on Halloween leaves hanging a host of questions concerning his death. Why is it, for instance, that three days later medical examiners announced that autopsy tests were inconclusive—but ruled out foul play? If the cause of death was unknown, how could the coroner possibly dismiss the possibility of murder? Toxicology tests revealed that the morphine levels of the cocaine and heroin ingested by Phoenix were respectively lethal. The day after he overdosed, the question reverberated on Hollywood streets: "Who killed River Phoenix?"

The conclusion that Phoenix died of an accidental overdose seems premature. No needle marks were found. The identity of his supplier is known. He is not some shadow melting back into narco-obscurity. Five witnesses, according to unconfirmed reports, accompanied Phoenix to a West Hollywood apartment at 10:40 p.m., on October 30, before departing for the Viper Room. One homosexual Los Angeles tabloid reported that the drug dealer who gave Phoenix the fatal dose "has been seen back in action at the club." If so, why wasn't he so much as questioned by police?

Media interest in the Family was eroded by false reports that Argentine prosecutors had been hamstrung by a lack of medical evidence. In fact, the death of River Phoenix coincided with investigations of the Family spreading across Latin America. The last thing the cult needed was a popular junkie film star shattering the news vacuum in the U.S. media by expanding, in some Hollywood fanzine, on his sexual initiation in a cult with notorious international political connections.

In fact, River Phoenix had a reputation for talking too much.

In the press, the Phoenix family has distanced itself from Berg's flock, emphasizing their separation from the Children of God. "We were flower children," John Phoenix told People magazine in September, 1987: "We were full of faith and loved everybody." John Phoenix was so deeply rooted in the cult that he was named "Archbishop of Venezuela" by the group. Rainbow Phoenix, River's sister, told Life in August, 1987 that she debuted as a performer at South American shopping plazas. "We used to sing and hand out pamphlets," she said. "But after two years in Venezuela, the family wanted out of the cult." Arlene Phoenix, River's mother, complained, "the guy running it got crazy. He sought to attract rich disciples through sex. No way."

The veneer of bohemian innocence was shattered in 1991 when, in Details magazine, River recalled his childhood in the cult. He admitted in this interview that he had intercourse at age four and sex with other children until the age of 10.

River Phoenix violated the cult's stricture of secrecy by discussing his early sexuality with reporters. Two years later, on All Hallow's Eve, at the most critical period in the Family's history, he was poisoned with a drug overdose. Had he lived, River Phoenix could have proven to be a dangerous liability to the cult, confirming reports of sexual abuse and child prostitution circulating throughout South America, but largely snubbed by the domestic press. Moses Berg's Family sleeps with powerful political allies.

Did one of them have reason to silence River Phoenix?

The Family Responds:

Note: The Family disputed many of the allegations made in the preceding story in Paranioa magazine Spring 1995. A point-counterpoint response to the cult by Alex Constantine follows the Family's comments.

My name is Phil and I've belonged to the organization, The Family, for over 20 years. I was in the former movement, too, known as the Children of God. I read your article with interest, and from what I understand of the "tone" of it, it is your intention to present an "alternative view" of the situation and circumstances surrounding the death of River Phoenix, which doesn't normally surface in mainstream media coverage. You seem to view River's death as being shrouded in mystery that might involve a type of "cover-up."

My reason for writing you is simply to ask: "How much do you really know about The Family?" My intention is to offer a better insight into our organization. We've opened our doors and had many visits to our communities by academics, sincere journalists, professionals, law enforcement officials, social workers, etc. who've wished to "see for themselves" what we are like. There's nothing we are trying to hide!

You present The Family as a dangerous "cult" and "sinister organization" with its tentacles sucking on politicians, powerful financial figures, and able to manipulate whomever it will. Is this your personal and professional opinion as well? Or is this an article that will "sell a copy" and fascinate its readers? If the case is the latter, let's hope that the readers will take it with a grain of salt and let it flow in one ear and out the other. As a Family member, I find it quite erroneous and I've counted 10 such gross misinterpretations of tnuth and/or wrongly quoted "out of context" statements.

Speculations of The Family being "some sort of intelligence tool" and escaping criminal prosecution through the efforts of influential friends and backers" and, finally, "whether River Phoenix had been contacted by, or was going to be contacted by, the Argentine prosecutors investigating the Family." And If so, "did the cult want him silenced?" My response is: Would these speculations of yours hold any water in a court of law? The Family is not any sort of intelligence tool; nor is it secretly and clandestinely backed by political or financial figures; and we detest the notion that we as an organization would ever even conceive of "silencing someone" to escape the law or justice! Honestly, I can't find anything in The Family that would lend itself to such an allegation or even permit such intentions to exist.

The Family does not permit any substance abuse or abuse of its members and children. Such abuse is against our very basic tenets. We are opposed to any and all forms of violence—and these are not permitted in our communities.

As you also said: If only for the memory of River Phoenix, that cult's most famous abuse victim, it's time to ask "Why?" I, too, would like to ask you "why?" if any law enforcement agency, prosecutors, or whoever want to assert any type of action against The Family, we'd like to know why and based on what evidence or charges?

I've enclosed some material regarding The Family. I hope it [provides] a better or more conclusive view of our organization and its founder, as well as our true beliefs and practices:

OUR ORIGINS. The Family traces its origins to the Jesus Revolution of the late 1960s. Our founder, Father David, started a ministry of hippies in southern California, many of whom were subsequently delivered from drugs and chose to work with him to reach and help others. The group grew and was given the name The Children of God (COG) by the media. By 1978, the COG had become established in scores of countries. However, when reports of abuse of authority by some COG officials began to surface, Father David dissolved the COG and invited those interested to join him in a new fellowship, which over the years became known simply as The Family.

OUR BASIC BELIEFS. Our basic beliefs and doctrines are the same as those of millions of Christians the world over. We hold the Bible to be the divinely inspired Word of God, that Jesus is the only begotten Son of God, and that through His death on the cross redemption was brought to mankind. Salvation is a gift given freely by God to anyone who sincerely acknowledges their need for a savior and asks for Christ's forgiveness. We are persuaded by Scripture that we are living in the last generation prior to Christ's visible return to Earth.

Two of our beliefs which many mainline Christians do not agree with have fueled much of the controversy about out fellowship. We hold that Father David is a prophet of God for this generation, and that loving heterosexual relations between consenting adults is not a sin in the eyes of God, provided that it is with the agreement of all involved, and hurts no one.

Our children are safe from abuse. Although much has been made of our sexual beliefs and practices, our children have not been abused. We acknowledge that our sexual beliefs are controversial, but we emphasize that we do not promote nor condone any behavior that is unloving or perverted, let alone illegal. Sex is a very minor part of our lives. But rather than adopt the hypocritical double standard of much of today's secular society and even many professing Christians, we prefer to be honest and state our sincerely held religious convictions on the subject.

Our children are not permitted to engage in any sexual activity that is improper or illegal, and our teens are strongly encouraged to refrain from sexual relations until they are of legal age. If various American polls are to be believed, Family teens are much less active sexually than the average American teenager.

We cannot emphasize strongly enough that we do not tolerate any form of abuse of children within our communities. Sexual contact is prohibited between anyone over the age of 21 with anyone under 21. Offenders are expelled from our fellowship. In spite of the most determined efforts of our detractors to smear us with charges of child abuse, our members have always been completely exonerated by authorities who have examined our children and communities.

QUOTATIONS TAKEN OUT OF CONTEXT. Many of tbe quotations from letters written by Father David were taken out of context in these recent articles. Over a period of 23 years, 35,000 pages of Father David's writings have been published. As he is by nature an outspoken iconoclast, it is inevitable that some of his statements can be misconstrued....

Some articles have also quoted excerpts from a few of the more than 50,000 other pages of literature we have published throughout the years. Many of the controversial publications in question have long since been removed from our commumities, and in no way reflect the current practices of our membership.

The report about the discovery of 300 videocassettes in the La Herencia house does not coincide with the 251 video cassettes submitted. None [erotic videos] were found during the raids.

Another remarkable development is that after three months of having the phone lines of their multiple residences tapped, it was not possible to seriously associate any part of the conversations recorded with the exercise of the mentioned prostitution, nor were detected any possible rendezvous, encounters or invitations for the actual practice of the same.

At any rate, it is necessary to point out that the presence of the torn hymen is not sufficient to ascertain the concrete occurrence of the charge of the abuses claimed, especially considering these same young girls themselves stated that they in no way suffered abuse [as] hymen tears and damages may be the result of causes other than intercourse. There has not been the slightest shred of evidence to prove that any of the corruptive acts described above have actually occurred to any of the minors named in this proceeding.

We must remember the past. History shows us the struggle for freedom has always been between memory and forgetting, remembering the past, but working for the future. We permitted the demonization of the Branch Davidians. The reason people won't fund an independent investigative panel on Waco, is because this was a "cult"! People say, "There was evil there, sin. A threat to our religion, a threat to our established institutions, to our government, to our way of life." Everything that I work in, in terms of fundamental human rights and freedoms and peace, is terribly infected by the capacity for demonization in modern society.

We speak constantly in terms of "cults," but once the word "cult" is pronounced, most people can't think beyond that; the religious group becomes something inherently evil. The well has been poisoned and you can't drink out of it. As concerns The Family, it's absolutely appalling to observe what is happening to them around the world. It's clear beyond question that it involves inter-governmental coordination and communication, and the cooperation and participation of groups that call them selves "anti-cult" groups, who want to protect, as they see it, the population worldwide. Organizations like C.A.N., the Cult Awareness Network—which I've observed in several contexts now—have close relationships with law enforcement.

The Family is a very small, highly integrated group, numbering in a handful of thousands, spread all over the world. Since 1990, the attacks on them have been constant in Spain, Argentina, Australia, France and Peru. Argentina is perhaps the most flagrant case, with [over a] hundred children taken from their families, and scores of adults imprisoned. All of these cases have finally totally dissipated. There are some still in progress, but there is not a single case in which a single court or government agency has established a single incident of child abuse. All of these cases have ended—the ones that have ended—not only with a vindication of the church conduct, the parental conduct and the condition of the children, but with criticism or condemnation of government action as being ideologically based rather than factually based, reflecting inadequacy in investigation.

The trauma is something not talked about—the trauma of those children! Hundreds and hundreds of children all over the world were taken away from their parents. I think of those little kids in Waco, you know what the trauma on them was—they're dead! Suppose a little child had lived, might not that episode consciously and inescapably have been a dominant factor for the remainder of his life, affecting his perception of society and his interrelationships?

> The government of the United States, including the State Department, has shown awareness, international presence and suspicion regarding The Family. Interpol has involved itself with several Family members, in response to police input. The religious community must address this phenomena of the capacity of governments to brutalize small, unpopular religious groups who can be demonized when called "cults," and then action is taken against them without evidence. If a conventional crime is committed, it should be addressed, without calling a whole group a "cult" and condemning it and arresting all the adults, taking away all the children, keeping them in institutions, while they wonder where their mommies and daddies are.

Family Values—Alex Constantine's Rebuttal

In Paranoia 6, a spokesman for the Family, Phil Edwards, rebuts recent news stories written by "self-styled" critics of the cult, "without the interest of journalism or news reporting where investigative reporting, gathering of facts and analysis go into producing a written article." Sic! As a matter of fact, in preparation for a 1994 article on the cult for Hustler magazine, I collected every scrap of information I could find, primarily from European and South American newspapers. I went so far as to have publications from across Latin America translated after the Argentine raid on Family compounds, and culled all the information available from the UCLA research library's 11 million holdings. The claim that critics of the Family are making things up is as humorous as it is facile. He is relying on public naivete to promote an image of the group, a mere "handful of thousands" (elsewhere Edwards boasts of 9,000 members) as blushing innocents with a fierce devotion to gospel and "controversial" but widely-misunderstood "sexual beliefs."

The cult has a long history of lying its way out of tight situations, and Edwards is simply following this protocol for dealing with the press. River Phoenix himself publicly acknowledged that he'd been initiated to the cult's "sexual beliefs" at the age of four. Yet Edwards insists the cult does not "promote or condone any behavior that is unloving or perverted, let alone illegal." Perhaps he has not been informed that the Family's "sexual beliefs," as detailed in the cult's own publications, are proscribed by law in every civilized country on earth. What Edwards means to say is that the Family does not openly promote sex with children—he would undoubtedly argue that children's books with condoms stuck to the pages, seized in a raid on a Family compound in 1990, were planted there by disingenuous heathens from the press.

Edwards doesn't much care for the word "cult" to describe the Family. I'd prefer "doomsday sect" or "criminal syndicate" myself, so at least on this score we agree. On every other major point that Edwards makes, it is demonstrable from a thorough gathering of facts that he is relying on traditional, tried-and-true cult tactics for dealing with critics in the press—flagrant disinformation and smears.

To illustrate: The group has long claimed to be the target of political repression, especially when routed by police. Political martyrdom was a fundamental teaching of cult founder David Berg, the reclusive "prophet" who foretold the coming of the Anti-Christ and the rise of a "One World Government." This, of course, is far-right religious programming, the same dogma (excuse me, gospel) disseminated by the 700 Club.

But the Family is decidedly not suffering religious persecution for their "controversial sexual beliefs." On the contrary, if the group was harried by authorities—as were, say, the Black Panthers, Angela Davis, Allard Lowenstein or Danny Casalaro—the group could not boast that "our members have always been completely exonerated by authorities."

Exoneration even comes when there is solid evidence of wrong-doing. Last year, litigation concerning the Family in Australia was aborted after a secret Cabinet decision was made to overrule Dr. John Patterson, the Secretary of the Department of Health. Newspapers in Australia reported that preempting the secret judicial proceeding—in which Dr. Patterson had been "gagged"—was a "political" decision. Patterson was dumbfounded because his department had considered the evidence of child abuse strong enough to make a case for imposing legal measures to protect the 86 children it represented.

Phil Edwards, in his capsule history of the cult, misrepresented the cult's reasons for changing its name. "When reports of abuse of authority by some COG officials began to surface, Father David dissolved the COG and invited those interested to join him in a new fellowship, which over the years became known simply as The Family." The true story points up how tolerant even the most repressive political regimes have been of the cult's excesses. Years ago, Argentine authorities outlawed the Children of God. The cult simply changed its name to the Family and was therefore permitted, by some sort of oblique political reasoning, to remain in Argentina. Some crackdown.

Even the 1994 raid on 10 Family houses in the elite northern district of Buenos Aires came only after police had been swamped by complaints from the public over a three-year period of stubborn inaction.

Somos magazine reported on September 13, 1993 that the group's compound in Pilar is situated on "five kilometers of land hidden by high walls, constructed like a fortress off the Pan American highway." When Argentine authorities flew over the estate in a private plane, they discovered three observation posts on the roof. With binoculars, Commissioner Hugo Gabutti spotted three contingents of rondinas, or armed guards. "They operated in military fashion," Gabutti said, "looked and acted military. The security measures taken by the sect are incredible."

Appended is some of the child pornography seized in the Argentine police raid—including photographs of young children engaged in sex with adults. The kiddy porn should put to rest the ersatz claim made by Edwards that "we do not tolerate any form of abuse of children." Nonsense. When the police entered Family homes in well-heeled Buenos Aries suburbs, they discovered children who "seemed like Martians, autistic," according to the London Times for September 5, 1993. "They were living in compartmented cells and answered questions like automatons." The police came away with "videos showing the children, some of whom had been separated from their parents at age 12, performing various sexual acts with adults and each other." One cult house functioned strictly as a punishment facility to imprison some 50 adolescents.

Yet Edwards, in his transparent apologia, maintains that the cult's detractors “smear us with charges of child abuse.” T’ain’t so. It is because members incriminate themselves so thoroughly that the Family has fallen into disrepute.

The group’s spokesman argues falsely that the only evidence of molestation found in the Argentina raid was a single torn hymen. This, Edwards claims, “is not sufficient to ascertain the concrete occurrence of the charge.” I would agree—if it was only a matter of one rent hymen. But on September 11, 1993, the Guardian reported that medical examinations turned up “boys with anal wounds and girls as young as nine and 11 with torn hymens and flayed vulvas.” The physical evidence was backed by psychological evaluations and documents seized in the raids, including freshly-printed birth certificates for children kidnapped by the group in Peru. Yet, as usual, the cult “denied all the charges, and claimed it is being subjected to religious persecution.” In Montevideo, Berg’s followers assembled at the Argentine consulate to wave banners declaring “Police Stole Our Children Like the Gestapo.” One Family leader accused the justice system of “torturing our children with physical examinations.”

Another criticism hotly denied by the group is its affiliation with influential patrons. The Argentine journal Gente reported shortly after the arrests that “many well-known personalities around the world were involved as main figures of political and financial support of the sect. Among them is Libya leader Muommar Kaddafi, and the Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet.”

Such connections led the magazine to ponder whether Berg was being “exploited by a network of powerful people to sexually control an army of children.” Another of the cult’s patrons is King Juan Carlos of Spain—adored by Franco as the son he never had—whose sexual appetite is legendary. In Italy, the Duke of Castelvari permitted the cult to use his estate, according to Time magazine, to train “good-looking disciples in the arts of seduction.” Joyanne Berg, the granddaughter of the cult’s prophet, claims “it was my ‘privilege’ to sleep with important men. I met many presidents from around the world.” George Bush had the Family to the White House for a Christmas celebration, so I have to wince when Edwards bemoans “the capacity of governments to brutalize small, unpopular religious groups,” and denies political connections.

(The nagging irony is, as a dissident political researcher, I have, on many occasions, been brutalized by the government and its hired guns. I have often been followed, harassed, beaten and even tortured. Why? Because I write, among other things, about CIA connections to the mind control cults. So who should write to complain about my research but the Family—with a Pennsylvania Avenue return address, no less.)

This fine, upstanding religious organization argues that many of Father David Berg’s more outrageous comments have been quoted “out of context” and “misconstrued” by such heathens as myself. This is the same Berg who in 1982 published a book that described his preschool stepson engaging in sex with a nanny, interspersed with quotes from the prophet himself about how God expects children to enjoy intercourse with adults. (The Age, an Australian newspaper, reported on April 30, 1994 that a raid there found explicit literature on cult premises warning children that "they would be taken away if they revealed their sexual practices to outsiders.") Berg once, when accused of harboring anti-Semitic feelings, opined boldly that "God himself is anti-Semitic." Berg's belief system was clearly pedophilic and fascistic. Out of context or not, his own published statements damn him more than any critic of the cult, and such expressions of perversion and race hatred are impossible to misconstrue.

Even more disturbing are reports from around the world that the cult's leadership engages in Satanism, which frequently fronts for CIA mind control activity. Scholar Douglas Pritchett compiled an exhaustive, book-length bibliography on the Family in 1985, noting that "Mo" Berg has advocated witchcraft and claimed to have slept with goddesses. He once boasted that he had copulated with an incubus. The raids in Argentina were followed by reports from around the world that Family children had been drawn into Satanic rites. The charges in Buenos Aries included "sexual abuse, deprivation of liberty," and the use of children in "abhorrent Satanistic acts."

The London Times story reported there was evidence "the Family was funded by businessmen worldwide and that children were kidnapped in one place and taken to another so that they would be difficult to trace." Mind control cults with a religious facade often operate at this level of disregard for human rights—and are allowed to get away with it.

Phil Edwards is a slippery religious huckster straight from the pages of Flannery O'Connor. His rebuttal to press reports on the Family is a weak attempt to convince the public that his sect is a victim of the establishment, when in fact it is a behavior-modified, morally-diseased appendage of it.

That cults are dangerous has been proven time and again. That they are often fronts for intelligence activity is indisputable (as anyone who has dug into researching CIA mind control experimentation knows full well). Edwards has made a sentimental appeal for sympathy with a lot of pious talk about political martyrdom. Pathetic. I have watched in horror time and again as otherwise intelligent people have fallen for the whining of cult leaders and the CIA's hired guns in academia and the media, and it is a painful thing to observe.

But it is infinitely more painful for the true victims, particularly children, who are traumatized for life by the sadistic intrusions of mind control, and forced by public denial to swallow their rage at the transparent deceptions of cult apologists like Mr. Edwards.

Chapter Nine

A Sordid Tale of Two Cities:

The Conspiratorial Republican Elites of Omaha, Nebraska and Wilmington, North Carolina

Few newspapers reported it, but Omaha had become a hotbed of scandal. In October of 1989, Police Chief Robert Wadman, his shirt-sleeves still smoldering, cleared out of town. He left behind a growing awareness of his entanglement in a clique of well-heeled conservatives led by Lawrence E. King, an upper-tier Republican and the disgraced director of the looted Franklin Credit Union. Larry King, a name once tossed around freely at the White House, kicked off both the 1984 and '88 GOP conventions with his rousing basso rendition of the National Anthem. He nurtured Washington connections until the day Franklin was raided by federal agents.

The credit union was closed in 1988 after it was discovered that King had spirited away $39 million. The state legislature launched a probe, and the Franklin Committee soon found itself immersed in a nightmare of political corruption that trailed off to the Reagan-Bush White House, Republican political circles, the CIA and a national child prostitution network.

A February, 1989 report released by the committee relates a conversation between James Flanery, a reporter for the Omaha World-Herald assigned to the Franklin story, and Carol Stitt, director of the Foster Care Review Board, that took place shortly after the raid on King's credit union. Flanery complained that the FBI stopped cooperating with him after it was discovered that King was shipping guns and currency to Nicaragua for the CIA. Flanery considered resigning due to "the possibility of a White House connection," and King's ties to "a number of big people." Flanery told Stitt that he was edgy talking on the phone. "His editor was distressed," Stitt said. He had "edited" Flanery's copy, expunging political connections.

Among King's co-conspirators in Washington was the infamous Craig

Spence, a former ABC reporter and the proprietor of a call-boy service in Washington, D.C. The Washington Times ran a series on Spence in June, 1989, reporting that he had established a sexual blackmail operation on behalf of the Central Intelligence Agency. His lavish parties were attended by such luminaries as William Casey, Ted Koppel and Eric Severeid. Paul Balach, a ranking adviser to Labor Secretary Elizabeth Dole, immediately resigned under a cloud, admitting that he had received blackmail threats from one of Spence's male prostitutes. Five months after the series appeared, Spence was found dead in a Boston hotel room, an apparent suicide.

The King scandal might well have blackened scores of political reputations if not for the body count. Spence's suicide was soon followed by the plane-crash deaths of Gary Caradori, chief investigator for the Franklin Committee, and his son in July, 1990. A National Transportation Safety Board brief reported that Caradori radioed that the cockpit compass had swung erratically. His transmission was cut short by an in-flight break-up that scattered the wreckage of his Piper PA-32R across a wide swath of Ashton, Illinois. The Transportation Board ruled that a damaged wing stabilizer had failed and separated from the aircraft.

Other bizarre fatalities soon followed: two important material witnesses "died in their sleep." Four others were shot dead. One was strangled, another dropped from a window. Harmon Tucker, school superintendent and a suspected molester, was found dead in Georgia, his cadaver bearing ritual marks.

At the center of the carnage stood Lawrence King, Jr. In March of 1990 a federal magistrate ruled that the powerful conservative Republican was mentally incompetent, an opinion founded on the report of Dr. Dorsey Dysart, chief psychiatrist of the Federal Medical Center in Springfield, Missouri. Dr. Dorsey diagnosed King as a delusional paranoiac of a "grandiose type." The doctor held that in his condition, "the intellectual system of grandiosity leads to disorganization of thought processes." King was therefore ruled too delicate to withstand a lengthy trial, and a growing political scandal withered from public view.

The prosecution of Lawrence King culminated in a sentence totaling 15 years for the looting of Franklin Credit Union, but he is permitted to serve his sentences concurrently, a very liberal sentence considering the magnitude of the crime.

The conviction handed down by Judge Van Pelt, a political team-player, applied solely to gross financial misconduct. His grand jury "found probable cause to believe that King… used money or items of value to 'entice, inveigle, persuade, encourage or procure' men in their late teens or early twenties to engage in acts of prostitution." But the grand jury's "belief" was never addressed in the courtroom. By suppressing the male prostitution charges, Van Pelt re-enacted a role familiar to him. In 1984, for instance, Van Pelt was accused by 43 residents of Cairo, Nebraska of covering up the murder of political activist Arthur Kirk by a state police SWAT team.

Among the melange of well-off Nebraskans linked to King was multimillionaire Warren Buffett, a ranking shareholder in the Washington Post and Cap Cities/ABC, not to mention the financial leviathans American Express, Wells Fargo and Salomon Brothers. All told, his wealth has been appraised at an excess of $4 billion. Buffett hosted Larry and Alice King's tenth wedding anniversary party, and Buffett's wife was a volunteer at Franklin Credit Union. Buffett has tried to distance himself from the scandal, but he couldn't hide the fact that King sponsored a fund-raiser for Buffett's son in his run for commissioner of Douglas County, Nebraska..

John DeCamp, a former CIA operative and Nebraska state senator, alleges in The Franklin Cover-Up, the fullest account of the case to date, that Oliver North cavorted with King and his circle of rich Republicans. The connection to North was publicized by the New York Times, which noted that King contributed $25,000 to Citizens for America. The CFA booked speaking engagements for North. "King was a founding member and one of its largest contributors," DeCamp notes. He contends that King, as Franklin's director, laundered cocaine cash for the Nicaraguan counter-revolution at the behest of CIA operatives. In fact, King hobnobbed so frequently in Washington that he rented a second home off Embassy Row for $55,000 a month.

Another notable link to King was Ronald Roskens, the former chancellor of the University of Nebraska. The notes of deceased Franklin Committee investigator Caradori report that Roskens was "terminated by the state because of sexual activities reported to the regents and verified by them." A year later, Roskens was appointed by President Bush to direct the Agency for International Development, a major CIA cover. By 1992 the House Operations Committee chaired by Rep. John Conyers, Jr. (D-Michigan), called for the dismissal of Roskens. A 107-page staff report alleged that Roskens' "abuse of the public trust during his crucial first year in office had gone unchecked" until AID's inspector general and Congressional oversight "forced a change in his pattern of behavior." The report also noted that AID had "more high-ranking employees convicted of federal crimes during the past two years than any other agency or department of the federal government."

The twice-disgraced Roskens quit his post in November, 1992 to promote the foreign policy proposals of the Interaction Council (a group that includes Gerald R. Ford, Mikhail Gorbachev and former French leader Valéry Giscard d'Estaing).

George Bush surfaced once again in connection with King's syndicate of eminent satyrs, specifically Harold Andersen, former publisher of the Omaha World-Herald.

According to DeCamp, "Harold Andersen moves in the upper circles of the U.S. intelligence community." When Andersen's reputation began to suffer as a result of his friendship with King, "his friends at the Nebraska Society of D.C. staged an awards dinner in Washington to polish his image." Bush sent a testimonial memo in praise of the adviser to the U.S. State Department.

Omaha's upper-crust is a small, tightly-knit cast of characters overlapping a small, tightly-knit cast of characters in Washington, D.C. According to Birmingham Post-Herald reporter Andrew Kilpatrick, Harold Andersen is "an old friend of Buffett's." The multi-billionnaire has also linked up with Bush, rather conspicuously, when they withdrew from a formal ceremony on November 28, 1990 for a private conversation. "We may never get the details," Kilpatrick writes. "But the discussion was about business, not politics."

Of Andersen's Beltway alliances, the most revealing is Robert Keith Gray. "Said to be Harold Andersen's 'closest friend in Washington,'" according to DeCamp, "Gray is also reportedly a specialist in homosexual blackmail operations for the CIA." The blackmail ring was, a vice squad official told DeCamp, established by Roy Cohn, the skulking ultra-conservative homosexual pimp. "Cohn's job was to run the little boys," the official told DeCamp.

Gray is one of Washington's most notorious Republican operatives, a fierce insider and public relations tycoon. The child prostitution charge against him gained credibility when Gray's name surfaced in the internal inquiry of the short-lived Congressional page-boy scandal. The probe was abruptly killed when a lobby of Washington homosexuals clamored its opposition. Susan B. Trento, Gray's biographer, reported that Congress was "discouraged from pursuing any further investigations in these areas in general." Lucky Robert Keith Gray.

In 1992 the Franklin Committee released a 91-page final report, stating that the investigation changed course when Gary Caradori produced for the committee a video-taped statement from Alisha Owen, who claimed to have been a witness and victim of sexual abuse. "She named persons of prominence in Omaha... involved in the abuse." She alleged that Chief Wadman had fathered her child.

And she offered to prove it, signing a voluntary agreement in January 1990 to submit to a lie detector test. The FBI refused to administer it. An independent agency did. She passed. Two other juvenile witnesses passed as well. Wadman countered by repeatedly telling the press that DNA tests proved his innocence. But an Omaha reporter who has followed the case from the start advises: "Forget about the DNA-blood tests... they never happened."

This powder-keg was dropped on the table of the committee, which was soon "haunted" by the possibility of a backlash of the sort that followed the McMartin preschool molestation case.. Would the public support Owen? Would there be attacks on her and the witnesses who stepped forward to confirm the allegations? Would Chief Wadman and his co-defendants apply pressure to bury the investigation?

Given the sensitivity of the probe, the committee decided to conduct it as quietly as possible, at least until indictments were handed around. But before witnesses could be induced to testify, bootleg copies of the Owen tapes were leaked to the press. State Senator Loran Schmit and his colleagues on the panel found themselves in the eye of a whirlwind fed by heated public speculation and gossip.

Michael McKnight, a reporter for Omaha's WOW-TV, later told Owen that the station purchased the video tape from agents of the FBI. The station had also purchased Caradori's taped interviews with witnesses Troy Boner and Dan King from the FBI. The tapes had been given to the Bureau by members of Schmit's committee.

From the Franklin Committee's final report:

> The act of broadcasting the tapes was exceeded in arrogance and irresponsibility only by the news media efforts to convene impromptu panels of self-proclaimed experts to talk about whether the stories in the tapes were 'believable' or not. We were bewildered as to how the investigation was furthered, or the public interest served, by such circus events. Did it not occur to anyone in authority within the news media that none of these "experts" had first-hand knowledge of anything.... They had nothing to offer except meaningless opinions. It occurred to us that these so-called "expert opinions about whether a story was true or not were just that, opinions.... A public debate of this nature is counterproductive... and polarizes the community.... Media hosts interviewed "experts" who had seen the tapes, and who criticized Caradori's questioning techniques. In fact, the investigation turned toward Caradori with charges that he unnecessarily led or coached the witnesses, or perhaps induced them to lie, or coordinated their stories for some undisclosed gain, perhaps book or movie rights.

The committee began to feel a force beyond their control running away with the case, moving it silently toward a predetermined end. Somehow, King had the wisdom to remove pornographic material from his home and office. He cabbaged it away in the trunk of his car. The FBI, however, confiscated a pornographic video featuring "local children"—yet no attempt was made to locate them.

Somehow or other, the invisible hand always bested the committee. A raid on the home of World-Herald columnist Peter Citron produced "a vast quantity of pornographic material." Citron pled no contest before a grand jury convened in March, 1990. The prosecution failed to introduce evidence against his cohort Alan Baer because it vanished, as did computer disks seized by police listing the names and addresses of every child he'd photographed.

The thieving wraith of the evidence room struck again after the legislative committee subpeonaed video-taped interviews of Alisha Owen and other witnesses from the FBI and Nebraska State Patrol. The FBI synopsis of the tapes, prepared for the attorney general, contained testimony that never appeared in the tapes. Owen complained that Troy Boner's deposition had been shed of corroborating details. "In one instance," the Franklin Committee's final report noted, "there was no break in the tape yet Boner's shirt was different from the previous one."

The evidence-devouring ghost had an ally in Owen's first legal counselor, Pam Vuchevich. When the abuse revelations surfaced into public view, Alisha Owen was serving a prison sentence for passing bad checks. On March 9, 1990 the FBI and state patrol searched her cell and removed evidence she'd assembled to support her grand jury testimony. The FBI drew up an inventory, but when the articles were returned some were missing. They had been scratched off the list. Ms. Vuchetich was dismissed, and charged with two counts of abusing attorney-client privileges. Two weeks later however an FBI agent appealed to the Omaha Bar Association on behalf of Ms. Vuchetich, and the charges were tossed out of court.

To judge by the 177 phone calls she made to the FBI in early 1990, Vuchetich betrayed more than a client's confidence. In April, 1990 she prodded Alisha Owen to lie that she conspired with Mike Casey, an Omaha reporter, to fabricated the sex scandal as raw grist for a TV movie. Owen refused.

Meanwhile, Paul Bonacci, one of some 80 child witnesses, recalled for Frances Mendenhall, a reporter at the Nebraska Observer, his descent into Omaha's sexual underground. In 1979 Bonacci met a man named Walter Carlson at an Independence Day picnic. Carlson took the boy home, where they watched cartoons, pornographic videos and eventually had sex. Bonacci was eleven years old.

He met Citron, the World-Herald gadfly, at a public park. Bonacci says that he was flown to California, Colorado, New York, Minnesota and elsewhere at the behest of the mercurial Larry King, and prostituted to politicians and wealthy businessmen.

Like other children drawn into King's circle, Bonacci tells a grim story:

> Mendenhall: Did you believe that they would kill somebody?
> Bonacci: They did.

> Mendenhall: Who did they kill?
> Bonacci: It was in California.... We picked up Nicholas who went out with us and when we got there, I don't know where we landed at or where we were at, they had me tied and drugged up. They took us out to a place and all I can remember is that there was a Kern River or something that went by, there was a bridge that had a name on it. It was near there that we would wait. And they had this little boy that was in a cage.... First they told us we better do what they told us. They told us we'd better do what they wanted or they'd kill us too. So we did everything they told us.

The children were used like sexual "rag dolls," Bonacci said, by a group of adults, among them Larry King. The incident took place in Bakersfield. Bonacci claimed that the orgy was attended by local cultists.

In a complaint filed with the U.S. District Court of Nebraska, Bonacci describes how, at twelve years-old, he was forced to attend "sexual parties" and "sadistic rituals" attended by influential citizens of Omaha. He was beaten on February 13, 1981 "for refusing to participate in a sadistic ritual." He was, according to the complaint, "burned with cigarettes during sadistic orgies." With no exit from his predicament, and shaken by the suicide of another child participant in these functions, Bonacci too tried to kill himself. He told Alan Baer, an official of J.L. Brandeis & Sons, a local department store, that he wanted out. In July, 1983, says Bonacci, Baer ordered a drive-by shooting to eliminate the possibility of exposure.

Bonacci estimates that he participated in 25-30 group sex rituals between 1979 and 1984.

Taped testimony from both Owen and Bonacci deals at length with former Omaha Police Chief Robert Wadman, whose beating heart kept time with the pulse of a secret Omaha. Chief Wadman mixed well with King's melange of Promethean tycoons, CIA procurers and Beltway politicians. In 1962 he began his law enforcement career, his father's vocation, with the San Diego Police Department. He was 21. Wadman left the force in 1968 for a stint at Utah's Brigham Young University. He turned up next in San Luis, Arizona, assigned to the DEA, according to his resume.

In 1976 he he was selected as chief of police in Utah, and two years later state deputy commissioner of public safety—an ironic position considering his part in the 1979 slaying of an unarmed civilian. Jerry Springer, whose only offense was a refusal to enroll his children in a public school, had been lured outside his home by Wadman and two sidekicks posing as reporters. Springer ran, the officers shot him in the back. Springer's widow sued, retaining Gerald Spence as her legal counsel, and received an undisclosed settlement. Wadman resigned and was asked to leave the state.

The Springer episode dogged him in Omaha. For two years the police union fought his appointment as chief. He met Alisha Owen, then 15, at a party in August, 1983. Also present were Larry King, Alan Baer and Harold Andersen. En route to the party, a friend promised cocaine and alcohol. When Owen arrived, King's guests were watching a pornographic video. "She observed a young boy... sitting on Harold Andersen's lap," according to Caradori's notes.

A month later, she attended another of King's parties, where she says she was forced into a sexual encounter with Chief Wadman, ala Caradori:

> He [Wadman] indicated to Alisha that he knew she wasn't a virgin and he felt her breasts. He told her that she had nice breasts. He felt her genitals and un-zipped the zipper of the jumpsuit she was wearing. She asked him to stop and he grabbed her wrist very tightly and twisted her wrist. He then removed her clothing and asked her if she knew what fellatio was. He said that he would show her what it was. He then instructed her to perform oral sex. Robert Wadman's pants and underwear were down.

Owen began to cry. She told Caradori that she went to the bathroom and vomited. Paul Bonacci was not called to testify that he had witnessed Wadman and Owen engaging in sex. Troy Boner recanted his testimony, but later admitted that FBI agents had threatened to kill members of his family if he testified against Wadman.

From A Carefully-Crafted Hoax, a book written by Owen's sympathizers in Omaha:

> Alisha Owen's perjury trial began on May 17. Judge Raymond Case of Plattsmouth was brought out of retirement to preside over the trial in the Douglas County District Court.... The prosecution spent the majority of its time in painting Owen as a promiscuous tramp. But the charges against her were for perjury.... The outcome of the trial should not have been in doubt. Before it even began, Judge Case ruled against several of the defense's pretrial motions and consistently refused to allow important items to be introduced as evidence (for example the tapes of Boner and King). There was much in the way of evidence the jury was not allowed to see.

Owen was sentenced to 9–15 years in prison for alleging that Chief Wadman was the father of her child. Before the sentence was overturned on appeal for retrial, she served more time in solitary confinement than any other woman in the history of Nebraska.

Wadman, not one to let a prime opportunity drift by, filed a $4,000 suit against Amanda, Alisha's five year-old daughter, supposedly to recoup the expense of a blood test. Wadman's itemized expenses include a first-class flight to Chicago and four days of missed work. But a charge of filing false paperwork was filed by Owen's attorney. Chief Wadman, it seems, had actually been on vacation in Arizona, and his counter-suit was thrown out of court. He paid $25 in court costs.

But by this time Wadman had resigned and moved to Aurora, Illinois. Aurora's Mayor Pierce selected Wadman for chief in September 1989. The local Beacon-News reported on June 6, 1991 that he was selected after "a lengthy national talent search conducted by the International Association of Chiefs of Police." Wadman once again reigned as top cop, but announced his resignation nineteen months later. He repeatedly declined to comment on his reason for stepping down, but Aurora Mayor David Pierce cited the Omaha scandal as a decisive influence. Wadman told the Beacon-News that the "false allegations" of Alisha Owen had undermined his authority. The paper reported falsely that "genetic testing has shown that Wadman was not the child's father."

One Aurora cop told the Beacon-News: "I'm not sorry to see him go. My only regret is that he's not going today."

Meanwhile, the pornographic photos and tapes seized in the Citron raid began to prove an embarrassment to some of Omaha's most prominent citizens. At first, the police department denied having the child pornography until one officer admitted it at Citron's 1993 federal trial. In the photos are the faces of King, Wadman, Andersen, Baer and others engaged in criminal acts, according to the Nebraska Leadership Conference, a non-profit citizens' group supportive of the children in the case. The police, caught suppressing the photos, refused to make them public, then decided to destroy them. Lawyers and investigators flew to Omaha, and a federal judge ordered the police to hand over the evidence. Citron was convicted. Andersen resigned as newspaper publisher. Alan Baer, the department store official, is rumored to be hiding somewhere in California.

Wadman surfaced next in North Carolina. Despite his record, Wadman was selected in 1991 above 200 other applicants for the position of police chief.

But it wasn't long before fallout from the Omaha case burned him once again.

In January 1993, Ron Lee Silver stepped off a train from Hollywood. Frustrated with his prospects as an actor, he moved to Wilmington, which boasted several newly-formed film companies. Coincidentally, he had passed the long rail ride from California reading John DeCamp's book on the Franklin affair, and was already aware of Wadman's notoriety.

Driven by a sense of outrage, Silver says, he appeared at a Wilmington City Council meeting on January 5, 1993 to argue for the recall of Chief Wadman. The Wilmington Morning Star, which is owned by the New York

Times, reported two days later that Ronald Silver "met a reception ranging from skeptical to hostile." But, as the paper noted, the aspiring actor was not the first to berate Wadman: "A growing faction of the Wilmington police department believes Mr. Silver's story might be true." Alas, "the resurrection of these allegations could bring internal discontent to levels Chief Wadman has not faced yet."

Silver asked that the city council conduct an investigation of past pedophilia and child prostitution charges.

Wilmington Mayor Don Betz had hired Wadman. He flew into a rage, blustering that he hadn't fought for two years in Vietnam, "in cold water eating cold food," to permit this blatant "abuse of free speech" to continue. Betz abruptly ended the meeting. The following day, Chief Wadman countered that the accusations were "a pack of lies" that could only affect his police work. "Every allegation has been made by people clearly identified as a supporter of Lyndon LaRouche," Wadman argued.

Silver's city council appearance made headlines, polarized public opinion. Supporters of the Chief claimed that Silver was a trouble-maker who had nothing better to do than pester "the Chief."

The local media rallied to Wadman's defense. A Morning Star editorial on January 8 attacked Silver, rejecting the charges against Wadman with a smirk:

> PATHETIC FANTASIES AREN'T SO HARMLESS
> Wilmington Police Chief Bob Wadman, who looks like a human being, is actually a seven-eyed alien from the planet Emmo. He has makeup done at the movie studio. "Mr. Wadman" (Zorgo is his real name) is high priest of an intergalactic cult whose goal is to seduce Earth's Christian children into unspeakable practices that will cause them to give birth to talking yams.

Public interest was stimulated by the headlines and the release of DeCamp's book in Wilmington. The Star reported that "local bookstores are selling copies as fast as they can get them," but assured readers that the book only "rehashes discredited testimony," and declared falsely that "followers of political extremist Lyndon LaRouche have been linked to the effort to discredit Mr. Wadman."

Silver was unprepared for the counter-charges and his sudden role as citizen-reformer. Disgruntled police officers began calling him with their own horror stories concerning the chief. There was talk that Wadman had been ham-stringing local police efforts to stem the flow of drugs into Wilmington.

So it seemed peculiar to Silver when the local media rushed to the Chief's defense.

Wadman claimed publicly that Silver had threatened his life.

Furthermore, he accused Investigator D.P. Pridgen of the Wilmington police force of plotting secretly with Silver to defame and "murder" members of his family. In a letter to Pridgen, the chief claimed that the "death threats" were a direct consequence of the loud city council session. In an internal WPD complaint filed on March 5, Pridgen noted that Wadman was "trying to gather enough information… to have Silver arrested." Further, Wadman "badgered, harassed and intimidated" Pridgen in a failed attempt to link Silver with a crime.

On a local radio talk show Silver emphatically denied the accusation he'd threatened Wadman. The hostess of the program repeated the charge that Silver was a "kooky," possibly dangerous conspiracy theorist bent on defaming an honorable city official:

> Interviewer: Hey there, good morning!
> Silver: I'm Ron Silver, the subject of your call-in show today.... Let's talk about two undisputed facts. One, [Chief Wadman] has been punished for misconduct. And the other is that he claims I have threatened his family. It has even evolved into "a group of people" who threatened his family. When I heard that, I tried to get in touch with the police and cooperate since I was a "criminal suspect." I agreed to take a lie detector test. They wouldn't talk to me. The Chief has fabricated all of this. He bases his misconduct on fabrications and lies. No one has threatened his family that I know about, and I certainly haven't.

Silver denied that he had any connection whatsoever to Lyndon LaRouche, nor had anyone he knew. "Where are they, these fantasy LaRouchians coming out of the woodwork to haunt the poor chief?"

> Interviewer: Mister Silver, what is your vendetta against Chief Wadman?
> Silver: I have no "vendetta." I went before the council to exercise a political right. It was my duty as a citizen. I believe that he isn't qualified.

Silver's interrogator accused him next of "trying to make a quick buck." He said that he hadn't made a dime. Then why was he doing this? Silver replied that it was a matter of conscience. "Your chief has a history. The FBI synopsis lists him on no less than 40 pages in the Franklin investigation. It isn't over."

The morale of Wadman's foot soldiers struck bottom. This undercurrent of discontent at the station house swelled into a wave of insurrection.

Nobody knew who on the police force was behind The Wadville Herald, a raunchy newsletter parody with one subject: "Chief Bobby Wad," and his loyalists, or "Wadsters." One issue featured lyrics to the tune of Jimmy Buffet's "Fins":

He came down from Illinois
It took him three days to get trained,
Lookin' for a piece who's quiet,
Can't get caught again.

Another song lyric crowed,

Well, my name is Bobby, but they call me The Wad.
Ask me what I want—I want a young kid's bod.
Don't want them too old, want them while they're still growin',
A cute young thing like Alisha Owen.

Under "The Meaning of Wad," the editor of the Wadville Herald supplied the following definitions: "common viper," "vermin," "evil pedophile," "an illusion or fraud," "abnormal animal," "pompous," "dull" and "ludicrous failure."

The title-page for a biography of Wadman, garnished with swastikas, entitled Mein Wadman Kampf, portrayed the chief as "a pedophilic, occultic dictator."

The Chief apparently did not inspire much loyalty in the rank-and-file.

Meanwhile, the Wilmington City Council was looking into Chief Wadman's past—and meeting secretly to discuss the Omaha powder-keg and the charges leveled at him. City Manager Bill Farris attempted to stop the secret discussions, and was summarily asked to resign. "The councilmen who wanted Mr. Farris to resign gave differing reasons," the Star reported on February 4, "ranging from differences over philosophy and financial policy to concerns about the police force." Beyond that, no specific explanation was given.

The Chief met the resistance head-on, applying talents honed in the Nebraska cover-up.

On February 2, Investigator Pridgen was ordered to Internal Affairs. He was interrogated by Lt. Pulley and Captain Thomas, both loyal to Chief Wadman. They asked Pridgen a few questions about his extracurricular contacts, then sent him back to work.

Shortly thereafter, Lt. Pulley entered Pridgen's office. "The Chief doesn't think you are answering the questions honestly," Pulley said.

"I did," Pridgen insisted. "Am I being accused of something?"

The lieutenant handed him a questionnaire to answer in written statements. The first: "Have you ever given any information to Ron Silver concerning any child sex abuse case?" Pridgen answered no. The remaining questions concerned any information he might have passed to Silver.

Since Pridgen had never met him, he felt the interrogation meaningless. He complained to Captain Thomas that "the people I associate with are Christian and respectable people," not "trouble-makers." But Chief Wadman was determined to find a conspiracy. The next day, Pridgen was ordered to Captain Thomas's office. "The Chief doesn't feel you are being honest," Thomas said.

"What part of NO did the Chief not understand?" Pridgen snapped. He was sent back to Internal Affairs. "I was told the Chief of Police Robert Wadman had filed a complaint against me. I asked for a copy of the complaint and was advised they were not required to give me a copy." Pridgen was charged with compromising the investigation of Ron Silver, who has not been charged with any criminal offense.

"I was harassed, falsely accused, intimidated with punishment and continued harassment," Pridgen wrote in his grievance. "When I was overseas in India and questioned by… radical anti-American communist rebels, I was treated with greater dignity." Wadman, he charged, had abused his authority and launched an "inquisition" based on fabricated charges. Information needed by Pridgen to defend himself was withheld in violation of departmental directives. "I have been refused, willfully, intentionally, deliberately, thoughtfully, maliciously, a copy of the allegations against me," Pridgen complained. He gradually awoke to the realization that Chief Wadman had "something to hide." "It is not a recognized method of investigation to continue to harass and intimidate and distort," Pridgen complained.

On March 5, the Morning Star reported that the Chief, concerned about "death threats," had launched an investigation of the whistleblowers.

A newspaper OpEd piece backed Wadman: "CHIEF, NOT MALCONTENTS, DESERVES CITY'S SUPPORT." The editorial applauded his performance, noting, "police foul-ups and cover-ups are down." Most dismaying, the editors sighed, was J.D. Causey, a city councilman who "seems to take seriously the loony accusations made against Mr. Wadman by people who have hounded him across the country." The "loony accusations" amounted to reading a book and discussing it openly, provoking a backlash as Wadman's reputation came home to roost.

When one city councilman tipped Silver that he was being followed, he packed his bags and moved to Nebraska to look more deeply into Wadman's past.

Back in Wilmington the tide of public opinion turned on Wadman when the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, the largest Christian organization in the country, sent lawyers to publicly retract support for him. The Police Benevolent Association did likewise, demanding that Wadman be indicted. On April 5, he was suspended for a week without pay for leaning on Pridgen and another officer. Silver appeared at the next council meeting to deny that he threatened Chief Wadman and offer to take a lie detector test. The council listened, but made no comments and adjourned silently.

Undeterred, the Morning Star again sided with the Chief in Wilmington's "police scandalette." The town was assured that Wadman's sins, distilled by one OpEd page minimalist from a closed hearing, were "relatively minor." After all, "the Chief says he and his family have been threatened. Understandably angry and worried about what his tormentors might do next, he apparently overreacted." After all, Wadman's indiscretions were "akin to neglecting to read a suspect his Miranda rights."

But the Wadman case continued to heat up, according to Silver. "The Chief is being investigated by the FBI for bribing a police officer," Silver says. "Several officers have stepped forward to say that I never threatened his family, that they did the investigation and the city attorney (Tom Pollard) had the information but covered it up."

Chief Wadman's turbulent career drew to an end, but the inevitable was postponed by the blindly jingoistic maneuvers of his cronies, operating with all the finesse of an Elizabethan secret society.

In July 1994 Wadman was yet again forced to turn in his badge and epaulets.

The CIA's Black Budget & Domestic Operations

Chapter Ten

E. Howard Hunt's Death Squads

David Atlee Phillips, the underground government's savant of psychological operations, once claimed to have learned about Devil cults from E. Howard Hunt and his CIA partner, William Peter Blatty of Exorcist fame.[1]

Of his roots, Hunt writes in his memoirs, "Captain James Hunt served in the Revolutionary Army and was a landholder of means in northern Manhattan. It is after him that Hunt's Point, now New York's municipal area, is named." E Howard's Victorian forebear, Leigh Hunt, the radical political essayist, served two years in a British prison for his subversive broadsides. Henry "The Orator" Hunt was a convict as well. He went on to become a minister of Parliament.[2] Hunt's grandfather held a series of political offices in New York State, including, consistently enough, commissioner of prisons.

"While I was myself a prisoner," Hunt once lamented, "I was often to reflect on the irony of my fate."[3]

E. Howard's father was a 32nd-degree Freemason—that is, a "Sublime Prince of the Royal Secret." Together with William Donovan of the Office of Strategic Services (OSS), he was founder of the elite Buffalo Athletic Club, a member of the Banker's Club, the Drug and Chemical Club and, under Donovan's tutelage, founder of the New York chapter of the American Legion.[4]

Hunt's deceased wife, Dorothy de Gautiere, was secretary to Averell Harriman, the Skull & Bones ambassador, when the aristocratic pair met in Paris. "She told me that she had spent the war years in Berne, Switzerland," Hunt recalled later, "working for the Treasury Department's Hidden Assets Division, the section that sought Nazi assets abroad. At the end of the war, she was sent to Shanghai to open the Treasury office there, and had served as technical adviser on a Dick Powell film, To the Ends of the Earth, the story of Treasury's involvement in international narcotics traffic."[5]

Their honeymoon was cut short by CIA orders to join Frank Wisner's Office of Policy Coordination (OPC). Early on, the OPC roll-call was made up almost entirely of Nazis recruited by the CIA, with a domestic power base that included John J. McCloy, Harriman, and James Forrestal. Hunt was assigned to the Political and Psychological Warfare staff to develop training courses on covert operations. He conferred often with the CIA's Dr. James Burnham, who once wrote an article for Life magazine praising rule by elites, and through him met William F. Buckley. The brainy and garrulous Buckley would be the first on Hunt's recruitment list when he opened the Agency's station in Mexico City.[6]

In the early fifties, Hunt trained Cuban exiles. They knew him as their cultivated patron, "Eduardo." His reputation within the CIA was less than resplendent, however.

"Listen to his music, not his words," Phillips once warned.[7]

Henrik Kruger, in The Great Heroin Coup, chronicled Hunt's forays into drug trafficking in collaboration with the Chinese Triads providing support to the Kuomingtang. In the far east he "served" with William Pawley, Lucien Conein, Mitch WerBell and Paul Helliwell, the same cabal of ultra-Rightists who founded the Latin American branch of the World Anti-Communist League.[8]

In Mexico, Hunt's job had been to sow anti-Communist fever. In his cleansed and self-serving memoirs, Hunt tells of disrupting Communist meetings with stink bombs and itching powder. More subtle PsyOps included the planting of a story in the Mexican press that falsely quoted a Leftist leader disparaging the "cultural inferiority" of Mexican peasants.[9]

In the 1950s the Pentagon transformed Guatemala into a counterinsurgency base to control the central parts of Latin America. The instrument of the decimation of democratic rule in Guatemala was a CIA operation called Operation Diablo—a blood purge directed by Hunt and David Atlee Phillips. E. Howard Hunt and Tracy Barnes, Allen Dulles's closest aide, ran newspaper commentaries claiming that Arbenz, the Guatemalan leader, was a closet Communist. To succeed Arbenz, Hunt freed the murderous Castillo Armas from prison. Frank Sturgis and Jack Youngblood took charge of training the death and destruction squads, and on June 18, 1954 the "Army of Liberation," led by Armas, crossed the border from Nicaragua into Guatemala. Unmarked CIA planes provided air cover. The CIA's proxies seized control of the government, and in August declared martial law. On cue, the military appropriated 800,000 acres of land from the peasants. Thousands of them were ruthlessly slaughtered. Hunt thus proved himself a capable handler of death squads, a talent that held him in good stead when Operation 40, a Cuban assassination team, was placed under his supervision in 1960.[10]

Hunt worked well with a menagerie of ogres. In May 1961 the dictator of the Dominican Republic was murdered. Political researcher Donald

Freed wrote: "Documents would indicate that President Kennedy learned of the plan to kill Trujillo only after the debacle of the Cuban invasion in April 1961." Kennedy's adviser Richard Goodwin ordered the CIA to not supply weapons for the dictator's assassination. Nonetheless, on May 30, 1961, Trujillo was ambushed and gunned down with carbines furnished by Langley. Among those on the CIA payroll and the death squad detail were Hunt and Sturgis.[11]

Hunt had extensive connections to organized crime, especially the national syndicate said to have been run by Seymour Weiss of the Standard Fruit Company (the sponsor of the Guatemalan coup) and Mafia kingpin Carlos Marcello. In 1958, Hunt organized an "anti-Communist" conference in Guatemala. The conference chairman was Antonio Valladores, Marcello's attorney in New Orleans. Also present at the meeting was Maurice Gatlin, whose office at 544 Camp Street was, in the CIA shell-game investigated by Jim Garrison, a base of operations for the Kennedy assassination.[12]

As might be expected, the Hunt cabal in the Nixon White House reeked of felony. Hunt was a close ally to Bernard Barker, a Bolivian bagman. The Cuban "Defense" Fund of Dr. Manuel Artime was a conduit for hush money to the Watergate burglars.[13] In the 1980s, Artime surfaced as the mentor of Ramon Milian Rodriquez, the money-laundering, "freedom-fighting" gallivant of Iran-Contra fame. Another of Hunt's allies in Nixon's Plumbers unit was Robert Mardian, a fierce neo-fascist Armenian and assistant attorney general in charge of the security division of the Justice Department under John Mitchell. J. Edgar Hoover once referred to Mardian as "that Lebanese Jew."[14] Co-felon James McCord was once described by Hunt as "self-centered, devious and sanctimonious... a weakling determined to save himself at all costs."[15]

Hunt's chain of unholy alliances peaked with the covert operations of the Nixon administration. As Hunt told it, psychiatric care for his daughter Lisa—whose memory was mysteriously wiped clean in 1970—forced him to "retire" from the CIA. On recommendation from Richard Helms, Hunt took a job with Robert R. Mullen, a former press aide to Dwight D. Eisenhower. The Mullens public relations firm had established and operated the Free Cuba Committee. Hunt's fellow cold warriors included Douglas Caddy, a Young Americans for Freedom founder and an attorney for General Foods. Robert Bennett, a former Miami operative for the Permindex assassination team, handled the Hughes Tool Company account.[16]

The sort of public relations Hunt engaged in came to light when Louis Tackwood, a former LAPD provocateur, exposed Hunt's Squad 19 plan to incite a riot at the 1970 Republican convention in San Diego. Nobody was over Hunt, said Tackwood, "but the top dogs."

Tackwood: "He was in Dallas when they got Kennedy. He left out of there for the Caribbean." James McCord was "in on the concentration camp thing."[17]

The stamp of Howard Hunt's demonic imagination was most clear in the overthrow of Chile in 1973. David Phillips, Hunt's psychopathic protege, handled PsyOp chores, drawing on methods developed by the CIA in Vietnam: a campaign of highly-publicized atrocities (blamed on leftists) progressing in stages of psychological terrorism, culminating in mass beheadings and mutilations. Witnesses have described rivers clogged with headless corpses and piles of bodies set aflame.[18]

Hunt, we hardly knew ye.

Chapter Nine

The GOP's Pink Triangle & the CIA

The true story of gay Republican power-brokers and the CIA's Neil Livingstone, an influential covert operator who inhabits a grim netherworld of GOP pimps, kidnappers, cocaine, arms smuggling, blackmail, pedopile rings and Nazi collaborators.

In January 1993 a privately-commissioned squad of American and British mercenaries were arrested in Luxembourg, Germany for the bungled kidnap of two young American emigres. Donald Feeney, a veteran of Fort Bragg, North Carolina's "elite" Delta Force, and James Brian Grayson, the father of one of the kidnapped children (buffeted in a tempestuous custody dispute), were nabbed scrambling from the scene of the abductions. They were stopped by authorities in an attempt to return to the U.S. with the children, 10 year-old Elizabeth Pittman, and Anna Grayson, age 5.

They can expect certain history-book notoriety for a daring, if ultimately disgraceful covert operation masquerading as a Sylvester Stallone film production about Viking warriors.

The kidnap-for-hire team, trained by the CIA and mustered under the nondescript company banner of Corporate Training Unlimited (CTU), blew into Reykjavic, Iceland in a flurry of movie-industry posturing. Reykjavic police charged that the "crew," led by Don Feeney, drugged Erna Eyjolfsdottir and stole off with her children.

The cadre gained the mother's confidence by recruiting her to the bogus production company. Jacqueline Davis, managing director of CTU, posed as the party's location manager. She made the acquaintance of the girls' mother, and hired her as "Kim Bassinger's personal assistant." Don Feeney adopted the guise of "Mario Cassare," a flamboyant film director. Feeney's wife Judy and his partner James Canavan flew in to join Davis at the Hotel Holt posturing as Stallone's personal staff. Stationed at posh lodgings in Reykjavic, Feeney's "tug-of-love" operatives lavished a total of $35,000 on hotel suites, overseas fax messages and telephone calls to Hollywood—a gaudy smokescreen for the kidnappings, complete with local front-page publicity.

But the plot crumbled when a local newspaper received a tip that the film project was fraudulent.

Davis sequestered the girls' mother at the Holt and slipped her a "painkiller." She fell asleep... and woke to discover that the "crew" had stolen off with her children. She phoned police. Feeney and Grayson were about to board a plane for London with Anna when they were detained by authorities and arrested.

Judy Feeney, Davis and Canavan made it to Luxembourg, and police there rounded them up. Both children were returned to their mother. Feeney and Grayson were held by Reykjavic police on two counts of kidnapping. They were tried and convicted to two years in an Icelandic prison.

The notion of training paramilitary mercenaries for custody-dispute kidnap operations was conceived in 1985, according to CTU "chronicler" Neil Livingstone in Rescue My Child, an in-house public relations effort, "after Don and four other ex-Delta Force operatives polished off a case of Budweiser."

Four accounts of Corporate Training's "daring overseas rescues" are detailed in Livingstone's book, which appeared in 1992. It has been translated into eight languages. One of the company's kidnaps inspired an NBC movie-of-the-week, Desperate Rescue, starring Muriel Hemingway, and the network has announced plans to produce nine sequels. In eight years, Corporate Training has conducted seven successful snatch-back operations in Tunisia, Jordan, Ecuador and elsewhere around the world.

CTU bills itself as one of the nation's premier "boutique-sized security firms." The company's paramilitary training camp in North Carolina offers a variety of programs to corporate clients, police and federal agencies. Corporate "security" training courses offered by CTU include "Terrorist Operations," "Hostage Survival," "Surveillance and Counter-Surveillance," and "Explosive Devices." According to the course outline, the "Safe Haven" class instructs one in "How to prepare your office, home and vehicle to act as a secure area in the event of a criminal/terrorist attack."

The curriculum, despite CTU's disinfected image, could conceivably be construed as training in covert and mercenary warfare.

Corporate Training is based in Fayetteville, North Carolina, home of the Green Berets, the 82nd Airborne and—behind spiraling towers of concertina wire—the secretive Delta Force, a compound that denies access to all but military initiates and visitors from the Pentagon.

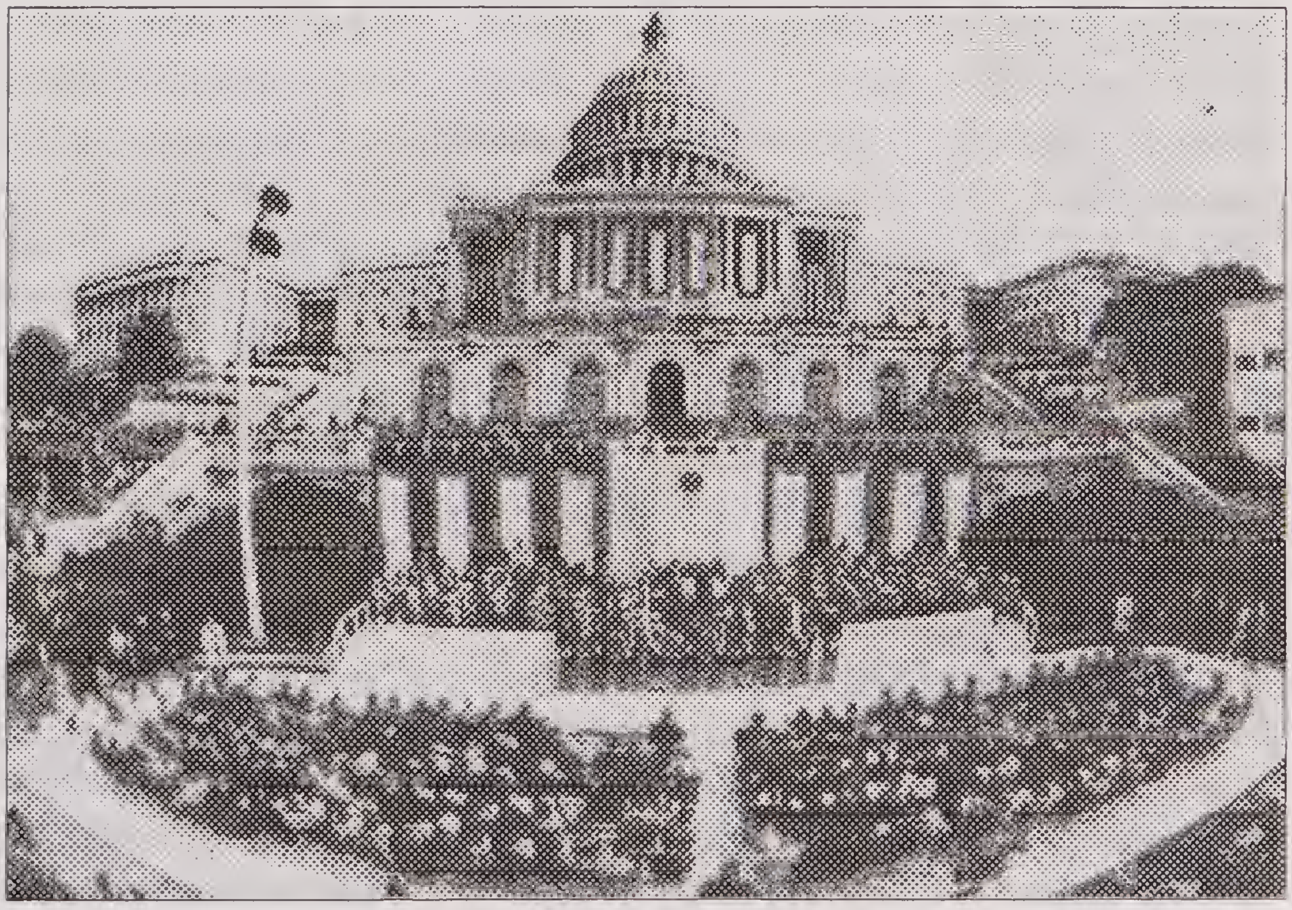
But the company's inauspicious origins and paramilitary public relations obscure connections to a frightening underworld on the ultra-right fringe, summed up by a company motto:

"KEEP AMERICAN CHILDREN AMERICAN."

Company founder Don Feeney, a veteran of Fort Bragg's Special Forces A-Team, grew up in Red Hook, New York, a largely Italian district. He joined the Army at 17, earned his wings and a place in Delta Force. He was sent on the failed 1980 mission to free American hostages in Iran. Assignments in the Middle East included a stint in Beirut and the organization of a cadre to rescue five American missionaries held hostage in the Sudan.

Feeney and his "tug-of-love mercenaries" trained for half a year at the CIA training camp known as "The Farm," in the wooded outskirts of Williamsburg, Virginia. "Their movements were restricted," Livingstone writes in Rescue My Child, "and they were allowed to venture outside only when a Soviet satellite wasn't making a pass overhead" Perhaps his training prepared Feeney to survive "Operation Eagle Claw," the doomed April, 1980 Desert One raid on Teheran.

Feeney also took part in the Richmond Prison sortie in the October, 1983 Grenada invasion, led by H. Norman Schwarzkopf. Media hype notwithstanding, Granada was one of the most ill-fated rescues in military history. One internal Pentagon document, published in Defense Week, found the mission "fraught with confusion... critical failures of military communication and faulty tactics." Intelligence officers Richard Gabriel and Paul Savage submitted a report describing Grenada as "a case study in military incompetence."



Republican power broker and CIA operative Robert Keith Gray was co-chairman of Reagan's gaudy inaugural ball, a recollection of imperial pageantry (and vapid megalomania).

Feeney's Blackhawk copter was blasted out of the sky. He survived—only to be thrown out of Delta Force a year later for refusing disciplinary action after an audit turned up financial irregularities in his Middle East assignment. He was stripped of his pension. Feeney organized CTU to keep a hand in the soldier-of-fortune set, and staffed the company with Deltoid soldiers of ill-fortune.

His closest partner was Dave Chatelier, a retired CIA agent with a 20-year background on the "dark side of the house" (covert operations in Eastern Europe). In 1975, Chatelier was transferred to Fort Bragg and assigned to the creation of an Army anti-terrorist team. Ultimately, the team came to be known as Delta Force.

Chatelier's contribution to CTU was a 60-acre farm, which was transformed into a mercenary training camp offering courses in "Explosive Devices," "SWAT (Special Weapons and Tactics)" and "Introduction to Terrorism."

CTU spokesman Neil Livingstone participated in the planning of the Reykjavic disaster. The kidnap may have been a dismal failure, but Livingstone isn't. He is an ominous by-product of the CIA, one of the most powerful intelligence operatives in the country, a designate to corrupt foreign leaders and international arms dealers. And he inhabits a criminal world of male prostitution involving minors, rendering dubious the company blurb: "Fortunately for a few mothers there is a court of last resort: the ex-Delta Force commandos of CTU."

Livingstone, an "expert" on international terrorism, is a frequent expert guest on television news programs, in which capacity he once publicly defended the CIA's assassination manual.

The research departments at the network news bureaus can't be accused of digging too deeply into Neil Livingstone's past. He entered the grim world of espionage as a foot soldier in the Agency's heroin-infested proprietary, Air America. Livingstone was recruited by James Cunningham, founder of the airline—and a key figure in Edwin Wilson's treasonous off-the-shelf arms sales to Muammar Ghaddaffi. One biographer referred to Wilson, currently serving a life sentence for his black market escapades, as "an aberration of modern intelligence."

So is Neil Livingstone.

As a junior executive at Gray & Co., a Washington, D.C. public relations firm largely manned by right-wing CIA and military intelligence personnel, he climbed the corporate ladder instantly by interfering in a Congressional investigation into a homosexual sex and drug ring. The enterprise was operated by Robert Keith Gray, CEO of the firm, whose client roster has included Charles Keating, BCCI, Adnan Khashoggi, Richard Berendzen and Duvalier's Haiti. Gray was also a member of Reagan's first presidential campaign team, and a suspect in the missing Carter briefing books affair.

Livingstone was brought into the firm by Charles Crawford, head of Gray & Co.'s international division. Crawford is a politically hard-right product of the Army Counter-Intelligence Corps (CIC) and the national security operatives of the Reagan-Bush period. Under Crawford, the International Division served as a branch office of the National Security Council and Oliver North's "Enterprise." He has a long and sordid history in covert ops: as a CIC agent, Crawford assisted the escape of "special refugees" (fugitive, Nazi-collaborating Ustashi agents) from the U.S.-occupied zone of Germany along the Vatican's Nazi ratline escape routes.

At Gray & Co., Livingstone entered a hidden pocket of Washington politics. Reporter Susan B. Trento discovered that "Gray's button-down world of Republican politics, conservative business clients, and high society events turned into weekend sex parties with young men where drug use was common."

This was the world that surfaced briefly in the Congressional page-boy scandal. Carl Shoffler, a retired D.C. police officer—he and four others arrested the Watergate burglars—and a witness in the investigation of the House cocaine and call-boy ring, wrote that Gray "has used and supplied narcotics... thrown wild sex orgies at Rehoboth Beach... was affiliated with the infamous Ed Wilson... was used by the CIA. As a result of his past connections in the aforementioned areas and his close association with Ronald Reagan, his conduct has to be suspect in light of the fact that he ended up with the foremost lobbying firm presently operating in D.C."

When word filtered through the Beltway grapevine that the Ethics Subcommittee hearings, chaired by Congressman Stokes, would focus attention on a cocaine ring in the House using Congressional pages as couriers, Livingstone was called to testify. The probe revealed that the services of male prostitutes had been provided to leading politicians by the Diamond Shamrock Corp.—a client of Robert Keith Gray & Co. Diamond Shamrock—a major producer of Agent Orange during the Vietnam War—is chaired by a former official of the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

But the Congressional investigation of the page-boy scandal was quashed after Livingstone's stonewall testimony concerning Gray's involvement in homosexual prostitution.

The Stokes Committee found that backstair political intrigues were rife—unfortunately, House investigators were instructed to cease any further inquiry into the male prostitution and cocaine ring. In the end, two Congressmen received reprimands.

One Congressional investigator told John DeCamp, a former CIA operative and Nebraska state senator, that the call-boys were run by the CIA, and the hearings adjourned prematurely because the prostitution ring involved "kids."

In the wings of the Stokes probe, Carl Shoffler was questioned frantically by Neil Livingstone and an ally, Tom Fortuin, counsel to Robert Keith Gray and former law partner to Roy Cohn, the late ultra-right homosexual Red-baiter, to determine how much the police knew of Gray's circle of drug-dealing, gay CIA Republicans.

Like Livingstone, Gray had worked closely in Edwin Wilson's arms network in the 1970s. Their cover was a CIA proprietary called Consultants International. Frank Terpil, a partner of Wilson, told Secret Agenda author Jim Hougan that the three of them "directed sexual blackmailing operations" out of Tong Sun Park's George Town Club in Washington, D.C. Terpil stated in a letter to Hougan that one of Wilson's Agency jobs was to sexually compromise Congressmen to keep them under thumb. Some legislators, it seems, "could be coerced by living their sexual fantasies in the flesh (with) a remembrance of these occasions permanently recorded via selected cameras."

The CIA's role in the scandal was submerged in the headline-grabbing page-boy revelations. But the origins of the Washington sex-and-drug operation predate Wilson and Gray, according to DeCamp. He investigated the male prostitution ring in preparation for his book on the Omaha child abuse scandal, which implicated in organized child abuse a circle of affluent Republican Nebraskans with connections to Reagan and Bush, and turned up an interesting bit of history.

The call-boy ring was started by Roy Cohn, whose associate Tom Fortuin would run backstage interference with Livingstone to kill the congressional hearings. A District of Columbia vice squad official told DeCamp that "Cohn's job was to run the little boys. Say you had an admiral, a general, a congressman who did not go along with the program. Cohn's job was to set them up, then they would go along. Cohn told me that himself." (Confirmation that Roy Cohn was a pimp to homosexuals in high places came with the publication of Anthony Summer's colorful biography of J. Edgar Hoover, and the revelation that young male prostitutes were procured by Cohn for Bible reading, rubber-glove trysts with the late FBI director.)

Gray and Wilson inherited the homosexual sex-and-drug network during the Nixon era, and by then it had branched out and grown, amoeba-like. The page-boy scandal was a small part of the CIA's sexual blackmail apparatus. In fact, 60 Minutes once reported that critics of Hill & Knowlton, then chaired by Robert Keith Gray, accused the Washington PR firm "of being an unelected shadow government." The male prostitution network presided over by Gray was featured in a 1982 article in The Deep Backgrounder, a newsletter edited by former CIA official Victor Marchetti, entitled "Reagan Inaugural Co-Chairman Powerful 'Closet Homosexual.'" Livingstone's loyalty to Gray is not the most propitious bona-fide for a "mercenary" in Corporate Training Unlimited's "tug-of-love" kidnap operation.

Nor were the death's head cufflinks Livingstone sported in Guatemala, where he was once employed as a registered agent of Dominga Moriera, an ultra-conservative presidential candidate. Gray's fixer in the Page-Boy scandal was rewarded for his stonewalling performance before the Stokes Committee by a promotion to senior vice president in charge of the International Division.

Livingstone's status in the country's most powerful PR firm allowed him to employ veteran CIA operators, including Rob Owen of Iran-Contra fame. Livingstone and Owen, in fact, collaborated on a public relations campaign for the Cuban-American Foundation. And it was Neil Livingstone who directed Owen to draw up a proposed contract with the Nicaraguan Contras on behalf of Oliver North.

Livingstone had long moved in intelligence circles. He had known former CIA Director Robert Gates since they were students at William and Mary College. Carter Clews, an international arms expert, worked with Livingstone at Gray & Co.—until a newspaper article in Spain exposed his role in the bribery of parliamentarians and undercover support to the fascist Popular Alliance Party, with its symbiotic ties to the Mussolini family. It also emerged that Gray & Co. had partaken in Iran-Contra by smuggling arms from Israel via Spain to Nicaragua. The company also engaged in secret contract negotiations for the defense firm of McDonnell Douglas.

The Washington Post followed up with a story denuding Gray and Livingstone as the brains behind the Spanish fiasco. Livingstone was forced to resign. But, in the shadow of Robert Keith Gray, he had blossomed into one of the most powerful intelligence operators in the country—a registered agent of Israel, one of the three trustees of Solidarity in Poland, an "expert" on terrorism at the conservative Center for Strategic and International Studies "and a leading light of Corporate Training Unlimited."

The revelations of Robert Keith Gray's involvement in sexual blackmail operations came with the publication of Power House, a biography by Susan B. Trento, in 1992. The book forced his resignation from Hill & Knowlton. Gray was succeeded as chairman by Howard Paster, a Democratic insider. Paster left the CIA-dominated company two months later to take the position of Bill Clinton's director of legislative affairs. But the CIA's male prostitution network survived the political pratfalls of Gray and Livingstone to surface periodically in the upper-tiers of the Republican Party.

Lawrence King, a 300-pound pedophile from Nebraska, Gray's home state, was alleged in 1984 to have operated a branch of the call-boy business in partnership with Harold Andersen, then publisher of the Omaha World Herald, and a close friend of Gray's. King, a baritone, sang the National Anthem at the 1984 and 1988 Republican conventions.

King enjoyed Republican society and took his conservative politics seriously. In 1987 he donated $25,350 to Citizens for America, an organization that arranged speaking tours around the country for Lt. Col. Oliver North.

In October 1988, King's Franklin Community Credit Union was raided by the FBI and IRS. A month later the Treasury Department filed suit to recover the $34 million that had disappeared from Franklin's vaults under King's management.

Before his arrest, King had commuted often to Washington, D.C. He was a business partner in a call-boy operation run by the late Craig Spence, whose antics were the subject of a week-long series published by the Washington Times in July 1989. The Times reported that Spence, a former ABC reporter, was said to have been running a CIA blackmail operation: Spence's Victorian Mansion on Wyoming Avenue, where he often threw parties for Washington's power elite, was "planted with electronic bugs and video recording equipment that, according to homosexual call-boys and others who routinely visited the house, was used to make incriminating tapes to blackmail guests." The parties were attended by the likes of William Casey, Ted Koppel, John Mitchell and Eric Severeid. A political tempest threatened when Spence's credit card receipts implicated Reagan and Bush appointees, but few names reached the public print.

Four months after the story broke, Spence was found dead at the Ritz-Carlton Hotel in Boston. Police ruled his death a suicide.

Another ramrod in the CIA's male prostitution network was Ronald Roskens, former chancellor of the University of Nebraska. Lawrence King had been one of his closest "advisers." Roskens was fired from the position in 1989 when his involvement in homosexual orgies was reported to the university's board of regents and verified by them. A year later, President George Bush called Roskens to Washington to head the Agency of International Development (AID), commonly utilized as a cover in CIA operations overseas. AID also disburses $7 billion in non-military foreign aid, and thus wields enormous geopolitical power.

In 1992 a 107-page congressional report was issued by Rep. John Conyers Jr., urging Bush to fire Roskens, who had "abused the public trust" for private gain until AID's inspector general "forced a change in his patterns of behavior." His "patterns," according to the Washington Post for October 2, 1992, included "taking thousands of dollars from outside organizations, including some that do business with AID."

This is the milieu in which Neil Livingstone travels. He has long nurtured a penchant to open a corporate intelligence front of his own, and in the child-snatching CTU he can flex his wings as a covert operator. Until his next misadventure blows up into another Washington scandal, Livingstone's will doubtless be a familiar face gracing the network news with his "expert" opinions on terrorism, and airing his para-military propaganda in CIA-backed publications like Soldier of Fortune.

Chapter Twelve

Funny Money—Johnny Carson, the CIA, and the S&L Crisis

Years before the public was made aware of the name Charles Keating, hints of impending financial disaster loomed in the back pages of the major dailies. In October 1982, the same month that President Reagan signed deregulation of the nation's thrift industry into law, the Commercial Bank of California in Beverly Hills announced a $2.5 million loan loss.

A founder of the bank, legendary NBC Tonight Show host Johnny Carson paid $1,950,000 for his shares of Commercial stock, and became the CEO. But the bank's financial troubles weren't all that preyed on Carson's mind. Tim Hoffman, an informant in the joint FBI/DEA investigation of John DeLorean, had informed agents that the auto maker had a partner in the cocaine trade—a certain well-known talk show host.

The alleged partnership was not as far-fetched as it might have seemed. Carson was a close friend of DeLorean. According to SEC registers, the comedian also owned 250,000 shares in DeLorean Motors, a $500,000 investment. Carson's assignee on the DeLorean board of directors was Carson's best friend and financial adviser, Henry Bushkin, a known mob associate.

After the arrest of John DeLorean in the ABSCAM sting, Howard Weitzman, DeLorean's attorney, told reporters that developments in the investigation had been closely followed by then U.S. Attorney General Edwin Meese III. Meese's cohort, J. Peter Grace, a leading light of Reagan's deregulation campaign, retained DeLorean on his payroll as a consultant, and was a director of DeLorean's company. Attorney General Meese, announced Weitzman, had made key decisions in building a case against DeLorean on charges of cocaine trafficking. DeLorean insisted that he'd been set up." He was, in fact, a cut-out, the designated fall guy, and the jury believed the cover story. But the Justice Department was desperate to staunch public exposure of others involved in the laundering operation.

Washington columnist Jack Anderson published a transcript of an audio tape after the arrest, in which De Lorean attempted to renege in a cocaine deal set up by the FBI. "When he tried to back out," Anderson wrote, "the FBI's undercover informant threatened to bash in his daughter's head."

The ClA's Bank of the Stars

The ABSCAM trap had originally been set for one William Morgan Hetrick, described by authorities as one of the foremost cocaine distributors on the west coast, and by his attomey as "a man who may border on genius." Hetrick was arrested with DeLorean on October 19, 1982. A pilot and operator of a private flying service in the desert community of Mojave, Hetrick had served four years in Vietnam, and went on to work with Nugan Hand Bank in Australia—the notorious CIA fiduciary with ties to the international mafia and third world dictators. The bank was looted by its CIA directors—foreshadowing the fate of the country's S&Ls—and collapsed after the lurid suicide of a founder, leaving a $50 million hole in the Australian economy. Although the bank was an independent business run by former CIA operatives, it provided cover for the Agency's underground arms/drugs network. (One of Nugan Hand's clients, Ferdinand Marcos, entered the American S&L scene by purchasing Redwood Savings in San Francisco. A Marcos cohort took over San Francisco's Oceanic Bank, and hired a former CIA Manila station chief to run it.)

DeLorean's intelligence connections were almost turned to his advantage in court. The Los Anqeles Times reported: "The Drug Enforcement Administration, the CIA (and) the FBI were ordered to turn over documents to DeLorean in advance of the trial... for private inspection by the court." Also named in the judge's orders were Army intelligence, the National Security Council, the Internal Revenue Service, U.S. Customs, several departments within the Justice Department, the State Department, several field offices of the FBI, the Defense Intelligence Agency and the Pentagon.

Unfortunately for DeLorean's attomeys, when they asked to review documents concerning contacts between the U.S. and British goverments during the sting, the judge refused, insisting that "communications between sovereigns are meant to be confidential."

As a cover and base of operations for the DeLorean arrest, federal agents posed as crooked bankers for Eureka Federal Savings in the San Francisco Bay area. The president of Eureka was Kenneth Kidwell, a familiar face on the Nevada casino circuit, and a volatile eccentric in the stodgy Califomia banking establishment. Kidwell was the protagonist in a series of bizarre events. One evening police spotted his car weaving on the road. They suspected he was drunk. The offficers searched him and turned up a .38 strapped to his leg and a .357 magnum. The pistols were loaded with armor-piercing, teflon-coated bullets. The police said that Kidwell had tried to talk his way out of the arrest by flashing a gold deputy sheriff's badge conferred upon him by a ranking offficial of the San Mateo Sheriff's Offfice. Some banker. The ultimate irony was that Eureka, the FBI's cover in the DeLorean sting, was saddled with some $32 million in delinquent loans—170 of them—to organized crime figures.

A key informant in the DeLorean sting was James Hoffman, who often boasted to his neighbors of daring covert exploits in Latin America, according to DeLorean biographer Hillel Levin. Hoffman proposed the cocaine deal to DeLorean and later turned evidence against him. Thus did DeLorean become the sacrificial cut-out.

Hoffman had, in turn, been fingered by Robert Durand, his partner in an Oregon airline used to smuggle cocaine from Bolivia into the U.S. The drug profits were laundered at Commercial Bank of Beverly Hills.

Commercial Bank began to flounder when the board's drug and organized crime connections caught the attention of federal regulators. FBI and DEA investigators refused to buy Hoffman's tip that Johnny Carson was involved in money laundering with DeLorean and the CIA, a charge that Carson publicly denied. But there was a surfeit of financial chicanery at Commercial, enough to prompt the FDIC to impose a $10 million lawsuit against bank officials, who had extended loans to clients "associated directly or indirectly with organized crime." In 1983, Carson's Beverly Hills thrift filed bankruptcy papers.

Among the dubious loans made by Carson financial adviser Henry Bushkin was $450,000 to Jack Catain of the Angelo Bruno crime family in Philadelphia. The FDIC couldn't help noticing that Bushkin was also an officer of Catain's TMX Marketing, a retail distributor of car alarms in Westwood, California. Catain eventually sold TMX to the North Ireland Development Angency, which subsidized the DeLorean Motors plant.

Shortly after DeLorean's arrest, several of the principals had a run of misfortune. Colin Chapman, DeLorean's partner in the car business, had a heart attack and died. Alan David Saxon, an officer of "Carson's Bank," apparently committed suicide. Saxon, who was known to travel frequently to places like Switzerland and Brazil, told friends that he feared he would be killed for his knowledge of the bank's business connections. Following Saxon's demise, investigators discovered that $60–80 million was "missing" from the coffers of Commercial Bank. The Los Angeles Police Department immediately cremated Saxon's body. Soon, two new directors of the bank reported that their lives had been threatened.

They took up shooting practice at the Beverly Hills Gun Club.

Chapter Thirteen

The Swirl and the Swastika:

NutraSweet & the Military-Medical-Industrial Complex

> I recognized my two selves, a crusading idealist and a cold, granitic believer in the law of the jungle.
>
> —Edgar Monsanto Queeny,
> Monsanto chairman, 1943–63,
> The Spirit of Enterprise, 1934

The FDA is ever mindful to refer to aspartame, widely known as NutraSweet, as a "food additive," never a "drug." A "drug" on the label of a Diet-Coke might discourage the consumer. And because aspartame is classified a food additive, adverse reactions are not reported to a federal agency, nor is continued safety monitoring required by law.[1] NutraSweet is a non-nutritive sweetener. The brand name is a misnomer. Try NonNutraSweet.

Food additives seldom cause brain lesions, headaches, mood alterations, skin polyps, blindness, brain tumors, insomnia and depression, or erode intelligence and short-term memory. Aspartame, according to some of the most capable scientists in the country, does. In 1991 the National Institutes of Health, a branch of the Department of Health and Human Services, published a bibliography, Adverse Effects of Aspartame, listing no less than 167 reasons to avoid it.[2]

Aspartame is an DNA derivative, a combination of two amino acids (long supplied by a pair of Maryland biotechnology firms: Genex Corp. of Rockville and Purification Engineering in Baltimore.[3]) The Pentagon once listed it in an inventory of prospective biochemical warfare weapons submitted to Congress.[4]

But instead of poisoning enemy populations, the "food additive" is currently marketed as a sweetening agent in some 1200 food products.

In light of the chemo-warfare implications, the pasts of G.D. Searle and aspartame are ominous. Established in 1888 on the north side of Chicago, G.D. Searle has long been a fixture of the medical establishment. The company manufactures everything from prescription drugs to nuclear imaging optical equipment.[5]

Directors of G.D. Searle include such geopolitical actuaries as Andre M. de Staercke, Reagan's ambassador to Belgium, and Reuben Richards, an executive vice president at Citibank. Also Arthur Wood, the retired CEO of Sears, Roebuck & Co., from the clan of General Robert E. Wood, wartime chairman of the America First Committee.[6] America Firsters, organized by native Nazis cloaked as isolationists, were quietly financed by the likes of Sullivan & Cromwell's Allen Dulles and Edwin Webster of Kidder, Peabody.[7]

Until the acquisition by Monsanto in 1985, the firm's chairman was William L. Searle, a Harvard graduate, Naval reservist and—a grim irony in view of aspartame's adverse effects—an officer in the Army Chemical Corps in the early 1950s, when the same division tested LSD on groups of human subjects in concert with the CIA.[8]

The chief of the chemical Warfare Division at this time was Dr. Laurence Laird Layton, whose son Larry was convicted for the murder of Congressman Leo Ryan at Jonestown ("Come to the pavilion! What a legacy!"). Jonestown, of course, bore a remarkable likeness to a concentration camp, and kept a full store of pharmaceutical drugs. (The Jonestown pharmacy was stocked with a variety of behavior control drugs: qualudes, valium, morphine, demerol and 11,000 doses of thorazine—a better supply, in fact, than the Guyanese government's own, not to mention a surfeit of cyanide.[9]

Dr. Layton was married to the daughter of Hugo Phillip, a German banker and stockbroker representing the likes of Siemens & Halske, the makers of cyanide for the Final Solution, and I.G. Farben, the manufacturer of a lethal nerve gas put to the same purpose.[10] Dr. Layton, a Quaker, developed a form of purified uranium used to set off the Manhattan Project's first self-sustaining chain reaction at the University of Chicago in 1942 by his wife's German-born uncle, Dr. James Franck. At Dugway Proving Ground in Utah, Dr. Layton concentrated his efforts, as did I.G. Farben, on the development of nerve gasses.[11]

Dr. Layton later defended his participation in the Army's chemical warfare section: "You can blow people to bits with bombs, you can shoot them with shells, you can atomize them with atomic bombs, but the same people think there's something terrible about poisoning the air and letting people breathe it. Anything having to do with gas warfare, chemical warfare, has this taint of horror on it, even if you only make people vomit."[12]

Nazis and chemical warfare are recurring themes in the aspartame story. Currently, the chief patent holder of the sweetener is the Monsanto

Co., based in St. Louis. In 1967 Monsanto entered into a joint venture with I.G. Farben-Fabriken, the aforementioned financial core of the Hitler regime and the key supplier of poison gas to the Nazi racial extermination program. After the Holocaust, the German chemical firm joined with American counterparts in the development of chemical warfare agents and founded the "Chemagrow Corporation" in Kansas City, Missouri, a front that employed German and American specialists on behalf of the U.S. Army Chemical Corps.[13]

Dr. Otto Bayer, I.G.'s research director, had a binding relationship with Monsanto chemists.[14] In the postwar period, Dr. Bayer developed and tested chemical warfare agents with Dr. Gerhard Schrader, the Nazi concocter of Tabun, the preferred nerve gas of the SS. Dr. Schrader was also an organophosphate pioneer, and tested the poison on populated areas of West Germany under the guise of killing insects.[15] (Schrader's experiments reek suspiciously of the ongoing aerial application of malathion—developed by Dr. Schrader, a recruit of the U.S. Chemical Warfare Service when Germany surrendered—in present-day Southern California.[16])

Another bridge to I.G. Farben was Monsanto's acquisition of American Viscose, long owned by the England's Courtauld family. As early as 1928, the U.S. Commerce Department issued a report critical of the Courtauld's ties to I.G. Farben and the Nazi party.[17]

Incredibly, George Courtauld was handed an appointment as director of personnel for England's Special Operations Executive, the wartime intelligence service, in 1940.[18] A year later, with the exhaustion of British military financial reserves, American Viscose, worth $120 million, was put on the block in New York. The desperate British treasury received less than half that amount from the sale, brokered by Siegmund Warburg, among others.[19] Monsanto acquired the company in 1949.[20]

The Nazi connection to Monsanto crops up again on the board of directors with John Reed, a former crony of "Putzi" Hanfstangl, a Harvard-bred emigre to Germany who talked Hitler out of committing suicide in 1924 and contributed to the financing of Mein Kampf.[21] Reed is also chairman of Citibank and long a confederate of the CIA. According to a lawsuit filed by San Francisco attorney Melvin Belli, Reed was an instigator, with Ronald Reagan, James Baker and Margaret Thatcher, of the "Purple Ink Document," a plan to finance CIA covert operations with wartime Japanese gold stolen from a buried Philippine hoard.[22]

Other covert warfare connections to Monsanto include Dr. Charles Allen Thomas, chairman of the Monsanto board, 1960–65. Dr. Thomas directed a group of scientists during WW II in the refinement of plutonium for use in the atomic bomb. In the postwar period Monsanto operated Tennessee's Oak Ridge National Laboratories for the Manhattan Project.[23] (Manhattan gestated with the Oak Ridge Institute for Nuclear Studies, where lethal doses of radiation were tested on 200 unwary cancer patients, turned them into "nuclear calibration devices" gratis the AEC and NASA, until 1974.[24]) Nazi scientists and a 7,000-ton stockpile of uranium were delivered to the Project by its security and counterintelligence director, Col. Boris Pash, a G-2 designate to the CIA's Bloodstone program—and the eminence grise of PB/7, a clandestine Nazi unit that, according to State Department records, conducted a regimen of political assassinations and kidnappings in Europe and the Eastern bloc.[25]

Monsanto Director William Ruckelshaus was an acting director of the FBI under Richard Nixon, a period in the Bureau's history marred by COINTELPRO outrages, including political assassinations. Nixon subsequently appointed Ruckelshaus to the position of EPA director, a nagging irony given his ties to industry (he is a director of Browning-Ferris and Cummins Engine Co.). CIA counterintelligentsia on the Monsanto board include Stansfield Turner, a former Director of Central Intelligence, and Earle H. Harbison, an Agency information specialist for 19 years. Harbison is also a director of Merrill Lynch, and thus raises the spectre of CIA drug dealing. In 1984 President Ronald Reagan's Commission on Organized Crime concluded that Merrill Lynch employed couriers "observed transferring enormous amounts of cash through investment houses and banks in New York City to Italy and Switzerland. Tens of millions of dollars in heroin sales in this country were transferred overseas." Merrill Lynch invested the drug proceeds in the New York bullion market before making the offshore transfers.[26]

As might be expected in view of Monsanto's Nazi, chemical warfare and CIA ties, NutraSweet is a can of worms unprecedented in the American food industry. The history of the product is laden with flawed and fabricated research findings, and when necessary to further the product along, blatant lies—the basis of FDA approval and the incredulity of independent medical researchers. Senator Metzenbaum described the FDA as "the handmaiden" of the drug industry in 1985, but she comports under all regimes. In the Clinton administration, for example, Mike Taylor was graced with the position of deputy director of the FDA. Taylor is a cousin of Tipper Gore, Vice President Albert Gore's wife, and once an outside counsel to Monsanto. (Gore voted with Senate conservatives in 1985 against aspartame labeling.)

Under the tutelage of the Clinton administration, one Chicago reporter quipped, the FDA strictly enforces one "unwritten" violation of law"—failure to bribe.

Granitic Believers

G.D. Searle, the pharmaceutical firm that introduced NutraSweet, worked symbiotically with federal and Congressional officials, bribed investigators when violations of law were exposed, anything to move aspartame to market. As far back as 1969, an internal Searle "strategy memo" concluded the company must obtain FDA approval to outpace firms competing for the artificial sweetener market. Another memo in December 1970 urged that FDA officials were to be "brought into a subconscious spirit of participation" with Searle.[27] To that end, with enormous profits at stake, the pharmaceutical house set out on a long struggle to transform the Pentagon's biochemical warfare agent into "the taste Mother Nature intended."

The official story is that aspartame was discovered in 1966 by a scientist developing an ulcer drug (not a "food additive"). Supposedly he discovered, upon carelessly licking his fingers, that they tasted sweet. Thus was the chemicals industry blessed with a successor to saccharine, the coal-tar derivative that foundered eight years later under the pressure of cancer concerns. Aspartame found early opposition in consumer attorney James Turner, author of The Chemical Feast and a former Nader's Raider. At his own expense, Turner fought approval for ten years, basing his argument on aspartame's potential side effects, particularly on children. His concern was shared by Dr. John Olney, professor of neuropathology and psychiatry at Washington School of Medicine in St. Louis. Dr. Olney found that aspartame, combined with MSG seasoning, increased the odds of brain damage in children.[28]

Other studies have found that children are especially vulnerable to its toxic effects, a measure of the relation between consumption and body weight. The FDA determined in 1981, when the sweetener was approved, that the maximum projected intake of aspartame is 50 milligrams a day per kilogram of body weight. A child of 66 pounds would consume about 23 milligrams by imbibing four cans of Diet-Coke. The child might also conceivably down an aspartame-flavored snack or two, nearing the FDA's projected maximum daily intake.[29] Dr. William Partridge, a professor of neuroendocrine regulation at MIT, told Common Cause in August 1984 that it wouldn't be surprising if a child—"confronted with aspartame-containing iced tea, chocolate milk, milk shakes, chocolate pudding pie, Jello, ice cream and numerous other products"—consumed 50 milligrams in a day.

Internally, aspartame breaks down into its constituent amino acids and methanol, which degrades into formaldehyde. The FDA announced in 1984 that "no evidence" has been found to establish that the methanol by-product reaches toxic levels, claiming that "many fruit juices contain higher levels of the natural compound."[30] But Medical World News had already reported in 1978 that the methanol content of aspartame is 1,000 times greater than most foods under FDA control.[31]

NutraSweet, the "good stuff" of sentimental adverts, is a truly insidious product. According to independent trials, aspartame intake is shown by animal studies to alter brain chemicals affecting behavior. Aspartame's effects on the brain led Richard Wurtman, an MIT neuroscientist, to the discovery, as recorded in The New England Journal of Medicine (no. 309, 1983), that the sweetener defeats its purpose as a diet aid, since high doses may instill a craving for calorie-laden carbohydrates. One of his pilot studies found that the NutraSweet-carbohydrate combination increases the "sweetener's effect on brain composition." Searle officials denigrated Wurtman's findings, but the American Cancer Society has since confirmed the agonizing irony—after tracking 80,000 women for six years—that "among women who gained weight, artificial sweetener users gained more than those who didn't use the products," as reported in Medical Self Care (3–87). (Since his battle with G.D. Searle, Wurtman founded Interneuron Pharmaceuticals, Inc., the producer of a sports drink that enhances athletic performance, and a weight-loss drug marketed in over 40 countries. Wurtman's share of the company, established in 1989, was worth $10 million by 1992.[32])

Even more daunting are the findings of Dr. Paul Spiers, a neurophychologist at Boston's Beth Israel Hospital, that aspartame use can depress intelligence. For this reason, he selected experimental subjects with a history of consuming it but unaware that they might be suffering ill effects. The subjects were given NutraSweet in capsules of the FDA's allowable limit. Spiers was alarmed to discover that they developed "cognitive deficits." One of the tests required recall of square patterns and alphabetical sequences, becoming increasingly more difficult. The test is challenging, but most people improve as they learn how it is done. The aspartame users, however, did not improve. "Some frankly showed a reverse pattern," Spiers reported.[33]

Aspartame has been shown to erode short-term memory. At the May, 1985 hearings on NutraSweet, Louisiana Senator Russell Long related a bizarre anecdote:

> SENATOR LONG: I have received a letter recently from a person who is well known to me and whose word is impeccable, as far as I am concerned. This person told me that she had been dieting and she had been using diet drinks with aspartame. She said she found her memory was going. She seemed to be completely losing her memory. When she would meet people whom she knew intimately, she could not recall what their name was, or even who they were. She could not recall a good bit of that which was going on about her to the extent that she was afraid she was losing her mind.... In due course, someone suggested that it might be this NutraSweet, so she stopped using it and her memory came back and her mind was restored.

Senator Howard Metzenbaum replied that he had received "a number of letters from doctors reporting similar developments.... There have been hundreds of incidences of people who have suffered loss of memory, headaches, dizziness, and other neurological symptoms which they feel are related to aspartame."[34] Senator Orrin Hatch, a hidebound arch-conservative and NutraSweet advocate, downplayed criticism of the sugar substitute. "Some people have lost their memory after drinking a variety of things," he argued. "The bottom line is this: the studies supporting aspartame's approval have been examined and reexamined. More than enough sound, valid studies exist to demonstrate aspartame's safety."

Hatch of Utah, reports the Wall Street Journal, has "given his strong support of the pharmaceutical industries."[35] So have the "Hatchlings." David Kessler, FDA commissioner under presidents Bush and Clinton, was once an aide to Orrin Hatch. His former campaign manager and aide, C. McClain Haddow, was sentenced to prison for conflict-of-interest charges arising from his work as a Reagan administration health official. And Thomas Parry, Hatch's former chief of staff, has carved a sumptuous life for himself as a Republican fund-raiser and lobbyist with clients in the pharmaceutical industry. All told, Parry represents 30 clients, including Eli Lilly, Warner-Lambert, and Johnson & Johnson, not to mention ranking defense firms and the Bahamas government. Parry's pharmaceutical clients have enriched Senator Hatch's campaign coffers, and in turn Hatch lavishes his attentions on them.[36]

By the time Orrin Hatch was stumping for NutraSweet in the U.S. Senate, the Center for Disease Control in Atlanta had received 600 letters complaining of NutraSweet's adverse effects. The National Soft Drink Association (NSDA) had them too: "there have been hundreds of reports from around the country suggesting a possible relationship between their consumption of NutraSweet and subsequent symptoms including headaches, aberrational behavior, slurred speech, etc." FDA Commissioner Arthur Hull Hayes, appointed by Ronald Reagan in April 1981 (moving the New York Times to observe that "some industry officials consider Dr. Hayes more sympathetic to their viewpoints than past holders of the office"), considered such complaints "anecdotal."

Of course, like scores of other ultra-conservatives roaming the executive branch in the 1980s, the ethics of Arthur Hull Hayes were entirely malleable—not only did he approve a product based on studies that were "scientifically lacking in design and execution," according to a report issued by Science Times in February 1985, but upon leaving the FDA he took the post of senior medical consultant for Burson-Marsteller, the public relations firm retained by G.D. Searle.[37]

Burson-Marsteller, a huge public relations conglomerate, swelled in the 1980s by leveraging smaller competitors—including Black, Manafort, Stone & Kelley, a lobbying firm best known for influence-peddling along the Beltway—presently outsizing even the Hill & Knowlton empire. Typical in the aspartame story are Burson-Marsteller's links to the intelligence community and right-wing operatives of the GOP. Thomas Devereaux Bell, Jr., an executive officer of the firm, is the former chairman of the Center for Naval Analyses in Alexandria, Virginia. Bell was also the executive director of Ronald Reagan's Inaugural Ball Committee (ushering in the likes of Licio Gelli of Italy's notorious P-2 lodge). Bell's career in Washington began in 1971 as a deputy director of Richard Nixon's Committee to Re-Elect the President. He went on to serve as an administrative aide to Senator William Brock and the Reagan transition team.[38]

At the FDA, Hayes used aspartame as a political statement that the Reagan administration was embarking on a grand voyage of conservative "regulatory reform," sluicing through treasonous liberal constraints on "free enterprise." Despite what one FDA scientist described as 'very serious' questions concerning pivotal brain tumor tests, Hayes eagerly approved aspartame for use in dry foods in July 1981.[39]

Three FDA scientists advised against the approval of aspartame, citing G.D. Searle's own brain tumor tests, because there was no proof that "aspartame is safe for use as a food additive under its intended conditions of use."[40]

Hayes has since declined to answer any questions about his decision, which ignored the recommendations of the FDA's own board of inquiry. He relied instead on a study conducted by Japan's Ajinomoto, Inc.—a licensee of G.D. Searle. Hayes acknowledged in his 1981 decision that he had only consulted a preliminary report of the Japanese evaluation, and only skimmed it. More serious, Hayes violated federal law by basing approval on the Japanese test, as it had not been reviewed by the FDA board.[41]

Who is Arthur Hull Hayes? He was no disinterested bureaucrat. True to the biochemical theme of the aspartame story, Dr. Hayes served in the Army Medical Corps in the 1960s. According to the Washington Post, Hayes was assigned to Edgewood Arsenal at Fort Detrick, Maryland, the Army's chemical warfare base of operations, "one of a number of doctors who conducted drug tests for the Army on volunteers… to determine the effect of a mind-disorienting drug called CAR 301,060." According to a declassified 1976 report prepared by the Army Inspector General, Hayes had planned a research study to develop the mind-altering CAR 301,060 as a crowd-control agent. In 1972 Hayes left Edgewood Arsenal, and a new plan for the experiments was drawn up by Edgewood physicians. The 1976 report notes that similar tests had been conducted before Hayes took charge.[42]

Also at the center of the effort to land FDA approval of NutraSweet stood Donald Rumsfeld—"Rummy" to his friends—chairman of G.D. Searle upon leaving the Ford administration in 1977. Rumsfeld, the product of a wealthy Chicago suburb, was a Princeton graduate and a Navy pilot during the Korean conflict. He entered politics as a Congressional House aide attending night classes at Georgetown University Law School, which is closely aligned with the CIA.[43]

Rumsfeld campaigned ambitiously for Richard Nixon, who drafted him to direct the Office of Equal Opportunity on May 26, 1969. He quickly established an office to spy on his employees in a holy crusade to flush out "revolutionaries" said to be granting federal funds to politically subversive organizations — a throwback to McCarthy's tantrums.[44]

Rumsfeld also figured in Nixon's notorious Power Control Group, spearheaded by Charles Colson and John Ehrlichman.[45] Gerald Ford named Rumsfeld executive chief of staff upon the resignation of Al Haig.

In 1986 he was named chairman of the Institute for Contemporary Studies, a neo-conservative "think tank" (read propaganda mill) established in 1972 by Edwin Meese and Caspar Weinberger. ICS has sponsored such opinion-shaping projects as a study of expansions in "entitlement programs" and their erosive effects on the economy, and a book on the uses of coercion by Communist regimes.[46]

Rumsfeld, at 43, became the country's youngest secretary of defense. For many years he has been a vocal proponent of chemical weapons.[47] He is chairman of the Rand Corp.[48] In 1988 he dropped a presidential bid, and was named a v.p. of Westmark Systems, led by past CIA Director Bobby Ray Inman. Rumsfeld was one of Westmark's founding directors. He shared the board with Joseph Amato, a former vice president at TRW (and a colleague of Inman's at the National Security Agency), and Dale Frey, chairman of the General Electric Investment Corp.[49]

Rumsfeld, a veteran political operative, was an adept at the vulgar art of public relations. He was recruited by G.D. Searle because he had "a Boy Scout image," according to one company official.[50] A house politician was precisely what Searle needed to compensate for the damage done by independent researchers concerned about the toxic effects of aspartame. In March 1976 an FDA task force brought into question all of the company's testing procedures between 1967 and 1975. The task force described "serious deficiencies in Searle's operations and practices which undermine the basis for reliance on Searle's integrity." The final report of the FDA task force noted faulty and fraudulent product testing, knowingly misrepresented findings, and instances of "irrelevant or unproductive animal research where experiments have been poorly conceived, carelessly executed or inaccurately analyzed."[51]

Richard Merrill, the FDA's chief counsel, petitioned Samuel K. Skinner, U.S. attorney for the northern district of Illinois, for a grand jury investigation of Searle's "willful and knowing failure" to submit required test reports, and for "concealing material facts and making false statements" in reports on aspartame submitted to the agency.[52] Yet industry analysts, interviewed by the Wall Street Journal six months after Rumsfeld's appointment as chairman, noted a rapid turnabout in Searle's fortunes as a result of his direction.[53]

Searle denies that Chairman Rumsfeld ever had any contact with the FDA, or the Carter and Reagan administrations, to lobby for aspartame.[54] But the Wall Street Journal article reported in 1977 that Rumsfeld "keenly understands the importance of a public image. So he has been mending fences with the FDA by personally asking top agency officials what Searle should do to straighten out its reputation." Westley M. Dixon, Searle's vice chairman, told the Journal that without Rumsfeld "we wouldn't have gotten approval for Norpace," a drug investigated by the FDA in 1975.[55]

The grand jury investigation of Searle disintegrated in January, 1977 when the FDA formally requested that Samuel Skinner, U.S. attorney and a protege of Illinois Governor James Thompson, investigate the firm for falsifying and withholding aspartame test data. A month later, Skinner met with attorneys from Searle's Chicago law firm, Sidley & Austin. Jimmy Carter ascended to the presidency a few weeks later. He announced that Skinner would not be asked to remain in office, but the outgoing Republican wasn't found wanting for employment. He informed reporters that he had already "begun preliminary discussions" with Sidley & Austin.[56]

G.D. Searle and Sidley & Austin are Siamese Twins. They are financially and politically one. Edwin Austin, a senior partner in the law firm, was appointed to the Illinois Supreme Court in 1969. The Searle family drew upon his services extensively, and he taught Sunday school in Wilmette, a Chicago suburb, as did Dr. Claude Howard Searle, whose father co-founded the pharmaceutical house.

The firm is grafted to the beating heart of the Republican party. Morris Leibman of Sidley & Austin was for many years chairman of the American Bar Association's "Standing Committee on Law and National Security," a position that won him Reagan's Medal of Freedom in 1981.[57]

John E Robson, head of Sidley & Austin's Washington office, was appointed executive vice-president of Searle & Co. in 1977, the same year Skinner was named a partner in the law firm. Robson, too, was active in Republican politics. He was the first general counsel of the Department of Transportation, and at the behest of Gerald Ford in 1975 chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board.[58]

He moved on to Searle, and stayed with the company until it was bought outright by Monsanto in 1985. Howard Trienens, a law clerk to the late Chief Justice Vinson in the early 1950s, was a G.D. Searle director and worked for Sidley & Austin since 1949.[59] Archconservative California Governor George Deukmejian joined Sidley & Austin's Los Angeles branch upon leaving office in 1991, and is reportedly making a "very comfortable" living. He has a keen "sense" for bringing in corporate clients, a partner in the firm told the Los Angeles Times, many of them past contributors to his campaign fund. Deukmejian's business connections have given him a reputation as a Sidley & Austin "rainmaker," but the L.A. city council has questioned his ethics in promoting a contract with Sumitomo Corp. on a metropolitan railway project.[60]

Searle aside, Sidley & Austin has served some of the most notorious special interests in the country. The firm lobbied overtime, for instance, on behalf of Charles Keating's Lincoln Savings & Loan, and provided counsel on tax issues and dealing with federal authorities. The firm assisted Keating when Lincoln was foundering, and curried political favor to keep the S&L operating despite massive debts. As a result, the firm was forced to settle with Lincoln depositors in 1991, agreeing to cover an excess of $40 million in claims.[61]

Sidley & Austin also represented the AMA when a group of drugstore chains sued seven drug makers—including Searle—for price-fixing and antitrust violations. The lawsuit, filed in October 1993, amounts to billions of dollars in compensation.[62]

Skinner recused himself from the Searle prosecution four months before leaving office—in a memo to subordinates asking that the matter be kept "confidential to avoid any undue embarrassment"—a stall that nearly allowed the statute of limitations to expire. William Conlon, a senior U.S. attorney, inherited the case. He eased off citing case load pressures and gave a deaf ear to complaints of delays from the Justice Department, which urged that a grand jury be convened to prosecute Searle for falsifying NutraSweet test data. In January, 1979 Conlon too joined Sidley & Austin.[63]

The 33-page letter from Merrill to Skinner charged Searle with criminal fraud in its animal rest results. In 1984 Common Cause asked Dan Reidy of the U.S. attorney's office how the investigation had stalled. Reidy replied that because it was a grand jury investigation, he was "bound by law to secrecy." A Searle spokesman exploited the demise of the grand jury to claim there was "no validity to the charges," that the company had been "exonerated." Philip Brodsky, an investigator for the FDA, expressed surprise that Searle hadn't been indicted. "I thought surely they would prosecute them," he said.[64]

Eleven years later, Senator Metzenbaum issued a press release charging Skinner with stalling the criminal investigation as he prepared to leave office. Metzenbaum and his staff demanded an FBI investigation of Skinner's mishandling of the case. In December, 1988 the conflict-of-interest bombshell blew up in the face of newly-elected George Bush, who was about to appoint Skinner to the position of transportation secretary.[65]

Like most of the Machiavellians in the NutraSwseet story, Samuel Knox Skinner kept company with hard-right Republicans. He entered Republican Party politics as a campaign volunteer for Barry Goldwater.[66]

In 1975 he was appointed by President Ford to the office of federal prosecutor in Chicago. Sidley & Austin promoted him to senior partner after only one year with the firm. Skinner was the director of George Bush's presidential campaign in Illinois. On occasion he was berated for his involvement with the state's Republican apparatus: in 1987, for instance, the Chicago Sun-Times linked him with a circle of lawyers close to Governor Thompson who were awarded lucrative assignments handling the financial affairs of financially-crippled insurance companies. Skinner was a leading light of the Illinois Fraud Prevention Commission—he targeted welfare cheats (as opposed to white-collar criminals in the drug industry) —and President Reagan's Commission on Organized Crime. In December 1991 he left Transportation to take the position of President Bush's chief of staff.[67]

"A Shocking Story"

Had Skinner pressed on with the investigation, aspartame's manufacturer would have been forced to explain a long history of fabricated laboratory tests and slippery dealings with federal regulators, not to mention the public. Dr. Alexander Schmidt, a former FDA commissioner, said of the original Aspartame Task Force investigation: "What was discovered was reprehensible… incredibly sloppy science." A 1980 public board of inquiry opined that the company's testing procedures were "bizarre."[68]

Searle's decision to market aspartame culminated with the falsification of test results to obtain FDA approval. In November 1969, officials of the firm hired Dr. Harry Waisman, a researcher for the University of Wisconsin, to test for brain damage in Rhesus monkeys. Seven monkeys were fed aspartame for periods up to one year. In the end, though, the evaluation flopped because the technicians failed to perform the intelligence tests and autopsies required to determine brain damage. When questioned about the false data by the FDA, Searle officials claimed to have had no direct control over the study. But the protocol for the study was written by a Searle pathologist after it had begun. And according to Dr. Gross, "frequent high-level communications took place between Searle executives and Dr. Waisman prior to and during the study."[69]

To make matters worse, Dr. Waisman died in March, 1971 in mid-study. Searle submitted the toxicity test to the FDA on October 12, 1972. It bore Dr. Waisman's name as coauthor. Richard Merrill noted: "Dr. Waisman was the expert in the field and his name would carry great weight," but complained to Skinner that Searle took "great literary license" in drafting the report, "which covers up the admitted inadequacy of the design, control and documentation of this study."[70]

Searle submitted some 150 test reports, yet Dr. Martha Freeman of the FDA Bureau of Drugs noted in a 1973 memo, "the information provided is inadequate to permit an evaluation of the potential toxicity of aspartame."[71] The FDA task force set up by Dr. Schmidt in 1975 reviewed 25 studies on seven products manufactured by G.D. Searle, a total of 500 pages and 15,000 exhibits.[72] Searle was held to be the author of "reports that the FDA believes contain false information" and "concealed facts resulting from having drafted Dr. Waisman's 'pilot' monkey study so that it would appear to be a valid, thorough scientific study," and not a forgery.

In 1975 Searle submitted a battery of cancer test results entitled "The Willigan Report," which contained a statistical table that excluded four malignant mammary tumors detected by Dr. Willigan and incorporated in his data. The malignancies were made to appear benign. Searle dismissed the misrepresentation as a computer "programming error" undetected by supervising statisticians. Dr. Gross interviewed all concerned with the tests. He concluded in a statement to Metzenbaum's committee in August 1985 that "to accept the Searle explanation is to believe that the unfavorable mammary malignancy data were innocently omitted from the summary table four separate times by three different individuals."[73] The Waisman and Willigan Reports were prepared by Searle Labs, as were 88% of the safety evaluations conducted by 1981.[74]

They are typical of the shoddy documentation upon which FDA Commissioner Hayes based his decision that aspartame would not constitute a public health risk. Although two members of the 1975 task force considered the tests to be criminal frauds, Hayes and Searle declared the results valid. In an appeal to Hayes's decision, James Turner said: "the entire argument that since the studies are no longer considered fraudulent by FDA they are therefore scientifically valid is an example of a rhetorical shell game that, if successful, can only bring discredit and ridicule on the FDA."[75]

Dr. Gross, the chief scientist on the FDA task force, told the CBS Nightly News staff in January 1984 that Searle made "deliberate decisions" to cloak the toxic effects of aspartame. "They took great pains to camouflage the shortcomings of the study," Gross said, "as I say, filter and just present to the FDA what they wished the FDA to know. And they did other terrible things. For instance, animals would develop tumors while they were under study—well, G.D. Searle would remove these tumors from the animals," surgically masking the cancerous effects of aspartame.[76]

Yet one 1986 New England Journal of Medicine article claimed that non-compulsive aspartame intake has "no sinister effects." Dr. Woodrow Monte told CBS, "every time a truly impartial team of scientists have looked at NutraSweet, it has been turned down." Dr. Monte, director of the nutrition laboratory at Arizona State University, held that these studies "show extreme dangers over the long term."[77]

Dr. Monte was rewarded for his comments by a fusillade from the press. On February 23 Dan Dorfman, a business news reporter for WCBS in New York, broke a story that several CBS employees had invested in put options on NutraSweet that pay off if the stock price drops.[78] Dr. Monte and his attorney had purchased the options as well. It emerged that the CBS staffers had purchased them on the advice of stock market newsletters printed prior to the nightly news report. The investments were not illegal, nor did they reap a profit. Searle's stock was not affected by the publicity, and the investors took a loss. Nevertheless, the Wall Street Journal ran a front-page story condemning the "inside trading." Reed Irvine's Accuracy in Media picked up the cudgel against Dr. Monte and the CBS employees as if they'd committed a shocking Wall Street swindle.[79] Accuracy in Media, formed in 1969, is an intelligence operation abetted by the CIA. The rabidly right-wing organization was cofounded by Bernard Yoh, a counter-insurgency adviser under the notorious Edward Lansdale in Vietnam, and a fount of CIA funds to military intelligence units in the Delta region. Board member Elbridge Durbrow was once a foreign service "diplomat," and advised commanders of Maxwell Air Force Base in Alabama. Another AIM board member, Frank Trager, has conducted research for the Pentagon and CIA, and churns out pamphlets on international business and intelligence operations. Major financial contributors to AIM have included the late Richard Nixon, "Bebe" Rebozo, Edward Scripps, the wretched Dr. Edward Teller and former Treasury Secretary William E. Simon.[80]

Accuracy in Media is a strident advocate of the chemical industry, which provides it with generous funding. The media "watchdog" has long waged a campaign on behalf of dioxin, denouncing the "Agent Orange scare" as the creation of delirious, anti-business liberals. Among the leading manufacturers of Agent Orange for the Vietnam war effort was Monsanto, preparing—at the very moment AIM took aim at detractors of NutraSweet—to buy G.D. Searle.

The Good Stuff

Dr. Monte cautioned in 1987 that he didn't want to sound like a "conspiracy theory" hound, but the aspartame chronology clarifies its commercial emergence. The FDA board of inquiry advised against the sweetener on September 30, 1980. On January 21, 1981—the day after Reagan's inauguration—Searle submitted "ten new studies." Dr. Monte was skeptical. "It is impossible that they could have conducted those studies in four months," he said. "Obviously they'd previously done those studies but hadn't officially submitted them, although much of the information in those studies was informally presented to the board of inquiry." With the "new tests" in hand, Hayes dissembled as though critical, overriding evidence had proven the safety of aspartame.[81]

James Turner, representing the Community Nutrition Institute in Washington, D.C., said that Arthur Hull Hayes, to arrive at his decision that aspartame is safe, firewalked a path "through a mass of scientific mismanagement, improper procedures, wrong conclusions and general scientific inexactness." Two FDA officials declared in 1985 that Hayes was determined to clear all obstacles to NutraSweet approval. One FDA bureaucrat reported that "people at the top" were closed to questions concerning the quality of the tests submitted by Searle.[82]

In July, 1984 a broad investigation of NutraSweet's adverse effects was conducted by the FDA and the Centers for Disease Control. Federal health officials said at the outset that they believed no harm would emerge from the data to indict aspartame. Robert McQuate, Ph.D., science director of the National Soft Drink Association, predicted with mystical confidence that the study would "provide further evidence that aspartame is a safe ingredient."[83]

Dr. McQuate didn't fret the goring of his biochemical ox. In November the CDC announced that no "serious, widespread" side-effects had been found.[84] It was "unlikely," said CDC officials, that "complainers" could establish a link between NutraSweet and their maladies––the very same bromide once tossed to victims of radiation experiments. Reported side-effects of aspartame fell into two distinct categories: central nervous system (65%) and gastrointestinal disorders (24%).[85] Yet the CDC claimed erroneously that no consistent reaction pattern had been found.[86] Robert Shapiro, then president of NutraSweet, used the occasion to enthuse that the survey "clearly established the safety" of the sugar substitute.[87]

Nevertheless, the CDC recommended a new set of studies because aspartame users continued to complain of ill effects. Based on the ersatz assurances of the CDC report, PepsiCo announced that it would drop saccharin and begin sweetening its diet drinks entirely with aspartame.

The decision would have been approved by Wayne Calloway, then CEO of PepsiCo and a director of the multinationals Citicorp, General Electric and Exxon. In 1983 soda bottlers, organized around Pepsi, had petitioned the FDA for a delay in approval of NutraSweet for soft drinks until further evaluation verified its safety—interpreted by market analysts as a ploy to drive down the price of the sweetener. They soon abandoned the effort to block approval (and all health concerns they might have had). "We believe saccharin is safe," Pepsi USA President Roger Enrico lied, but "we wanted the taste improvement."

PepsiCo, already drawing on a tenth of Searle's 7.5-million pound annual production of aspartame, signed an agreement with G.D. Searle to boost purchases a whopping 500 percent.[88] (Like other corporate pushers of aspartame, Pepsi has long maintained ties to the intelligence community. One product of the relationship was a Pepsi plant in Vientiane, Laos with a laboratory outfitted for heroin production. Alfred McCoy, in The Politics of Heroin in Southeast Asia, documents the efforts of Richard Nixon to promote the plant's construction in 1965, and the CIA's continuing subsidization of the plant. McCoy complained to Pepsi officials that the facilities were but a cover for the importation and refinement of morphine, but it continued to operate unhindered.)

Yet another report was filed by Reagan's General Accounting Office in July 1987, this one on the FDA's handling of NutraSweet. The GAO concluded that the agency had observed proper procedures and conducted valid studies. But the report noted that the FDA had followed guidelines for food—not drug—testing, despite the recommendation of the agency's own biologists favoring drug tests, which are considerably more stringent. This recommendation was overruled by FDA officials.[89]

Another blemish in the study was bared by Dr. Louis Elsas, director of medical genetics at Emory University in Atlanta. "They never asked the right questions about what it does to brain function in humans," he told the Washington Post. Half of the scientists polled expressed reservations about the safety of NutraSweet. One-fifth reported "major concerns." Monsanto quibbled in a press release that these critics had themselves never conducted aspartame safety research. A score of independent scientists have. They found side effects.

Senator Metzenbaum berated Searle's flawed and fabricated tests at the August 1, 1985 Senate hearings. "The FDA," he said, "is content to have the manufacturer of aspartame, G.D. Searle, conduct these studies. How absurd."

He also faulted the AMA: "The Journal of the American Medical Association recently published a report on aspartame which, with some significant disclaimers, stated it was safe for most people. I wish that this report could ease my concerns. It does not. It merely restates the FDA position which relies solely on the tests conducted by G.D. Searle. As I have indicated these tests are under a cloud. In addition, the concerns raised recently by the scientists... were not even included in the report." In defense of the tests, executives of G.D. Searle argued that the sweetener has been approved by foreign regulatory agencies and the World Health Organization. But H.J. Roberts, an internal medicine specialist in West Palm Beach, Florida, reviewed the foreign studies and found that "the vast majority of these agencies accepted company-sponsored research without ever having done independent confirmatory studies."[90]

Deficiencies in testing were aggravated by a lack of laboratory training at Searle. One of the pivotal safety studies involved fetal damage, but the FDA task force found that the medical researcher in charge was "inexperienced in conducting studies of this nature and yet given full responsibility." They were appalled to discover that his sole credential was a field study of the cottontail rabbit for the Illinois Wildlife Service, yet at Searle he'd been assigned to laboratory training and supervision. When asked about his curriculum vitae in fetal research, he replied that he'd once attended a seminar on the subject, and the company had provided him with a stack of reference works.[91] (Yet G.D. Searle, in its 1981 Annual Report, billed itself as "a research-based pharmaceutical company.")

Corporate control of NutraSweet testing continues at Monsanto, torturing the ethics of academic medicine. In August, 1987 the University of Illinois, a recipient of Monsanto's largesse, issued a study exonerating aspartame of causing seizures in laboratory animals. Dave Hattan, a safety regulator for the FDA, responded that the study only confirmed the need for testing on humans. At independent labs, he insisted, aspartame provoked seizures.[92]

Industrial support tends to contaminate test data. Dr. Elsas, in a 1988 letter to the New England Journal of Medicine, advocated unbiased review of clinical research. "The NutraSweet Co.," he said, "may have had an interest in protocols that would find that their product had no untoward effects."[93]

Monsanto reportedly granted one NutraSweet researcher a $1.3-million honorarium.[94] The same hired gun willing to manipulate lab results will have no qualms publicly defending a tainted pharmaceutical, like the diabetic specialist who objected that a Senate hearing on aspartame, which called him as a witness, might arouse "groundless" public anxiety.[95]

Victims and health activists have attempted in the courts to put a stop to the marketing of NutraSweet, to no avail. In 1985 a coalition of consumer groups were handed a ruling by the federal Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia that the FDA had followed proper procedures in approving aspartame for soft drinks. A year later the Washington Post reported that the Supreme Court refused to consider the case "despite critics' arguments that the product, sold under the brand name NutraSweet, may cause brain damage."[96]

Likewise, the medical establishment has thrown up an impenetrable wall to aspartame critics. Dr. Roberts, author of a brief study, "Aspartame-Associated Confusion and Memory Loss: A Possible Human Model for Early Alzheimer's Disease," found it impossible to publish the monograph in a peer review medical journal. This was peculiar, he thought, "considering the increasing magnitude of Alzheimer's disease, and the relevance of my observations to newer biochemical findings and avenues of research." He can "personally vouch for the enormous difficulty in getting published articles concerning reactions to aspartame products," a trend in censorship with "ominous overtones." The options, Dr. Roberts says, are "generally limited to 'burying' the findings in a small-circulation journal (such as the bulletin of a county medical society), reporting the results as a letter to the editor, or (unfortunately, most often) discarding the project."[97]

Silence surrounds the most odious conspiracies.

Chapter Fourteen

The Holocaust Gallery

How the CIA Stole Jewish Art Treasures Looted by the Nazis

By all accounts James Kronthal had the makings of a ranking CIA official. He had attended New York's prestigious Lincoln School with Nelson Rockefeller. At Yale, he rejected the advice of his father that he major in business and studied art history instead. He joined the rowing crew and Phi Beta Kappa. Upon earning his degree in 1934, he found employment at the prestigious Frankfurt, Germany banking house of Speyer & Co. (the Kronthal's were blood relations of the Speyer family). Shortly thereafter, he established a network of middlemen to market artwork confiscated by the Nazis from Jewish collections. Kronthal was an eager Quisling, an advisor to Himmler and Goebbels. In fact, their intervention once pried him loose from the Gestapo after he was snared on charges of pedophilia.

His favors to the Nazi Party enriched him, but he was increasingly troubled by Nazi brutality and returned to the States to pursue a graduate degree at Harvard. There he befriended James Jesus Angleton, then a Law School freshman and a decade later the CIA's highest ranking Soviet specialist. After the raid on Pearl Harbor, Kronthal and Angleton offered themselves to the Office of Strategic Services (OSS). Kronthal was assigned to Switzerland's Berne Station under Allen Dulles, whose family, like the Speyers, had conducted business with the Nazis as Hitler ascended to power.

After the war Kronthal was assigned to the recovery of art plundered by the Nazis. Millions of paintings and antiques had disappeared. Some of these had made their way to Switzerland and flooded the galleries, sold to finance the rearmament of Germany in the 1930s—with Kronthal's assistance—and the postwar ambitions of leading Nazis. By 1942 galleries of Zurich, Madrid, Laussanne, New York and elsewhere were glutted with plundered artwork, sold at a fraction of their true worth. .

Sol Chaneles, former chairman of the Department of Criminal Justice at Rutgers University, notes that "countless objects can probably be found today in the homes of friends and relatives of Nazi and Nazi authorized art dealers where they were stored 'temporarily.' But the Nazis kept precise, detailed records of their pillage. Incomplete though they are, the records that survive list some 12 million individual items." A postwar inventory by the U.S. Army's Monuments, Fine Arts and Archives Division (MFA&A) counted 16 million pieces, but to date a full inventory has not been attempted.

Following the Anschluss—Germany's annexation of Austria on March 13, 1938—Hitler oversaw the wholesale confiscation of Jewish property, including the great art collections of barons Louis and Alphonse de Rothschild, the priceless paintings and rare volumes of the library belonging to Baron Butmann, and many more. Hitler's invasion of Czechoslovakia in May, 1939 involved the seizure not only of Jewish-owned art, but also the library of Prague University, the holdings of the Czech National Museum, the palaces of the Schwartzenbergs and Collerdos, and the Lobkowicz collections, which included Flemish painter Brueghel's masterpiece, Hay Harvest. The best of this loot was shipped to Germany, as were the Habsburg crown regalia from Vienna and the Bohemian crown jewels from Prague.

Raping nations of their cultural heritage not only demoralized conquered states—the reflected glory of pillaged landmarks of civilization lent the Third Reich an aura of grandeur. Having promised the Austrian city of Linz, where he'd attended school, a museum, Hitler demonstrated in the Polish campaign of 1939 how highly the acquisition of precious art rated in his strategic military operations. SS units accompanying the invading Nazi troops, provided with detailed information about the location of dozens of works of art, captured the famous altar by Veit Stoss in Cracow, relocated by the Nazis to Berlin, and the legendary Czartoryski collections of coins and relics, Limoges enamels, and engravings by 15th-century artist Albrecht Durer.

An unknown number of invaluable European artifacts have been stored in American bank and Treasury Department vaults since the war, classified a "national security" secret by the CIA. Only 200,000 of the items on the MFA&A inventory have been returned as restitution, primarily to wealthy German families and countries crushed by the Nazis. The CIA kept its share. A rare exception were the Hungarian crown jewels, found in a German salt mine as WW II wound down, returned in 1978 by order of President Jimmy Carter.

Kronthal succeeded Allen Dulles as head of the Berne station in 1947 under the newly formed CIA, an extremely powerful position that put him in charge of most covert operations in Western Europe. (In the immediate postwar period, most of the CIA's recruits were staunch Nazis, among them Otto Skorzeny, Martin Bormann, Joseph Mengele and Klaus Barbie. In the moral vacuum of cold war realpolitik, they were employed in the importation of drugs, the instigation of foreign coups, the arming of terrorists and death squad training.) Kronthal was given nearly complete authority in the handling of the plundered cultural wealth of Europe.

Unfortunately, Kronthal's pedophilic urgings rendered him vulnerable to blackmail by the Soviet NKVD intelligence service under Lavrenti Beria, and comprehensive information on CIA activities in Europe soon flowed from Berne to Moscow Center. In 1952 Kronthal returned to Washington to assist in the reorganization of the Agency. A year later he met secretly with his former Berne handler, Allen Dulles, the newly appointed Director of Central Intelligence. The subject of discussion is not known. The next day, Kronthal's housekeeper entered his bedroom to find him dead, an apparent suicide.

"The death was quickly hushed up," according to late CIA operative William Corson. The Washington police force was called in "to cover up what the CIA wanted hidden.... A chemical analysis failed to determine the cause of death or the contents of the vial found next to Kronthal's body."

Among the secrets that Kronthal took with him were details of the network established by the nascent CIA for recovering art stolen from the Jews of Europe.

Another was the way the U.S. freely helped itself to the confiscated art. As early as 1941, the Treasury Department had laid claim to German assets. A cover story was circulated that the booty was intended as a buffer against inflation in postwar Europe and South America. Secretly, according to Christopher Simpson, author of Blowback, the early CIA (signed into existence by Truman in 1947) drew from Treasury's vaults of spoils to finance covert operations abroad.

The first transfer of "black currency" from the "Exchange Stabilization Fund" to the CIA was laundered through a miz-maze of bank accounts to influence Italian politics in 1947. The nexus in the handling of the loot was Cardinal Francis Spellman (the "Back Door to the Vatican" and a notorious pedophile), who claimed that the $10 million windfall was a donation to the Church's holy war on Communism. The profits of Jewish genocide thus ended up, Simpson wrote, with "clerics and other leaders who were themselves closely tied to Fascist rule."

In 1963 a newspaper in Graz, Italy caught wind of the transfers and reported that "valuables of gruesome origin, and worth millions, have vanished without a trace. Other millions of mysterious origin showed up in the possession of former leaders of the Nazi Party and the SS. Even more bloodstained money is now said to have been spent on an obscure rescue mission of which a high Vatican official was reputed to be the leader."

A rare instance of restitution occurred early in the war by spies of the Special Liaison Unit, an Anglo-American group established in Bermuda. W.S. Zuill, editor of Bermuda's Royal Gazette, wrote in 1973 that the intelligence operation had been set up to intercept traffic between the U.S. and Europe. "Large numbers of experts and linguists moved into the Princess and Bermudiana hotels and their work exposed German spies already 'in place' in the United States," he reported. "Art treasures stolen by the Nazis in France and shipped through neutral ports to be sold in New York for Hitler's war machine were confiscated. In one case, the American Export Lines ship Excalibur carried valuable paintings in a sealed strong room. When the captain refused to open it, the British burned it like safecrackers, took the paintings and stored them in the Bank of Bermuda vaults until they could be returned to the Paris owner, who got all 270 of these Impressionist works back intact, to his own considerable astonishment."

Another caché of stolen paintings, rivaling any collection in the world, was discovered on April 7, 1945 by a contingent of officers of the Army's 90th Division, stored by the Nazis in a vault 2,100 feet underground. The vault lay at the bottom of Kaiseroda mine, near Merkers, Germany's geographical center. A huge hoard of treasure was discovered at the bottom of the mine, including gold valued at an excess of $238,000,000. About 400 tons of paintings and sculpture were found in a tunnel chiseled in the dry subterranean salt rock. The art had been looted from 15 German museums, including works by Rembrandt, Titian, Renoir and Durer. The art was priceless, but the most interesting piece discovered in the bowels of Kaiseroda was a 3,000 year old statuette of Nefertiti, the Egyptian queen, the most valuable work of art in all of Germany. Also found were the Goethe collection of Weimar and two million books confiscated in Berlin.

The art caché was sufficiently interesting to entice General Eisenhower, then the Supreme Commander of the Allied Expeditionary Forces, to Merkers, accompanied by General Omar Bradley and General Patton. Patton counted the stars on the uniforms of his companions as the elevator plummeted through the mineshaft. A half-mile beneath the surface, the party stepped into the gloom. Eisenhower was awed by the stacks of paintings lining the tunnel walls. But Patton, not exactly a connoisseur, was bored by the whole affair. Most of the paintings, he grumped in his memoirs, "were the type normally seen in bars."

The hoard was inventoried and loaded into 32 trucks for transfer to Munich for storage. The convoy was accompanied by five infantry and two machine gun platoons, ten anti-aircraft units and air cover. Yet a rumor has persisted for many years that one of the trucks managed to slip off in the night with a full load of gold or artwork.

Francis Taylor, wartime director of New York's Metropolitan Museum of Art, argued vehemently that "the contents of the Merkers mine should be treated as booty," and liberated by the U.S. Army. "The controversy over the Merkers' treasures raged," Chaneles wrote in Art & Antiques in 1987, "amidst persistent rumors that both senior U.S. officers and OSS personnel were involved in theft from the Munich repository. Thousands of ounces of gold are apparently missing along with hundreds of millions of dollars in cash and untold numbers of valuable works of art. All the records pertaining to the Merkers inventory and military intelligence reports concerning theft by U.S. Army officers and OSS personnel were later classified by the CIA, and so they remain to this day."

Patton died six months after his inspection of the Merkers mine, the cause of death an embolism resulting from a traffic accident. This was the same day he had informed General Hobart Gay that he wanted the "bastards" behind the theft turned over the the Criminal Investigation Division. "I don't want anybody ever to say that sonovabitch Patton had stolen any part of it," he told Gay. The share of the plunder that disappeared under guard of Patton's Third Army was worth $5 billion in today's currency. It has never been recovered.

At a salt mine in Alt Aussee, another 100,000 paintings, many by old masters, were discovered by the Allies. Also found were a fortune in prints, drawings, sculptures and books. About 7,000 of the paintings had been chosen by Hitler for transfer to the museum he planned on opening in Linz, Austria.

In June, 1990 some of the priceless works from the Alt Aussee mine surfaced in Whitewright, Texas, near the Oklahoma border. "It was one of the world's greatest art thefts," according to Florentina Mutherich, former deputy director of Munich's Institute for Art History. Joe Meador, an art lover and Army officer of the 87th Armored Field Artillery Division in 1945, was widely considered to be the culprit. The division had been ordered to guard the art, including a medieval manuscript, The Four Gospels, bound in gold and silver, which was among the disappearing works and "rare beyond belief," according to London art historian Richard Camber in the New York Times. Meador also absconded with the gold crucifixes of ostentatiously pious ninth and tenth century German emperors, and a small silver reliquary inlaid with gems. The pelf was recovered by West Germany's Cultural Foundation of the States, which paid a "finder's fee" of $3 million to an American dealer's attorney for the pieces, with a proviso that the American's name remain anonymous.

The loot has, like a multitude of bad pennies, surfaced in some unexpected places: the famed Boy Blowing Bubbles by Jean Baptiste Chardin, for instance, turned up in the possession of the Metropolitan Museum of Art. In 1987 at least five paintings hanging at the Met were identified as Nazi confiscations. Other paintings at the Metropolitan snatched from the Holocaust and European occupations, as reported by the New York Times on November 24, 1987, included Man with a Bulbous Nose by Adrian Brouwer, "Young Woman Reading" by Fragonard, and Eugene Delacroix's Lion Attacking a Snake.

The Metropolitan bought the paintings from Wildenstein & Company in New York, a Jewish art dealer. The history of the acquisitions was cleverly obscured: the museum neglected to mention the Delacroix in its catalog of holdings, and a historical account of the Fragonard glossed over seizure by the Nazis. However, one catalog entry did mention that Chardin's Boy Blowing Bubbles once hung in the "Fuhrer Museum" at Linz, and a forty year old museum publication reports that the painting still bore "the labels of the Einsatzstab Rosenberg, the German looting organization."

Officials of the Metropolitan have since claimed that the Chardin was legally purchased from the heirs of Fritz Mannheimer, a Jewish banker who fled Stuttgart when Hitler assumed power and settled in Amsterdam. (The Nazis destroyed Mannheimer's Dutch bank, whereupon he perished of a heart attack. From his creditors the SS purchased the collection at a fraction of its worth, threatening to confiscate it as enemy property if they refused the offer.)

Dr. Chaneles offers another explanation: "Leading art dealers and galleries in the occupied nations collaborated with the Nazi art experts. In Paris, Wildenstein's facilities served as a depository for objects eventually transferred to Hitler, Goering and Bormann. The company prospered immensely during the war."

Jeremy Epstein, an attorney for Wildenstein & Co., countered that allegations of Nazi collaboration were "ridiculous," since the family fled Europe before the war and lost scores of paintings to the Germans. He failed to mention, however, that before the Wildensteins decamped, Roger Dequoy, an employee, was entrusted with management of the gallery.

The Germans were given preference in the acquisition of paintings stored there. Martin Bormann, "Hitler's Mephistopheles," authorized the purchases, made in Hitler's name with stolen funds. Far from bullying the art dealers and cultural authorities of Paris, Hitler was uncharacteristically solicitous to assuage the resentment of the French people. Two weeks after the occupation, Field Marshal Wilhelm Keitel issued an order to safeguard the art treasures of Paris, "especially the Jewish property," until Hitler's representatives could examine the art and cart off the pick of the lot.

Met officials should have been better informed, because it was Francis Taylor, museum director, who in 1944 founded and led the MFA&A art recovery unit under an Executive Order signed by Roosevelt. Taylor's ranking field agents were assigned to the OSS (under Kronthal) and they became privy to intelligence on Nazis dealing in looted art on the black market.

Taylor's organization soon abandoned any aim of making restitution to victims of Nazi atrocities, however, and much of the art was spirited away to American vaults. The seizure of the art by the U.S. prompted Sumner Crosby, a French scholar serving with Taylor in the OSS art recovery operation, to resign from the unit in September 1945. "He learned," writes

Robin Winks in Cloak & Dagger, "that the United States Government was bringing from Germany art objects for storage and display.... Crosby and many others viewed this decision as a slap in the face to the various MFA&A officers in Germany, and they also suspected it was an effort to appropriate for American art galleries the very objects d'art that had just been rescued from Nazi hands."

The collected cultural spoils of Germany had piqued the interest of American politicians and military leaders. President Truman sent a representative from the National Gallery to the Army's art repository in Weisbaden (the former headquarters of Goering's Luftwaffe) to make arrangements to ship 202 of the collection's finest paintings to Washington. The officers at Weisbaden were appalled. They sent a protest to Gen. Lucius Clay, the high commissioner of Germany's American zone, decrying Truman's order as morally untenable.

Walter Farmer, an architect from Cincinnati and the ranking American officer at the Weisbaden collection point, wrote to his wife: "This is the first time that America has stolen the cultural heritage of another country. We are no less and no better than the Germans."

Taylor's "Art Commandos" retained as a consultant Ernst "Putzi" Hanfstangl, director of a Munich's Alte Pinakothek Museum, formerly one of a group of art experts who advised Hitler on Jewish-owned galleries and private collections worth plundering. "Putzi" was an American born, transatlantic socialite and Nazi spy. He'd attended Harvard with Roosevelt, resettled in Germany, and partially financed Hitler's early political career with funds from wealthy friends on Wall Street. Hitler's first printing press was purchased by Hanfstangl with American money.

"Putzi" returned to the U.S. in the mid 30s, covering as an art dealer, and established a network of Nazi cells in travel bureaus across the country. Among them was the New York branch of the Hamburg-American steamship line, directed by George Bush's maternal grandfather, George Herbert "Bert" Walker. Hamburg-American financed scores of Nazi propaganda efforts in 1930s America. The company was seized by the American government in 1942 under the Trading with the Enemy Act. Hanfstangl, threatened with deportation, was taken under wing by then Assistant Secretary of War John J. McCloy (a postwar CIA director), and quartered at Fort Myer, headquarters of the Washington garrison, comfortably housed as an honored guest of the government.

After the war, Hanfstangl resettled in Germany to assist the CIA/MFA&A art "restitution" program as director of Alte Pinakothek. In exchange, paintings taken from the museum by the U.S. were returned. The paintings had originally been given to Hanfstangl as Nazi plunder during 1943–44.

The Fine Arts unit was disbanded in 1951. Untold thousands of paintings were turned over to German officials, many of them Nazi Party veterans accused or convicted of wartime atrocities.

WARNING!

Psychic Dictatorship in the U.S.A. is sure to shatter the casual reader's most comfortable delusions.

Bombing minds rather than bodies is the warfare of the new millennium. Alex Constantine's explosive book uncovers the terrifying extent of electromagnetic and biotelemetric mind control experimentation on involuntary human subjects in America today. Funded under the euphemism of "Non-Lethal Technology," the Pentagon has developed the ability to transmit voices, and inflict pain, madness, even death, with the push of a button.

Hard to believe? Believe it! Official sources have publicly admitted to the existence of such technology.

Psychic Dictatorship tracks the use of cults by intelligence organization as "cover" for arms sales, mind control and even child abuse to create assassins with multiple personality syndrome. The late actor River Phoenix was the most conspicuous victim of the Children of God cult, which preached sex between adults and children while collaborating with South American dictators.

Psychic Dictatorship's wide-ranging contents veer from the esoteric to the everyday. A stunning chapter investigates the history and effects of the artificial sweetener Nutrasweet, and its role in the dumbing of America.

Alex Constantine is the author of Blood, Carnage and the Agent Provocateur (about the L.A. riots) and a forthcoming book about the role of Non-Lethal Technology in the O.J. Simpson case. Mr. Constantine also contributes to L.A. Weekly, Hustler, and Prevailing Winds magazine, and provides radio commentary for KAZU-FM in Monterey, California.

Foreword

Although I have been a spy for my country – a clandestine operations officer or case officer for the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) – and am very familiar with blackmail, bribery, and the assorted perversions that common at all levels of society from the wealthiest elite to the basest rogues in the gutters and slums – it was not until recently that I have realized that every aspect of our government, economy, and society is controlled by a Satanic elite using a Deep State construct to manage all people, all corporations, all property, all land, and even all social conventions including the legalization of homosexuality and (had Hillary Clinton been elected) the legalization of bestiality and pedophilia.

The Deep State begins with the Rothschild family and their centuries-old genius in bribing monarchs and later parliaments and other forms of legislature into allowing them to literally own and control the central banks of all countries. The Federal Reserve in the USA is neither federal nor a reserve. It is a “front” for the Rothschild family and their assigns. In combination with the City of London and Wall Street, the central banks are the means by which every political-legal, socio-economic, ideo-cultural, techno-demographic, and natural-geographic condition is controlled Of, By, and For a tiny elite – 1% of 1%.

The Rothschild family is joined by the Black Pope, the Superior General of the Society of Jesus (the Jesuit order), and other elements of the Vatican (the Catholic Church) often far beyond the control of the White Pope, the nominal head of the Catholic Church. In the case of the Jesuits, their power has come from being the confessors and counselors to monarchs and mandarins for centuries, in one of the most complex sustained clandestine operations of global scope ever achieved, and from their control of trade in drugs and gold alongside the East India Company and its now infamous Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank controlled by the Rothschilds.

The Freemasons and the Knights of Malta are among the two most important secret societies that serve as transnational – which is to say, without national allegiance of any kind – consiglieri and “fixers” able to achieve any desired outcome at any level of any organization.

Using a mix of bribery and blackmail, the elite control every government, generally by sustaining a “two-party tyranny” that blocks seventy percent of the eligible voters – and candidates from small parties or candidates who wish to be independent – from ballot access. The politicians, together with senior bureaucrats hand-picked to be

Freemason or Knights of Malta or merely hired hands, and most particularly, senior executives of the secret intelligence services able to spy on and then blackmail politicians, judges, and celebrities, comprise “the best of the servant class” in this construct. Mind control, begun and used in the 1950’s and far advanced today, is the special purview of the secret intelligence services.

Pedophilia is generally understood to be about the rape of children by adults – children as young as two to four years old. Many children abused by pedophiles have been kidnapped and sold into slavery, and many have also been bred – from birth to sale – for pedophilia.

In the USA, although the Catholic Church and it pedophile priests – roughly ten percent of the total priestly population – have been known to a major enabler and cover-up of pedophilia – pedophilia is in fact very widespread across all demographic and religious groups, but generally trending at the elite level where it is considered a “privilege” of elite status, one that can be enjoyed with impunity as long the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) and 18,000 individual law enforcement jurisdictions continue to dishonor all of us by ignoring this scourge. One law enforcement organization, the Los Angeles County Sheriff’s Department – with arguably the highest percentage of elite pedophiles in the county within its jurisdiction – actually has a pedophilia symbol on its badge.

Pizzagate and Pedogate, rooted in the discovery by a Romanian taxi driver of many emails to and from John Podesta that contain clear references to pedophilia in all its forms – from art to swimming parties with children by name as “special guests” – helped expose pedophilia to a much broader audience of Internet-savvy citizens. It’s impact on public consciousness has been far greater than the Boy’s Town scandal in Nebraska documented in Nick Bryant’s book

The Franklin Scandal: A Story of Powerbrokers, Child Abuse & Betrayal (Trine Day, 2012), or the Boston Catholic Church scandal covered by the movie "Spotlight." While somewhat reminiscent of the White House and Congressional pedophilia scandals centered on Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert (R-IL-14), for the first time the public began to realize that pedophilia is pervasive across both the Republican and the Democratic political leadership.

The arrest and conviction of Jeffrey Epstein, a Mossad agent and fake billionaire whose assignment has been to lure as many US politicians, judges, and celebrities as possible to his "Lolita Island" in the Caribbean (or "no name" hotels in Washington, DC and New York City) so as to get them on video tape doing terrible things to children of both sexes, was a major but largely covered up window into how pedophilia pervades every aspect of Wall Street as well as Washington and Hollywood.

Now here is what is not yet being properly covered:

First, that close to one million children a year go missing across the USA every year.

Second, that beyond pedophilia lie Satanic murder rituals in which children who have been kidnapped or bought into slavery or exported from Haiti by the Clinton Foundation and its surrogates and others, are tortured and murdered with impunity.

Third, that the drinking of adrenalized child's blood – blood is adrenalized when the victim is tortured and terrified before death – think of the Chinse boiling dogs alive to adrenalize the blood and "improve" the flavor of the meat – is the ultimate pedophile "high." Silicon Valley's Peter Thiel is on record as receiving transfusions of children's blood. This is legal – and a stark confirmation of what the elite have known for centuries.

A final form of child exploitation appears to be rooted in the secret US Government programs substituting children for chimpanzees and black people as subjects for medical experimentation and long-range space missions – disposable children!

How we treat children, in my view, defines us as a society. I am gravely concerned by the decades long endeavor of the elite to dumb-down and fatten-up the population, weaponizing food and medicine to produce millions of people who are less able to think critically, less able to move with agility, and less able to be effective citizens in what should be, but is not, a democracy.

Around the world pedophilia is a scourge. The United Kingdom stands out as the worst of the Western countries, where members of the Royal Family and Parliamentary leaders including a former Prime Minister are clearly deeply immersed in both sodomizing children as well as murdering them and drinking their blood. Many other countries, such as Saudi Arabia, treat children as commodities that can be abused and traded and murdered with impunity.

I find it particularly troubling that the annual report on human trafficking by the US Department of State is so mediocre, lacking in substantive data and being more of a comic book narrative than a serious report. Indeed, it can be said that not only is the USA among the worst in terms of practice, it is also – along with the UK – the top funder of human trafficking and trade in body parts and bone marrow transplants and other forms of mutilating and exploiting the soon to be dead bodies of children. Separately, the enslavement of children, women, and men – generally of color – is thriving.

There are a number of published books on pedophilia and the author is to be commended for not only have extraordinary linked endnotes – the mark of both a responsible academic and a serious investigative journalist – but he has also compiled a bibliography of major works spanning the range from child abuse to slavery to sexual torture to Satanic ritual murder to the use of children's blood, body parts, and bone marrow as anti-aging tonics for the elite who can kill others with impunity that they might be refreshed.

This is the real world. It is time we all understood that this is the real world. Public understanding of the scourge of pedophilia in all its forms is a useful starting point for restoring dignity, integrity, and justice to our various governments and institutions. The Deep State – from central banks to pedophilia networks – must be put to death.

Few other words in the English language conjure up such strong value judgments and emotions as the word pedophilia. The word originates from the Greek “paidos” meaning “child” and “philia” signifying “loving.”[1] Because so many common misconceptions exist over what pedophilia is,[2] and since it’s the central controversial topic of this book, the first order of business needs to define what pedophilia actually is, and attempt to shed light on its most frequent misperceptions. Confusion abounds over whether pedophilia constitutes a mental disorder, a psychological condition or malady, or sexual orientation, and how pedophilia as a disorder should be distinguished from the near universally regarded act of child molestation as a legal crime in virtually every nation on earth.[3]

Considered a psychiatric disorder by the American Psychiatric Association (APA) dating back to 1952 with the first edition of its Diagnostic and Statistical Manual (DSM) on Mental Disorders, pedophilia has been included in all four revisions since. According to the latest 5th edition (DSM-5), what was listed in prior DSM’s as pedophilia is now Pedophilic Disorder, falling into the designated paraphilia class of atypical sexual disorders, is the diagnosis assigned to adults who have sexual desire for prepubescent children (deemed 13 years or younger). According to the DSM, the three criteria that must be met in order to diagnose an individual with Pedophilic Disorder are:[4]

- An individual who has had arousing fantasies about, urges for, or behaviors with a prepubescent child or children.

- The individual has acted out these sexual desires, or is experiencing significant distress or difficulty as a result of these desires.
- The Individual is at least 16 years of age, and minimally five years older than the child or children.

By using the words “acted out” in the second criterion above,[5] this generic definition is highly ambiguous since it fails to distinguish between those who act out their sexual desires and impulses through criminal behavior abusing children and those who are attracted to young children but do not act out their desires or urges physically with children. Acting out desires through masturbating and sexually fantasizing about children is not a crime, nor fraternizing and associating with other likeminded pedophiles (unless both are convicted felons). Another ambiguity in the definition of pedophilic disorder fails to distinguish a pedophile who fantasizes while watching child pornography, which itself is a crime, and a pedophile who bodily violates a child sexually. Both are pedophiles committing two separate crimes but obviously the child molestation is a far more severe criminal act that would ostensibly carry a harsher sentence.

However, viewing or engaging in the production or distribution of photos and videos graphically depicting children being brutally molested in the $20-50 billion child pornography industry is definitely a criminal offense.[6] And obviously for the incredible amount of money being made, there must be lots of child porn downloaders committing crimes to feed their sick pedophilic addiction. Inappropriate sexual touching of a child obviously constitutes felonious child abuse. Also a pedophile that profiles children as a predatory stalker awaiting the opportunity to sexually act out prior to the act of molestation is also itself considered a crime. Needless to say, buying and selling children and humans as well as trafficking across state and international borders[7] are despicable crimes and the ones that Illuminati government networks largely operate and control.[8]

So the discerning differential key and society's ultimate challenge to ensure the protection of children is separating the pedophile who acts out criminally as a child predator from others who keep their desires of attraction to their own inner thoughts and are not expressed either through child pornography nor direct contact with children. Since the latter pedophiles are neither criminals nor predators, they do not pose a threat to society. Obviously through the most judiciously legal and fair means, the pedophilic predator perpetrating crimes against children needs to be identified, segregated and removed from society for the sake of securing children's safety. Sexually violent pedophiles (SVP's) that are repeat offenders who clearly cannot control their compulsions to act out against prepubescent children, fully fit the criteria as mentally disordered criminals in need of treatment while posing a clear danger to children for civil commitment at a long-term mental institution.[9]

But when a ruling class has been free to rape and murder children for centuries at will with total impunity,[10] while child sex predators from mostly an underclass are the only pedophiles scrutinized, demonized and put away for life, this obviously is neither a just nor satisfactory solution. Largely to appease growing public alarm and wrath over rampant child sexual abuse globally,[11] the current hypocritical two-tier policy of granting carte blanche for the worst offenders systematically destroying thousands of children's lives each year[12] while a lynch mob vigilante force amongst the panic stricken public is gunning for overkill against those unable to afford dream team legal representation like billionaire Jeffrey Epstein is unacceptable.[13] A decade ago Epstein lawyers browbeat and pummeled down then weak and unethical US prosecutor then rewarded current US Labor Secretary Alexander Acosta to issue the billionaire his sweetheart deal - a get-out-of-jail card,[14] after raping dozens of underage girls while working for Mossad to incriminate dozens of high profile politicians like the Clintons in a blackmail scheme to maintain Zionist control over Washington.[15] That's hardly the answer either. Yet up till now, that's status quo business at the top of the pedo predatory food chain.

A half dozen years ago, 100,000 of the 500,000 registered sex offenders in the United States were reportedly missing and unaccounted for, that's one in five convicted rapists remaining at large,"[16] free to strike again harming yet more innocent victims. And similar or worse situations apparently exist in the UK,[17] Australia[18] and worldwide where no registered list of pedophiles even exist.[19] Despite registries' introduction in the US two decades ago, controversy still lingers over whether state sex offender data banks made public actually defeat their intended purpose. Critics contend that they are the prime driving force causing offenders to go missing while abuse advocates maintain they do increase public child safety. Several studies suggest that sex registration is effective in lowering recidivism but public notification may be increasing crime.[20]

There are several types of pedophiles based on the object of their attraction:[21] those who favor boys only, those attracted to girls only, or those who are attracted to both boys and girls. A common myth holds that a pedophile who abuses boys is a homosexual.[22] Many offenders abuse children of both genders and some are attracted to adult women as well. The designated exclusive type pedophile is only attracted to young children whereas non-exclusive pedophiles are attracted to both children and adults. A number of pedophiles assume "normal" lives, hiding their deep dark secret from even their spouses and families. Still other pedophiles only engage in incest with family members – most often their own children, or stepchildren. Incestuous parents are not always pedophiles either. They may seek sexual gratification with a child in closest proximity for lack of an adult sex partner.[23]

Hebephilia[24] is yet another type of paraphilia that the DSM-5 workgroup tried pushing through as an extension of pedophilia attraction, but reserved for children in pubescence aged 13-14, although some publications maintain a wider 11-14 age range.[25] In any event, it was adamantly opposed by too much resistance within the psychiatric and psychology fields that are unwilling to declare a mental disorder for having sex with puberty aged kids that culturally and biologically are developing sexually faster these days having already arrived at childbearing years. The Psychiatric Times lambasted the DSM committee for even considering the proposal, citing the sexual allure of the Calvin Klein ads using models in puberty as well as a reminder that the historic age of sexual consent around the world (even the US) until recent times had been 14 as reasons not to classify it as a mental disorder.[26] The article author, Dr. Allen Frances, openly admits that adult [men] lusting after 13- and 14-year old adolescent girls is perfectly normal, though still a crime to physically act on.

If hebephiliac was listed in DSM-5 as a mental disorder, forensic psychiatry that provides expert witness court testimony in child molestation trials would have been directly impacted, potentially putting hebephiles away for life in mental institutions. Adults having even consensual sex with a 17-year old is committing a statutory rape crime in most US states. Thus prison time for adult defilers of early adolescents is still the legal consequence, with or without the hebephilia diagnosis. In the end, due to such stiff opposition and heated controversy, the DSM workgroup chose to forego making “hebephiliac disorder” yet another official diagnostic entry. But in another article Dr. Frances alludes to some sneaky fine print in DSM-5 pertaining to a pedophilia definition that includes arousal from “prepubescent or early pubescent children.”[27] This mental disorder loophole imposes the forensic concern of having to commit sexually violent pedophiles (SVP’s) [i.e., a convicted rapists of early adolescents] confined to a mental institution the rest of their lives. Dr. Frances objects on both ethical and constitutional grounds that according to him in nearly all cases the rape offender of a pubescent aged adolescent does not suffer from a mental sexual disorder and therefore does not warrant a lifetime sentence in an insane asylum, believing it would be a travesty of justice. Of course with far more conviction, the same can be said for the raped pubescent girl or boy, regardless of the offender’s length of stay at either a prison or mental institution.

The American Psychiatric Association committee that published the DSM-5 in 2013 also came under heavy fire when it initially described Pedophilic Disorder as “a sexual orientation,”[28] or “sexual preference,” immediately interpreted by many conservatives as a transparent attempt by the liberal left to legalize and normalize the act of pedophilia, a salient topical and pressing issue[29] that will be addressed in the next chapter. Despite APA’s poor choice of words initially, in no way is pedophilic disorder simply a lifestyle choice or volitional preference. Understandably, critics charged the APA with intentionally trying to normalize, decriminalize and otherwise minimize the heinous criminality perpetrated by pedophilic disordered child rapists. The APA was forced to quickly change its online DSM wording, but too late for hardbound press, replacing the word “preference” with the word “interest,” accompanied by a public statement retracting its questionable choice of diction as “an error,”[30] and reiterating the serious nature of child molestation and child sex abuse as a felony crime committed by pedophile offenders.

A common misperception is to believe that pedophilia is the same as child molestation.[31] Pedophilia is the deviant condition of being attracted to young children, not the criminal act in and of itself. But here is perhaps the least understood fact of all - not all pedophiles are child rapists. Some never act out their desires through physical contact with minors. A leading pedophilia researcher, Dr. James Cantor, believes that a large majority of pedophiles never offend against children.[32] Another researcher, Dr. Hubert Van Gijseghem, states that many experts maintain that only 20% of sexual abusers are pedophiles.[33] If these experts are correct, many law abiding pedophiles are being wrongly persecuted by millions in society out of ignorance who simply lack accurate information and truth. It’s always easier to possess strong empathy for child victims than it is for adults who are different, misunderstood and unjustly scapegoated. A support organization and website called Virtuous Pedophiles helps pedophiles who agree that harming children sexually is reprehensible and support each other’s resolve not to act on their attraction. They resist the temptation and many of them pose no threat or danger to children.[34] From the website - “Yet we are despised for having a sexual attraction that we did not choose, cannot change, and successfully resist.”

As alluded to by both research findings and the quote above, pedophilia is an unalterable condition, a biological predisposition that one is born with. Hence, the consensus amongst researchers is that pedophilia is indeed a sexual orientation from birth, similar to homosexuality, which up until a few decades ago was also deemed a mental disorder.

Pedophilic disorder manifests as an onset in males at puberty.[35] Though according to US Justice Department, 96% of pedophile offenders reported to law enforcement in 1999 were male,[36] other studies have found that as many as 20% of the offenders of young boys were actually female and 5% offending girl victims were women.[37] Child sexual molestation perpetrated by adult women also tends to be less reported since society grants the nurturing bond of maternal love a far wider parameter when it comes to physical contact with children, reinforced by the common misperception that virtually all child rapists must be men.

Another factor making boy victims of adult women far more sensationalized in the media and different from girls molested by men is illustrated in the classic teacher-boy child relationship - the common myth that a 13 or 14 year old male is not a victim at all, but just the opposite - a fortunate beneficiary experiencing his “rite of passage” compliments of the mature “hot babe” who shows him the sexual ropes.[38] This theme’s often been exploited by the “Mrs. Robinson affair” in films like “The Graduate” and “The Summer of ’42” as well as illuminated by the infamous 20 year old case of former teacher Mary Kay Letourneau’s scandalous affair and marriage with her onetime 12-year old student turned longtime husband and father of her two youngest children, now their young adult daughters.[39]

On the other hand, male survivors of early child sexual abuse in a very real way have a more difficult time coping with sexual trauma.[40] The “macho male” conditioning that pressures males to always feel the need to be in control as the “stronger” of the two sexes, never allowing themselves to be vulnerable or shed tears for fear of being perceived as weak, this societal brainwash acts as heavy gender baggage that makes successfully working through sexual trauma all that much more of a challenge, compounded by the reality that males are far less apt to even seek help through support groups or therapy,[41] much less even confide in disclosing past abuse to others. Older abused boys and men are far more prone to acting out their internal anger and shame through violence toward self through suicide, or becoming drug addicts, or violence directed toward others, ending up in prison, potentially committing even rape and murder in a maladjusted desperate attempt to regain a feeling of control over their body and lives. Fear of being judged gay or a child molester keeps males from admitting they've ever been sexually abused.

With a mental health career spanning over a quarter century, I can vouch for the emotional scars causing child abuse victims to typically struggle with chronic low self-esteem, shame, self-loathing and self-blame, suicidal impulses, and severe lack of trust issues carried over into adulthood that manifest through major barriers in forming healthy intimate love relationships as well as creating work related problems.[42] The longitudinal effects of unresolved childhood trauma become a lifetime sentence and never-ending burden that victims take to their early graves twenty years ahead of their non-abused peers.[43] Even 17 years after a single sexual assault, one in six adult victims were found to still suffer from PTSD symptoms of flashbacks, nightmares and anxiety years later.[44] An extremely young fragile child victimized by sexual trauma at such an early developmentally formative, critical stage can rarely fully recover.

A cursory glance at the rising suicide rates across all generations, but especially amongst children, the highest in 30 years,[45] along with institutional trauma settings such as hospitals, women's shelters, courts and prisons, all give sobering pause, contemplating the devastating impact that child sexual abuse around the world ravages. Meanwhile, because this same world has failed so miserably to protect our children, each child rapist has been allowed to keep destroying hundreds of more innocent lives – 260 on average – before getting caught.[46] With children our future, we absolutely must stop this egregious, self-replicating cycle from exponentially destroying the fate of humanity that’s now hanging in the balance. Our pretending this global epidemic threatening the future of humanity doesn’t really exist by simply keeping our heads in the sand because child rape is just too emotionally overwhelming and shocking to even think about is no excuse. Our silence or running away only makes us part of the problem. The purpose of this book is to inform, educate and ultimately empower us to take constructive and decisive action together so that we can collectively end these horrific crimes against children.

The following paragraphs address a few more important statistical facts about pedophilia. Somewhat surprising findings are that near one in four (23%) pedophilic offenders are under 18, meaning that their victims were at least five years younger, and near half at 40% of offenders of victims under age 6 were juveniles themselves and 39% of the reported cases involving victims aged 6-11 were committed by juveniles.[47] With the typical male offender already molesting children by age 15, three out of four convicted pedophile rapists are under the age of 35. Highly correlated with the breakdown of the American nuclear family unit,[48] as far back as the mid-1980’s a dramatic spike was observed in the number of cases involving kids raping kids.

Younger child victims are very rarely molested by strangers (under age 6 only 3% and 6-11 only 5%) as 89% of all child sexual assault cases involve acquaintance relationships such as caretakers or family members.[49] Another important fallacy to understand is even though a small number of child abuse victims become pedophilic perpetrators, an overwhelming percentage of both male and female pedophiles were sexually abused as children.[50] On a related note, in a 1991 survey of state prison inmates in America, those convicted of raping children were significantly more apt to be child victims themselves than those sexual offenders that victimized adults.[51]

That same 1991 state prisoner survey showed that whites comprised 70% of America's state prison population convicted of child molestation whereas only 40% of those convicted of violent crimes against adults were white. Again from that same study, 2 out of 3 of all the convicted rapists reported that they had included children as their victims as well. The 1991 survey also found that about 10% of violent offenders against child victims received either a lifetime or death sentence yet the average sentence of 11 years for child rapists was less time than the average sentences received by rapists of adults.[52] So raping a child results in less punishment than raping an adult. Again, confirmation that in America less value is placed on the life of an unprotected child than adults. Is it any wonder we're amidst a global epidemic of trafficked in child pedophile victims?

The FBI contends that only 1-10% of all the incidents involving child molestation even get reported to law enforcement.[53] Though an exact percentage cannot be determined, based on anonymous survey studies, an estimated 3-5% of the general population are believed to be pedophiles.[54] Contrast that figure with the percentage of US presidents and Congress members who are pedophiles and that number shoots upwards from a third to a half as estimated by several recent government insiders, though many result from being ensnared by a CIA/Mossad run deceptive pedophile blackmail system that's also been operating worldwide now for numerous decades.[55]

Speaking of Washington's dirty trick politics, in the face of the controversial Pizzagate scandal that broke last year,[56] and many other confirmed documented scandals involving pedophilia and prominent government leaders in recent decades,[57] the now unavoidably recognized major human problem of child sex trafficking and its global implications as a widespread epidemic, make it incumbent upon this ambitious endeavor to offer a sound and accurate introduction to this all profoundly important subject matter that provides a clear and basic understanding of what pedophilia and its worldwide ramifications engender.

After the historic path of homosexuality moving from longtime mental disorder to today's social acceptance as a mere "sexual preference,"[58] and APA's embarrassing "oops" moment in 2013 attempting to likewise slip in pedophilic disorder as a "sexual orientation" and preference, their cultural parallels are now visibly working overtime to destigmatize and normalize pedophilia. With that in mind, a brief look at homosexuality's metamorphosis is relevant. Since 1973's DSM-2, homosexuality was officially removed[59] as a psychiatric mental disorder,[60] having gradually come to be viewed as a normal variant within the normative range of human sexuality, believed to also be predetermined biologically from birth. Its wide acceptance today, especially among younger generations, means that LGBT members can honestly be who they are, no longer forced to live in the closeted shame pretending to be someone they're not fearing harassment and persecution. Though some religions and individuals persist in holding onto sectarian or personal beliefs and moral judgement that engaging in homosexual acts constitute an abnormal, pathological sin, as of June 26th, 2015, the US Supreme Court granted the same legal marital rights to homosexual couples previously reserved only for traditional heterosexual marriage.[61]

As a longtime clinician and licensed Marriage Family Therapist, I agree that homosexuality should not be viewed as sexual deviancy or as a pathological disorder merely because the majority of humans are heterosexual, and that sex between two consenting adults - hetero or gay, is nobody else’s business. In my opinion gay couples or any LGBT combo thereof should be afforded the same basic legal rights and social privileges as married men and women, again affirmed two years ago by the Supreme Court.

But beyond that level of social equality and legal justice, I also maintain that people are entitled their own personal opinion as well as freedom of expression regardless of their particular pro or con position on homosexuality, despite the fact that these days, we’ve seen our First Amendment free speech rights usurped and destroyed by militant Politically Correct Gestapo thought police[62] quietly deployed and backed by the deep state New World Order agenda aggressively attacking our national sovereignty,[63] constitutional rights, our individual sovereignty, religious rights, our family as a sovereign institution along with our parental rights. Everyone, regardless of position, whether socially accepted by consensus or not, has the right to think and speak his or her mind. Sadly, already in the early twenty-first century, America’s disappearing freedoms one by one are being eliminated.[64]

Clearly the ruling elite’s overt agenda, using its go-to formula to divide and conquer[65] is busily creating such dissention, disunity, conflict and turmoil on this planet in order to establish dire enough conditions to facilitate a one world government[66] and one world religion[67] promising to “save us all” in order to completely enslave and control the global masses under a tyrannical centralized system of feudal totalitarianism. As such, the elite’s design is also to ensure that homosexuality, the entire LGBT PC agenda and pedophilia are incessantly infused into one “social justice” movement in the mind of the masses. Following the “success” in recent decades of the elite’s massive social engineering experimentation on humanity,[68] nefariously miseducating and manipulating generations of both males and females with massively blurred gender role and identity confusion,[69] we’re now witnessing a similar propaganda media blitz intending to normalize pedophilia as simply another “benign” life choice, deceptively on the heels of the LGBT movement.[70] Chapter 2 will delve much deeper into this all important topic.

Meanwhile, as mainstream media continues to lie and deny the existence of a global pedophilia epidemic and its extensive child sex trafficking networks operating worldwide,[71] taking delight in calling Pizzagate fake news,[72] the public isn’t buying it, coming to realize that many of our most powerful figures in government[73] on both sides of the Atlantic,[74] in the courts, corporations, banks, military, law enforcement, the intelligence community, communications media and the saturated entertainment industry[75] are either practicing pedophiles of the Luciferian persuasion[76] or are heavily compromised and controlled through the demonic elite’s extensive pedophile blackmail system.[77] The aim of this book is to fully expose this pedophile elite’s very dark, perverse web as the most expedient means to urgently protect our children while bringing down the pedo-crime cabal once and for all.[78]

According to research compiled over two decades ago, it was estimated that 20% of girls and 10% of boys had been sexually victimized as minors.[79] A more recent finding asserts that now one in three girls and one in five boys is sexually molested.[80] Multiple reports are now coming in from around the world, in places like Africa,[81] India[82] and Europe,[83] all confirming that child sexual abuse is surging,[84] including online child pornography,[85] to become a worldwide epidemic today. We must take a decisive stand now to stamp out this growing scourge, first by educating ourselves as to the extent and pervasiveness of the problem, and second by becoming proactive activists committed to positive change that includes taking steps to protect children from further exploitation and abuse, helping victims of all ages heal, while eradicating this malignant network of child rapists operating behind a millennium of sealed off impunity and previously impenetrable power.[86] Through Truth and Reconciliation Commissions, we can unveil the truth to usher in a peaceful revolution that will forever end the pedo-blackmail system that has controlled our politicians over this last century.

As a mental health clinician, I worked closely with hundreds of minors who are mostly incest pedophile victims turned courageous survivors. Drawing from my gratifying years of experience helping to heal emotional wounds of their trauma, I possess a lifelong passion and commitment to do what I can do to help one person at a time to heal this planet from centuries of criminal abuse perpetrated on our most vulnerable and defenseless population. As a therapist I spent way too many trips going to children's court only to not be heard while fighting to protect my child clients from further abuse by a thoroughly broken child welfare system that's failed to keep kids safe for far too long,[87] at times knowingly and willfully endangering youth to suffer additional mistreatment and horror that haunts them for the rest of their lives.

In the same way as a cadet and academy graduate I never endorsed West Point's failed leadership training program that merely produces the most avid order followers and robotic enforcers,[88] as a mental health therapist I never endorsed the sanctity of the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of mental disorders as "every diagnostician's so called bible."[89] It's neither an accurate nor fair account of classifying mental illness nor categorizing mental disorders, but merely an artificial social and political construct elevated to an undeserving pedestal status, given far too much credence to pseudo-science dogma for sole benefit of the medical and psychiatric establishment and institutionalized hierarchical corruption.[90] In this morally bankrupt system, a few degrees and credentials provide the power differential license to exploit and harm others. Armed with their educational brainwash, far too many psychiatrists, psychologists and therapists are trained to systematically psycho-pathologize and misjudge those perceived in any way “different,” “deviant,” “abnormal,” “pathological,” “crazy,” “insane,” “negative,” or “bad,” as a subgroup of so called mentally ill humans to recklessly conduct unscientific and inhumane experimentation on as their human guinea pigs,[91] with unproven theories and ineffectual dogmatic practices, prescribing harmful, even lethal drugs that straightjacket emotions, and smother symptoms and ultimately the very life out of their patients, never getting to the underlying, buried causes of dis-ease. Overmedicated America has more citizens dying from opioid overdoses than from cars and guns.[92] So Big Pharma’s been spreading its global reach overseas to Eastern Europe, testing new drugs on a whole new population of human guinea pigs to save costs and cut yet more corners on safety.[93]

Moreover, 10 clinicians assessing the same client presenting the same problems/symptoms invariably will come up with 10 different diagnoses based upon each’s own preconceived notions and familiar biases as interrater reliability is zero.[94] What does this tell you? Psychology and psychiatry are not like the natural sciences or even medical science where in the lab and under the microscope certain scientific laws and formulas are precisely consistent, easily replicated, proven and confirmed. But when it comes to the complexity of the human mind, based on a few minutes or even a few hours of behavioral observation, clinically assessing and diagnosing is about as unscientific and subjective as you can get.[95] Consequently, clinicians misdiagnose patients most of the time, and since their entire treatment rests on an accurate diagnosis, patients are mistreated with the wrong drugs that do damage (since psychiatrists are generally owned by Big Pharma as glorified drug pushers).

On top of this blanketed pigeonholing system that gets it wrong so much of the time operating exclusively from a DSM “bible”[96] that with each revision adds scores of “newly discovered” mental disorders so that more human guinea pigs can be drugged for profit,[97] every single psychiatric diagnosis is based solely on a formulaic assessment interview and limited observable behavior (with most shrinks in my experience typically spending all of five to ten minutes per patient). External human behavior is derived from a whole host of internal dynamics based on an interplay of thoughts and feelings drawn from multilayered factors that include sensory input and processing, early childhood conditioning, any past trauma personality, individuality, learned experience, genetics, situational determinants and biochemistry that together at any given moment can act as various causative agents. But relegating everything to a quick biochemical fix is a hit and miss operation that utterly fails to grasp the complexities of the human mind and spirit. The half empty lens of abnormality and impairment is the wrong approach. The glass as half full perspective offers a more positive, strength based, integrative and holistic focus that assists clients build a stronger social support system and produces far better outcomes and prognoses.

Worst of all, the pervasive stigmatization,[98] particularly prone in Western societies, being mislabeled[99] as mentally ill is so far reaching, ethically and morally unjustified and emotionally crippling, it renders whatever small merit the failed psychiatric diagnostic system as not worth the colossal damage caused to millions of people branded with mental illness. That this “convenient” diagnostic classification system has been insidiously co-opted, financially exploited, thoroughly corrupted and diabolically controlled by the cancerous giant pharmaceutical industry[100] known as Big Pharma represents an abhorrent WMD abomination against humanity. It's a total betrayal of the Greek physician and original oath author Hippocrates' axiom "first, do no harm."[101] Finally, pertaining to those afflicted with pedophilia disorder, currently there exists neither an effective drug nor an effective cure,[102] remedy or treatment that eliminates the typically overwhelming compulsions driving so many pedophiles to repeatedly reoffend.

Short of the barbarity of lobotomies (performed rarely if ever now)[103] and surgical castration which ended in 1975, and even chemical castration though female hormonal injection has proven ineffective,[104] none of these treatments alter the hardwiring of the mind that controls what a pedophile is most attracted to, so the fact remains that no treatment has yet been discovered that to any significant degree reduces the high recidivism rates of this condition.[105] According to the California Department of Corrections, over half of all convicted child rapists in the California penal system end up raping more children within a year after their prison release, and within the first two years 77.9% are back behind bars.[106] One statistic even states that over 90% of convicted pedophiles will be arrested again for the same offense after their prison release.[107] Many researchers like Dr. Kantor and his colleague Dr. Michael Seto concur, citing a much lower recidivism rate of just 10-15% for convicted first time offenders.[108] The Harvard Medical Publications website reported that one review specifies a much wider range of 10-50%, due to research variance in how recidivism is defined, pointing out that some studies use any previous offense followed by a molestation conviction as recidivism whereas others more aptly choose in their data base only repeated sexual child abuse offenses.[109]

With no actual successful treatment that effectively controls a convicted offender's temptations yet developed to date, I say better to err on the side of precaution and prevention for the sake of saving more children from a life of suffering and despair. Another way of putting it, the danger of high risk pedophiles addictively, habitually acting out their sexual impulses, desires and fantasies by continuing to molest children far outweighs reoffending pedophiles' individual rights to freedom even if they've served their time. Recall the finding that the average convicted pedophile keeps raping children 260 times until he or she gets caught and removed from harming more children.[110]

The fact that so many pedophiles keep repeating their crimes relentlessly until they do get busted and incarcerated means that as a society sooner than later we must urgently do a far better job identifying, apprehending, convicting and removing pedophile criminals from all access to children. From the Illuminati government leaders to the judges to the police to the child protective services to the schoolteachers, priests and pastors, to the coaches, the caregivers down to the incestuous family adults, it's always the pedophile-foxes guarding the defenseless youth henhouses. This is how the global pedophile operation has been allowed to flourish through the ages. But the masses are finally beginning to wake up now. And we will no longer tolerate this evil system devouring and destroying millions of innocents.

For those pedophiles whose condition is less severe and have always managed to control their sexual impulses and never inappropriately touched a child, they need to be commended for maintaining a perfect record of self-control against the odds. It's important to know and understand the plight and struggle of the innocent pedophile too. Despite not harming any kids, just because they are pedophiles who have no choice over their attraction for children, society embodied by the uneducated masses lacking awareness and understanding, is all too eager to play judge and jury in lynch mob mentality to punish them for crimes they never committed. They must hate their life predicament, and often hate themselves because they're so reviled by the culture they live in. As innocent law abiding citizens, their fate is to endure life from the shadows of shame and secrecy with love never fulfilled.[111]

Researchers need to determine how these pedophiles who never hurt children effectively cope with their affliction and begin utilizing their identified strengths and coping skills to treat other pedophiles to discern if true rehabilitation is even possible. Of course those pedophiles with more severe symptoms no doubt will be unable to utilize the same coping skills and interventions that have proven effective for those with less severe cases.

Before closing this introductory chapter, a couple more important points bear brief mentioning here. The plethora of hard facts presented were all based on pedophiles who decades ago had been caught, convicted and serving prison sentences for their crimes against children. During the ensuing years since, child sexual abuse has skyrocketed globally. Additionally, the offenders from those studies and their numbers compiled so long ago were all extracted from the then prison population. US inmates - both then and now - reside in a nation that contains only 5% of the world population yet incarcerates 25% of the planet's prison population[112] with inordinate numbers (59%) of people of brown and black color,[113] preponderantly from lower socioeconomic classes and backgrounds. In contrast, the bulk and thrust of this book's focus centers nearly exclusively on pedophilia amongst the 1% elite population that virtually owns and controls this entire planet, including the international crime cabal government responsible for operating the global trafficking network, raping and murdering hundreds of thousands of child sex slaves each year.

This presentation is intended to shed light on the dark hidden sinister world of the elite. The planet’s most powerful child rapists tell a wholly different story that warrants our attention in the remaining chapters that unveil the diabolical misuse of children to enhance both their physical vitality and strengthen their satanic power ruling over the earth and humanity. At the end an epilogue will lay out the strategic plan that we empowered citizens of the world can implement, designed to both bring down the evil crime cartel and its heinous operation destroying our children. Through both educated awareness and mindfully committed action, light overtakes darkness and goodness prevails over evil.

“Some psychiatric leaders who were instrumental in removing homosexuality from the American Psychiatric Association’s list of mental disorders in 1973 have been fighting to remove pedophilia as a disorder as well, not to justify the abuse of children but rather to say that being sexually attracted to children is not a mental disorder.”

Michael L. Brown,[i]

author of A Queer Thing Happened to America[ii]

The first chapter of this book alluded to how the psychiatric field utilized its latest edition of the DSM “bible” to attempt to normalize raping children, initially calling pedophilia a sexual orientation following the footsteps forged by homosexuality as a onetime deviant mental disorder turned sexual orientation morphed into the widely accepted normative sexual choice that it enjoys today. As early as 1998, the American Psychiatric Association (APA) made its objective explicitly clear, maintaining that the negative impact of child sex abuse when adults have sex with children was “overstated”[iii] and that:

The vast majority of both men and women reported no negative sexual effects from their child sexual experiences.

As a longtime clinician working with victims of pedophiles, that is not my observation or experience at all. The traumatic effects of child sex abuse emotionally and interpersonally may last a lifetime, and its effects sexually likely do as well. In my humble opinion, for at least two decades the APA has a proven track record of being far more interested in the well-being and care of child rapists than victimized children. Bottom line, protecting child molesters is a priority over protecting children. But then this powerful organization has also played an integral part in the CIA's MK Ultra and Monarch mind control programs as well, where young children are systematically sexually traumatized to intentionally induce dissociative states and alter personalities.[iv] An infamous example of the APA-MK overlap was the sadistic Dr. Ewen Cameron, who served as both the APA president while running the unlawful, inhumane MK Ultra program experiments using LSD on unsuspecting victims and abusing children.[v]

At a July 2013 pedophilia conference held at UK's prestigious University of Cambridge, research experts concluded:

Paedophilic interest is natural and normal for human males. At least a sizeable minority of normal males would like to have sex with children… Normal males are aroused by children.[vi]

There you have it, the psychiatric profession embraces pedophiles as typical "normal" males. If that's not enough to prove that psychiatrists care more about child rapists than children, more evidence is written right into the various state laws as in California and New Jersey. A California law actually prohibits mental health counselors from trying to get a pedophile to change his behavior or speak negatively about it,[vii] according to the attorney who is currently suing the state of California to change the law that clearly is detrimental to the safety and welfare of innocent children. The idea that therapists can be negatively sanctioned for attempting to change the criminal behavior of a client, who poses a serious threat to children, makes absolutely no sense at all. But then that’s the inverse, upside down world we’re now living in these days.

Aside from the “expert” advice of psychiatrists and psychologists forging their way, the elite - comprised of so many pedophiles - with unlimited resources, possesses a myriad of other approaches, venues and arsenal weapons at its disposal, to methodically persuade and gain wider social acceptance necessary to legalize child molestation. Ultimately the elite’s subversive mission or game-plan is first unleashing the “experts” out to “educate” the public, backed heavily by the media echo chambers declaring “no harm, no foul,” while saturating the airwaves with movies, TV and music with the running theme that “it’s only normal,” so the Washington pedophiles can then justify a vote to decriminalize and thereby free themselves from any chance of ever paying for their horrific crimes. And by that time deep state’s Federal Reserve will have tanked the economy to manipulate an angry public into blaming Trump,[viii] so he’ll be out and pedo Pence will be in.[ix] Already smelling blood, just before the VP kills and drinks it, Pence already betrayed Trump setting up his own political action committee to launch his backstabbing future presidential coup.[x]

The notion that pedophilia is a permanent, immutable condition inherited from birth[xi] is a slippery slope that some believe may relinquish self-responsibility for abusing children, which moves toward potentially normalizing and decriminalizing pedophilia, with the precedent of homosexuality already in place. A growing number of researchers believe that most child molesters are not pedophiles and that a sizeable yet unknown percentage of pedophiles live a celibate lifestyle never touching or harming children.[xii] It’s important to realize that satanic pedophiles amongst the elite will use these latest findings to their advantage. Changing societal mores leading toward increasing leniency, normalcy and decriminalization will only justify their continuing to feed off the flesh and blood of children for rejuvenated strength, longer life and enhanced power practiced since ancient times.[xiii] Ritualized sacrifice of young innocents through systematic rape, torture and wholesale slaughter perpetrated by the Illuminati elite has secretly flourished to this day with total impunity.

But by the day, the recent exposure of the massive PedoGate scandal[xiv] is looming larger,[xv] and the planetary controllers are becoming increasingly nervous and desperate to legalize their pervasive violation and bloodlust toward children in order to evade criminal indictment and impending incarceration. President Trump[xvi] and Attorney General Sessions[xvii] have put them on notice. And for that reason, the deep state is amassing all its sinister forces to bring Trump and Sessions down before the pedophilic elite can be brought to justice. They'd rather destroy the earth first than relinquish their demonic power. We are currently amidst an epoch battle of the ages and survival of the human species and planet hang precariously in the balance.

This chapter will focus on the multi-level front offensive geared to change the public's mind and attitude toward pedophilia, deploying insidious, subversive ways to frenetically shape culture and opinion towards gradually accepting adult sex with underage children as a normative choice and civil right, just like homosexuality. In recent decades through massive social engineering,[xviii] the LGBT agenda[xix] coalesced and fused together in Political Correctness,[xx] has opened the door wide open for the creeping pedophilia agenda. The war for your mind is being fought on many fronts every single day, so beware.

Meanwhile, in response to the deep state West's "blame it on Putin and Russia" lie[xxi] that the left has used in vain to try and bring down Trump[xxii] and instigate World War III,[xxiii] the very prudent president that the Russians have known as their only leader this century[xxiv] - Vladimir Putin, had this to say in his Christmas message to the world last year:

> The excesses and exaggerations of political correctness in these [Western] countries indeed leads to serious consideration for the legitimization of parties that promote the propaganda of pedophilia.[xxv]

As mentioned in the first chapter, clearly the globalist agenda and their Western minions is to utilize weaponized social engineering, the LGBT movement and Political Correctness to propagandize and brainwash the Western masses away from their traditional Christian and family roots in order to normalize pedophilia. As usual Russian President Putin was spot on.

It was reported just a few days ahead of the two world leaders Putin and Trump meeting for the first time in Hamburg on July 7th that the shrewd Russian leader issued a stern warning to the American president to begin "exposing pedophiles in Washington DC," or else Russia will. Moscow's foreign minister Sergei Lavrov released this statement:

> The foundation of support for pedophilia within US politics is a global issue that must be eradicated . This level of unethical corruption must be stopped, and we have the means to expose it if the US Government is unwilling.[xxvi]

Thus, clearly the Russian Federation has had enough of Washington's never-ending lies and false accusations, straight out of the mouths of so many compromised pedophiles like McCain, Graham, Schumer and Pelosi,[xxvii] and knows that the cesspool inside Western politics must be wiped clean. The two hour meeting in Germany was said to have been successful with both leaders establishing a rapport to work together with a focus on the future rather than the past.[xxviii] Though no press mentioned pedophilia was on their itinerary per se, by the Russians making it an off-table priority underscores the need for pedophilia so heavily concentrated in Western governments led by the United States to be rooted out. With a wink and a nod from the hordes of guilty insiders operating within the power centers of Washington,[xxix] London,[xxx] Brussels,[xxxi] and Rome's Vatican,[xxxii] where for decades pedophilia has flourished the most with the most impunity because the pedo-elite meticulously set up its insulated bribery-blackmail system to exercise absolute control over their Western puppets.[xxxiii] This evil broken system has got to be taken down.

And that's why over four decades ago in the United Kingdom a coalition merged between homosexual and pedophile rights as the beta test forerunner of what was to come.[xxxiv] Either though deceptive means of controlling politicians through pedophilia and sexual blackmail, or whether so many of the West's political leaders are natural born sexual deviants who diagnostically fit the compulsive mental disorder as full blown child raping pedophiles, from presidents[xxxv] to prime ministers,[xxxvi] [xxxvii] from speakers of the house[xxxviii] to powerful senators,[xxxix] [xl] congress members[xli] [xlii]and MP's,[xliii] court judges,[xliv] [xlv] military generals[xlvi] [xlvii] to police chiefs[xlviii] [xlix] and police commissioners,[l] [li] a significant and inordinate percentage of these top Illuminati puppets in Western nations are pedophiles.[lii] [liii] And though 99.9% of their grotesque criminality has always remained above the law for centuries, managing to squelch every major police investigation and circumvent indictments due to their insulated power that shields and protects them from exposure and incarceration, I believe those days are coming to an end. Putin and Trump have the opportunity to work together to finally drain the global pedo-swamp, make our children safer and bring peace to this world. That’s if the elite’s deep state doesn’t blow up the world first.

The countless pedophile scandals involving satanic ritual child sexual abuse and subsequent cover-ups committed by top leaders in virtually all the Western governments over the last few decades alone serve as overwhelming, conclusive and undeniable evidence that virtually all the leaders on the world stage are high powered child molesters[liv] that oversee the black ops-CIA-UN-mob controlled child sex trafficking as well as the drug and arms smuggling operations worldwide.[lv] But pulling their puppet strings at the top of this Luciferian pedophile food chain[lvi] are the 13 Illuminati family bloodlines that really run this devil’s dominion planet.[lvii] These include the Rothschilds,[lviii] Rockefellers[lix] and the British Windsor’s (part of the Merovingian “seed of Satan” gang).[lx]

Though satanic ritual abuse and sacrifice go back to ancient times, a quick laundry list of their most infamously brazen, modern, fully documented pedophile scandals can start with the satanic sexual abuse at daycare centers in the 1980’s that included the McMartin,[lxi] West Point and the Presidio cases,[lxii] two enormous scandals that went straight to the Reagan and Bush White Houses - the Franklin scandal[lxiii] and the CIA run Finders scandal,[lxiv] both breaking in the mid to late 1980’s.

The never-ending Catholic Church pedo-epidemic[lxv] spanning centuries as well as the globe[lxvi] leads straight to the Vatican popes. Ratzinger was busted for covering up the church scandal and forced into retirement.[lxvii] Then under Francis’ watch there was a 2014 scandal hardly anybody ever heard of involving a Polish archbishop who collected over 100,000 child pornography photos, 160 videos of child abuse as well as a record abusing dozens in kids in Poland and Dominican Republic. While on house arrest awaiting trial, he “mysteriously” died.[lxviii] But this last week the depraved debauchery at the Vatican broke wide open. As if Pope Francis’ right hand pedophile recently charged with the biggest Catholic child abuse scandal in Australian history wasn’t incriminating enough,[lxix] the priest under another of the pope’s top aides, the cardinal leading the Pontifical Council to “clean up” sex abuse in the church, was just caught in a police raid hosting a gay cocaine orgy at his Vatican pad.[lxx] With Rome’s amidst an internal turf war right now and Pope Francis’ Jesuits in a Vatican takeover, a recently fired holdout loyal to Ratzinger in retaliation called the cops on the cocaine snorting gay boys. With the Church steeped in child trafficking, a Vatican insider predicts that Francis will resign during an upcoming trip home to Argentina shortly.[lxxi]

Then there’s the infamous UK entertainer Jimmy Savile case, whose rapes span a half century involving as many as 500 victims[lxxii] when the kiddie lover wasn’t pimping group home kids off to British royalty, PM’s and MP’s.[lxxiii] Two decades ago Belgium was rocked by the deadly 1996-97 Dutroux scandal and its high end cover-up,[lxxiv] followed by the DynCorp-UN-US State Department child sex abuse slavery rings busted in 1999 Bosnia and elsewhere to this day.[lxxv] Then the thousands of missing, tortured, sexually abused and murdered North American aboriginal children (and women)[lxxvi] along with the 8 million children around the globe who disappear every year, many trapped in sexual slavery trafficking rings.[lxxvii] Tony Blair[lxxviii] and George W. Bush[lxxix]regimes’ are notorious for their pedophile sex ring cover-ups. Jeffrey Epstein’s Lolita Express and Sex Slave Island pedo blackmail operation involved both Clintons and possibly Trump among others,[lxxx] [lxxxi] the Dennis Hastert pedophile case,[lxxxii] the Penn State Coach Jerry Sandusky case,[lxxxiii] the Pentagon-NSA-CIA child pornography cover-up,[lxxxiv] UK’s satanic Hampstead scandal,[lxxxv] the pedophile infested Hollywood scandals and its exposed satanic ritual abuse,[lxxxvi] and finally right up to the DC/DNC’s Pizzagate[lxxxvii] turned worldwide PedoGate.[lxxxviii]

But there’s more. How can we forget the massive underground operation run by CIA-military black ops inflicting sexual trauma induced dissociative disorder, programming kids of all ages since the post-WWII CIA Nazi Paperclip era to this day, producing multiple generations of MK Ultra and Monarch[lxxxix] mind controlled victims as child sex slaves,[xc] demonically controlled sex slave entertainment superstars,[xci] super soldier assassins,[xcii] spies,[xciii] drug runners[xciv] and even Manchurian mind-controlled US presidents.[xcv] [xcvi] All this evil raping of children is every bit real! It’s all even been covered even by mainstream press,[xcvii] despite these days not hearing a peep about either the current pedo-epidemic[xcviii] or Trump’s child trafficking busts[xcix] since taking office except when ridiculing[c] believers in Pizzagate/PedoGate as “fake news.”[ci] The elite’s running scared that the scandal of the millennium will bring the entire cabal crashing down. That’s why the globalists are frantically trying to ensure their house of cards economy,[cii] Trump impeachment[ciii]/assassination[civ] and world war explode first.[cv] With luxury subterranean contingency plans,[cvi] as transhumanists with years of supplies, they believe they can survive anything.

All these high crimes and sordid atrocities are interrelated and interconnected, and establish the pedophilia epidemic as indisputable fact, regardless of lame stream lies of denial, all involve the same child sex predators ad nauseam, comprised of US-Western government agency personnel who are pedophile puppets owned and controlled by the Illuminati Satan-worshipping, child raping and child murdering elite. And these are merely the most notorious cases that the system was not quite successful enough to cover up. The extent of the dark, heinous evil being perpetrated by this worldwide criminal enterprise is still largely unknown. But with the Illuminati government-owned thread as the connecting dot that runs through every wicked one of them, the pedophile epidemic operated by the international crime cabal in Washington, London, Brussels and Vatican must be exposed and brought down. This book is intended to facilitate and help jump start that process.

We can go back to the 1970's and 1980's in the United Kingdom as just one example of early proof of how embedded the child molesters and pedophile supporters are and were in the London government.[cvii] Along with the Vatican and US, Queen Elizabeth and her MI5 and MI6 minions have long played a leading role in global child/human trafficking.[cviii] Some of the biggest names in UK politics are and were above the law child rapists.[cix] For over a decade, from 1974 to 1984, the Paedophile Information Exchange (PIE),[cx] an infamous UK organization of self-identified child rapists[cxi] who promoted lowering the age of sexual consent in Britain to just four years of age, by invitation openly infiltrated and co-opted the National Council for Civil Liberties (NCCL),[cxii] a major activist NGO currently known as Liberty, whose leadership figures during that decade have since risen to the highest positions in UK politics. Back in 1975 The Guardian chronicled the partnership forming between NCCL and PIE in a headline heralding the move as if promoting civil rights for gays and pedos is progress for us all: “Child-lovers win fight for role in Gay Lib.”[cxiii]

Back in early 2014 when four of these onetime NCCL leaders as career public servants and political figures were sitting atop the British government and throne, the Daily Mail began publishing a series of incriminating articles exposing the fact that four prominent government leaders decades earlier had sought out the pedophile organization PIE to form a working partnership of likeminded left leaning activists promoting both gay and pedophile rights. Longtime leader of the Labour Party and Parliament fixture since 1982, Harriet Harman, and her MP husband Jack Dromey as NCCL officers, back in the day attempted to water down child pornography laws.[cxiv] They welcomed PIE founder and Chairman Tom O'Carroll to not only become an NCCL member but also a speaker at their spring 1977 conference. The couple vehemently denied their involvement with the pedophile organization, claiming the Daily Mail was guilty of launching a campaign to smear their good name.[cxv] Jack Dromey insists that he only attacked PIE for its vile nature, never embracing it. Yet his past actions speak louder than his feeble 2014 words.

Still another high profile power player currently with a gig as the first openly gay advisor to Queen Elizabeth is Lord Justice Adrian Fulford,[cxvi] who founded a group called Conspiracy against Public Morals that also pushed for pedophile rights, even sharing the same mailing address as PIE. Fulford worked with both NCCL and PIE organizing support rallies protesting outside the court buildings where pedophiles like Tom O'Carroll and a half dozen other PIE members were tried and convicted for child pornography and child molestation. The lobbying group Fulford founded distributed pamphlets urging that children would be liberated from the oppression of both the state and their family if they were legally allowed to have sex with adults. Guilty of loyally promoting the organization that lobbied to reduce the age of sexual consent to just four years old, when asked about his pedophilia support, typical of public figures caught in a scandal, one of the most senior judges in the UK suddenly had a lapse of memory:

I have no memory of having been involved with its foundation or the detail of the work of this campaign.

For someone who insists he never supported PIE, it's odd that the PIE newsletter would go out of its way to thank the then barrister for a rousing 1979 speech he made on the pedophiles' behalf.

While Patricia Hewitt was the NCCL secretary general for a decade from 1974-1983, archive records show a document published in her name only, advocating to lower the age of sexual consent in special cases to just 10 years old, and to 14 nationally, and also to legalize incest.[cxvii] After receiving a written request from the PIE chairman in 1975 to consider PIE's recommendations to reduce the age to just four, Hewitt responded:

> We have found your evidence… most helpful and I think it has certainly been taken into account by the people preparing our evidence.[cxviii]

And the NCCL pedo lovers' evidence from one of their 1976 documents horrendously states:

> Childhood sexual experiences, willingly engaged in, with an adult result in no identifiable damage.[cxix]

The woman whose name appears on that document ended up from 2005 to 2007 serving in Tony Blair's pedo-infested Labour Party government as the nation's health secretary of all things. Whose health? Certainly not innocent little British children's. Then in 2010 as an MP along with three of her colleagues, one of whom served as Blair's defense secretary Geoff Hoon (1999-2005), Patricia Hewitt was busted in a £3,000 a day pay-to-play operation and suspended by her own Labour Party, amidst scandal ultimately deciding to quit politics.[cxx] To her partial credit though, of the four power players who so enthusiastically and publicly pledged their support to pedophilia back in the 70's and 80's, in 2014 Hewitt was the only one coming closest to an apology, expressing regret over her past decisions, although she still claimed it was NCCL's executive decision, not hers, pushing to lower the age of consent to 10.[cxxi]

UK Prime Minister Tony Blair Labour Party government was populated by pedophiles in his key cabinet posts. A UK intelligence investigation - codename Operation Ore - identified 7,250 suspects as potential pedophiles nationwide, hundreds occupying government positions while Blair was prime minister.[cxxii] America's counterpart under the pedophiles-R-US regime of Bush and Cheney was Operation Avalanche,[cxxiii] implicating an incredible 35,000 potential suspects under investigation, but only 100 were charged. The war criminals Blair and Bush[cxxiv] thwarted and protected their pedos at the top, Blair issuing D-Notices, both essentially using gag orders that sealed off all records from the media using their manufactured war in Iraq as the all-too-familiar, flimsy "national security" cover-up excuse. Despite their overt gross obstruction of justice, one of Blair's closest aides Phillip Lyon was arrested for child pornography.[cxxv] After 9/11 mastermind[cxxvi] and pedophile Dick Cheney,[cxxvii] President George W. Bush's next in line to the US throne was GOP Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert, who himself was later busted for raping teenage boys as a wrestling coach.[cxxviii]

Another flagrant Blair pedophile cover-up involved Freemason, UK defense minister (from 1997-99 just prior to Blair's corrupt choice Hoon), and NATO Secretary General (1999-2004) - Lord George Robertson.[cxxix] The Lord used his unholy power of influence to secure guns for known pedophile and mass child murderer Thomas Hamilton after Hamilton had earlier been denied. Then in 1996 Hamilton fired off multiple deadly rounds at the Scottish village Dunblane's middle school massacre where 16 children and their teacher were shot dead prior to Hamilton turning one of the four guns Robertson provided on himself. Blair squelched the investigation that would likely have uncovered the major child sex ring that Hamilton had set up for Robertson and other British elite. The link between Dunblane's exclusive boarding school, the Queen Victoria School, and pedophile VIP's is just now coming to light again in an ongoing inquiry this year.[cxxx]

Similar to Washington, with the UK government swarming with hardcore pedophiles or conscripted by blackmail design, the rising stars of Hewitt, Harman, Dromey and Fulford may well have been aided by their pro-pedophilia stance "boldly taken" early in their careers. After all, the Pedophile Empire rewards its own as a means of both self-replication, self-protection and maximized control. Demonstrated loyalty to the pedo cause by advocating decriminalization of pedophilia in the 1970's could not have gone unnoticed by UK's pedophile royalty.[cxxxi] [cxxxii] The gay pro-pedo judge ends up queenie's personal advisor and the other three ride Blair's ascent to thin air heights within his Labouring Pedo Party. Remember, pedophiles always promote and protect their own kind.

Liberal British mainstream press apologists in 2014 offered the lame rationale that the wayward judge and NCCL trio of pro-molester proponents that ran the civil rights group in the 70's were innocently caught up in the fervor of the youthful liberation revolution at the time, unwittingly standing side by side tolerating pedophiles aligned with them.[cxxxiii] But these four rising stars were highly intelligent privileged individuals with legal backgrounds in their late twenties and early thirties who knew exactly what they were doing - embracing the rights of adults having sex with kids. And they all were duly rewarded.

Journalist Sonia Poulton pointed out in March 2014 the hypocrisy of so much negative attention being paid upon the four pro-pedos from the 70's and 80's when in recent years she's interviewed dozens of molested victims who have named their parliamentary rapists, some still in government and some not, and after reporting these crimes to the police, absolutely nothing has been done to bring any of them to justice.[cxxxiv] This frozen stall is deliberate so the guilty can remain free. Even after MP Tom Watson confronted PM David Cameron on the spot in the House of Commons, convincing UK's leader to agree to launch an investigation in October 2012, finally doing something about this pervasive, shameful blight on the corrupt UK government, yet to this day as in America, not one high profile politician's been arrested.[cxxxv]

Since the so called Cameron "investigation" never got off the ground, in July 2014 Home Secretary Theresa May initiated the Independent Inquiry into Child Sex Abuse (IICSA) to take testimony from child abuse victims.[cxxxvi] But the pedophiles keep ensuring they remain immune from any and all accountability so their crimes only continue. In September 2015 the IICSA announced that all the data that had been gathered from abuse victims and witnesses was conveniently deleted from its database due to an "accidental" glitch. The obvious self-sabotage was just another successful ploy to cover-up the rampant pedo epidemic in the UK. Sonia Poulton lamented how she only observes the same unindicted politician-rapists aligning themselves ever closer with focus groups, high powered lawyers and academia (not unlike the four NCCL-PIE players decades earlier) to push for reducing the age of consent so they can continue raping children and escape justice.

Today's mobilized effort to normalize and legalize child rape is moving faster because a growing segment of the global population now knows more than ever about the elite's criminal operation. The establishment's concerted attempt to protect their own pedophile interests over protecting innocent children is blatantly clear. Elitist criminal scum look upon their victims as expendable throwaways, the same way

New World Order’s Illuminati chairman and globalist guru Henry Kissinger views us all as “useless eaters”[cxxxvii] and Hillary as “deplorables.”[cxxxviii] As always, the guilty still operate above the law as they continue sodomizing and destroying generation after generation of children’s lives. But the tide’s finally turning, and now’s the time to take a stand.

From their cozy mansions, the Illuminati elite watching that PIE phenomenon unfold years ago when an open lobbyist group representing their demented kind was actively pitching the UK government to decriminalize and normalize pedophilia way back when, no doubt had to be a celebrated moment of encouraged optimism. Pedophilia was and still is opportunistically riding on the coattails of progress advancing homosexual rights since being gay was no longer a crime (as of 1967 in UK) nor a mental illness (DSM-2 removed it in 1973). Garnering support from a sympathetic leftist press, prominent academia figures and college student unions alike, buoyed by NCCL’s decade long loyal support, all collectively embracing pedophilia rights, helped recruit over 200 PIE members by its second year in existence.[cxxxix] The pedo-elite had to view this burgeoning development as a successful first beta test run towards decriminalization. From the ruling elite pedophiles’ 1975 vantage point, the future of pedophilia must have looked promising, not that they ever really worried that their living above the law would ever catch up to them.

With PIE’s inroads in 1975, the elite agenda promoting normalization of child molestation as a legal and viable lifestyle choice must have appeared fairly close at hand. From the wider mid-70’s macro-perspective, the elite’s CIA created cultural and sexual revolution in the West was at its crest, steeped in the leftist counterculture movement pushing drugs and sexual promiscuity amongst the younger generations’ “do your own thing” hedonism along with out of the closet homosexuality.[cxl] Elitist social engineering manifested the CIA sponsored and anointed Gloria Steinem to lead the feminist movement,[cxli] and the blurring of gender roles, androgyny[cxlii] and the LGB birth was launched (T came later). Additionally right on cue, the divorce rates began climbing significantly, and mothers as heads of single parent family households were starting to emerge as well.[cxliii]

By 1975, the ruling elite was targeting a slew of enemies lined up in its crosshairs, designated for systematic destruction - a sovereign, relatively well informed, educated, post-Vietnam/Watergate citizen populace with a distrust toward authority,[cxliv] still in possession of a relatively critical thinking mind. Two other enemies were the sovereign institutions of marriage and family, still represented by a relative stable marriage rate and traditional American nuclear family still a majority.[cxlv] A productive enough national economy was able to still support a robust, largely affluent, upwardly mobile middle class majority.[cxlvi] All these positive US trademarks as "land of the free" givens had long symbolized America as a strong sovereign independent nation and world power. But by the mid-70's, the global elite had already decided that the American people had had their heyday and it was time to destroy these made in the USA standard beacons of light and Yankee ingenuity.

By globalist design, America was still reeling from its first lost war in history,[cxlvii] a war it was not intended to win.[cxlviii] With the two Vietnams reunified under the victors' Communist rule in 1975, the elite's next manufactured war that America was again never intended to win was its long "war on drugs,"[cxlix] the war that turned our nation into a permanent welfare state with a growing underclass comprised mostly of disenfranchised minorities largely stuck in urban city ghettos and barrios.[cl] The Bush-Clinton-CIA drug cartel running an international cocaine smuggling operation pumped tons of the white poison into America's inner cities[cli] and gave rise to gang turf warfare in both America and Latin America,[clii] ripped apart countless American families, inflicting its heaviest toll on families of color, resulting in fatherhood absenteeism lost to newly built privatized prisons.[cliii] [cliv] The elite's war against America decimated its once vibrant middle class and nearly destroyed its forsaken poor.[clv]

Meanwhile, throughout this postmodern period of hardship and upheaval for the global masses, pedophilia as an accepted social norm has only made small creeping progress. Subsequently, to speed up the process, overt signs are now appearing everywhere, designed coercively to manipulate and mold public opinion into becoming pedophile-friendly. To those pedophiles who don't abuse children, as a society we should make treatment and social support groups more amenable. But for child rapists and molesters masquerading as our planetary masters, as soon as possible they need to be removed from all access to both children and humanity, and forced to undergo treatment for their dually diagnosed psychopathy and pedophilic disorder.[clvi] To allow literally a handful of severely mentally ill individuals control and destroy what's left of the earth is pure madness.

Decades ago the UK police claimed that PIE members were sexually abusing children on an "industrial scale," and soon enough many in the organization ended up convicted sex offenders doing time in prison. And though its membership roster numbered about 1,000 in 1983, the year prior to disbandment, the traditional values of the British people had resoundingly rejected pedophilia from becoming an acceptable norm. UK's age of consent remained at 16, and the elite's beta test failed. Perhaps the last straw arrived when early anti-pedophile crusader PM Geoffrey Dickens publicly accused senior diplomat Sir Peter Hayman a pedophile and PIE member in 1981. The nail in the PIE coffin was when a Briton who was both a PIE member and also a KGB agent received a 38 year sentence in November 1982.[clvii] Less than two years later PIE was history.

After their failed experiment was over, the pedophile-elites were forced to go back to the drawing board to come up with a whole new strategy, this time deploying on multiple fronts to convince everyday people to accept the insanity that child rape is an okay, normal behavior. And in recent years the globalists have pushed back aggressively against public resistance.

Today we hear "you're a bigot if you don't support homosexuality." Tomorrow we'll hear "you're a bigot if you don't support pedophilia." This of course has been the longtime elite agenda. Actually writing for Salon two years ago, Todd Nickerson as the leftist rag's pedo poster boy already has.[clviii] According to Todd, those still having a problem with accepting pedophilia are bigots. Nickerson's series of articles are designed to educate a largely prejudicial society in order to facilitate increasing understanding and acceptance. But as soon as controversial, openly gay, now former Breitbart editor-alt right public speaker Milo Yiannopoulos uttered an off the cuff statement in an interview touting the merits of a man-boy pederast relationship (older male in a homosexual tryst with an adolescent male minor), Todd's two year presence on Salon was suddenly removed.[clix] While the pedophile was silenced, the so called "painless" pedophile victim Milo abruptly lost his book deal, his Breitbart job and seemingly his career. All this occurred last February just days after the Berkeley campus police complied with a stand down order most likely issued by the mayor,[clx] in effect permitting Soros-hired leftist thugs to riot at will in order to cancel Milo's speech.[clxi] So much for free speech at the birth of the free speech movement.[clxii] It appears Political Correctness has reared its ugly head once again. Or has it? Milo celebrated his Fourth of July publishing and releasing his own book Dangerous and three days later it's the #3 Amazon bestseller the same day he files a $10 million lawsuit against his former publisher Simon & Schuster.[clxiii]

In his articles on Salon, Nickerson draws numerous conclusions that are faulty, self-serving and seriously dangerous to your child's health. He comes right out and says it, "Pedophiles are no different from gays, and thus deserve civil rights."[clxiv] Sounds like PIE reborn, four decades later. Another gem: "pedophiles don't harm children, society does."[clxv] Todd's contention - as the self-appointed "gentle teacher" who obtains consent from his young child friend/victim (which in reality at age 5, 8, 13 or 15, does not exist), simply wanting to sexually pleasure his little friend/victim, sex would actually be "healthy for the child," claiming no victims at all. But it's society that makes it so sinful and shameful, and that's what harms children, not the adult having sex with them. This twisted logic that a child molester, however gentle, doesn't harm a child is aimed at destigmatizing the child rapist, and instead blame an ignorant, harshly judgmental society for the child abuse. This is so much brainwashing bullshit, and a huge giant step towards normalization, the creeping pedo con job way. Another Nickerson grandiose delusion is he insists that little kids want and need pedophiles. Yep, he believes little children want sex and actually come onto him all the time, but as a "virtuous pedophile," he turns them down, if only to run to the bathroom to relieve his horniness for a five-year old he's been hired to babysit who he's certain lusts for him as much as he for her. Sex between a loving pedophile and a child he believes is a win-win, healthy situation. The guy's a narcissistic sicko.

It's interesting that the conservative National Review actually came out with an article defending Salon for the pedophile post.[clxvi] With the left-right tag team owned by the same pedophile elite bent on normalizing child molestation, it's all being carefully choreographed to make a socially engineered imprint on the masses. Once the Review gave Salon the nod, in the next segment Nickerson came out playing the victim's violin:

> With regard to angry respondents to my article, the greatest amount of flak has come from the far right, who smeared Salon for daring to allow me to speak, as if silencing pedophiles somehow equates to fighting sexual abuse.

The pedophile's article was entitled, "I'm a pedophile, you're the monsters: My week inside the vile right-wing hate machine."[clxvii] Again, anyone who speaks out against pedophiles is a hate speech spreading bigot out to silence him from having sex with little kids, if only the laws were changed to make it legal. Via Salon, elite's decriminalization/normalization propaganda has been delivered to bend and shape our minds. But in the wake of Pizzagate turning into PedoGate,[clxviii] and the unveiling of the pedophile empire parasitically praying on 8 million missing children every year,[clxix] and Trump and his attorney general's vow to start locking child rapists up, suddenly Mr. Nickerson's nowhere to be found. But the relentless mind control programming must go on…

As a noteworthy side note, the organizers behind last February's Berkeley campus riots are linked to NAMBLA,[clxx] which stands for the North American Man/Boy Love Association.[clxxi] Many leftist social justice groups maintain loose coalitions with other likeminded groups. In the US and Canada, NAMBLA is the counterpart to UK's defunct PIE, and an out of the closet organization founded in 1978 that consists of pedophile members actively advocating adult males having "consensual" pedophilic and pederast relationships with male children of any age. The group is lobbying for abolishing all age consent laws and freeing imprisoned child molesters convicted of non-coercive sex with children. An undercover policeman infiltrated the group in 1995 and determined that its membership rolls numbered 1,100.[clxxii] For the most part, NAMBLA has been ostracized by the LGBT community and in recent years its membership has decreased significantly. Many former members are now active in online websites although NAMBLA reportedly maintains operations in New York and San Francisco.

Though NAMBLA apparently never attracted political movers and shakers like the four PIE supporters who rose to lofty influential heights within the UK government, of course inside the American government there are already loads of pedophiles subversively pushing the same derelict agenda to legalize and normalize. But in contrast to UK, they've managed to keep a fairly low profile. However, in 2015 former US House Majority Leader Tom DeLay made news claiming that he had managed to secure a memo from the Obama Justice Department that listed the agenda to legalize a dozen "perversions":

They're now going to go after 12 new perversions. Things like bestiality, polygamy, having sex with little boys and making that legal.[clxxiii]

DeLay announced this bombshell just four days after the Supreme Court made gay marriage legal. The former GOP honcho also added that the Justice Department already has an aggressive strategy in place to go after any churches or religious organizations that may attempt to oppose these incredibly sick sexual behaviors. Though this accusation sounds unbelievable, knowing that Satan worshipping pedophiles rule the world, none of this should come as such a shock. It's just more evidence that those in power will sink to shameless depths of depravity in their lust for absolute power and control.

LGBT lover Barack Obama with his federalized Common Core state bribe[clxxiv] and mass education dumb down,[clxxv] insists five-year old kindergarteners are ready for sex education.[clxxvi] This sexualized enculturation of children as standard inoculation[clxxvii] is the mental equivalent to the elite's weaponized campaign mandating poisonous vaccines that devastate children and their families around the world.[clxxviii] All this warm and fuzzy Orwellian stuff, mandating kids' exposure to perversion and death, is the eugenics endgame of a warped, inversed society that's harmful to children's early conditioning and psychological development.[clxxix] And throughout our culture today, it's rampantly spreading like an out of control cancer, subversively intended to totally usurp parental rights that rightfully give them the responsibility and authority to teach their own kids about sexuality at a time when they deem age appropriate and far more healthy for their children.[clxxx]

On a related topic, Obama's VP Biden has to be a pedophile, based on dozens of videos showing him on full display lasciviously pawing and compulsively groping every little girl within reach.[clxxxi] It's more than evident that old Joe Biden's got a serious problem, becoming totally inappropriate with cameras rolling in front of millions who see him in action, the dirty old man just cannot for the life of him keep his hands off little girls, nor his pervert lips from whispering dirty sweet little nothings in their ears. In one video, it's all too obvious that future Attorney General Sessions knows that Biden's a molester as he irritatingly slaps Biden's hand away from a small girl he protectively ushers away from the disappointed fondler.[clxxxii]

Speaking of objectifying little girls as sex objects to fondle and marvel at, the beauty pageants for four and five year olds adorned in heavy makeup and scantily clad outfits exuding a twisted adult's idea of sexuality is another distorted, sick brainwash imposed on young children that's highly detrimental to their developmental health,[clxxxiii] and of course eye candy for the pedo crowd. Again, by insidious, endless repetition the agenda is inculcating the subliminal message that it’s okay for adults to have sex with little children, if it’s done properly by a self-appointed expert - like the “child loving” pedophile Todd Nickerson. All this is demented propaganda. The toxic brainwash of our young is as close as an iPad or TV away, 24/7 poisoning the minds and lives of our children as creeping pedophilic mass mind control.[clxxxiv]

Yahoo showcases an illustrative piece written by a mother who is joyously turning her nine year old daughter into a sex object of adornment for Halloween, not so much for her child’s delight as her own, admitting it’s a couple years premature for her daughter’s own natural inclination to be sexy.[clxxxv] Yet in the next breath mom contradicts herself several times claiming how normal it is for her “tween” to “explore her sexuality.” How about how abnormal and hideously perverse it is for a parent to sexualize her 9-year old kid, turning her into a little showpiece harlot while acknowledging the horde of pedophile pervs out there just waiting to pounce on her. Again, the classic child beauty pageant syndrome where mothers compulsively dress up their little girls like hookers and publicly put them on display, not so much for the health and well-being of the little girl, but for the vicarious kinky gratification of the selfish parent. But as the champion of twisted social media warriors everywhere, Yahoo Parenting News approves, so it must be normal.

Demonstrating solidarity with the pedophilia normalizers, Twitter, Yahoo and no doubt Google, Facebook and Reddit as social warrior bastions and “fake news” gatekeepers[clxxxvi] are doing their part to “pedophilize” America by militantly taking up the cause of pushing pedophile rights. Prominent Twitter user Sarah Nyberg was outed as the transsexual pedophile formerly known as Nicholas by another Twitter user.[clxxxvii] So Twitter suspended the account of the exposer of truth while Sarah the victim was barraged by dozens of fellow social justice warriors rallying to her cause. A journalist at the Houston Press and Cracked.com even sent the pedophile a photo of his daughter just to cheer her up by apparently turning her on.

This creeping movement towards normalized legal pedophilia has also been aided along the way by passage of a series of laws in the last decade that blur the lines further.[clxxxviii] In many states 13- and 14-year old girls are now authorized to receive abortions without parental consent or any police involvement. The "Romeo and Juliet" laws springing up around the nation[clxxxix] empower underage girls to freely engage in consensual sex with potential older male adult predators (as long as the age gap is less than 5 years). A bill that would have forced rape and incest victims to report the crime to law enforcement prior to attaining an abortion was voted down.

Between the so called experts - the psychiatrists and psychologists - insisting that pedophilia is a natural born sexual orientation like homosexuality and heterosexuality,[cxc] backed by a number of likeminded professors from the academia world in full agreement, and "virtuous pedophiles" like Todd Nickserson, pedophile victim Milo Y.'s pro-pederast statement, and unvirtuous pedophiles personified by NAMBLA and the Obama administration, all seem to be simultaneously getting behind the singular theme that consensual pedophilic relations don't necessarily cause harm to children. Add reinforcing research results from a 1987 Dutch study claiming that a sample of boys in pedophilic relationships felt positive about them and a more recent Northwestern meta-study from 1998-2000 asserting that pederast relationships when entered voluntarily are "nearly uncorrelated with undesirable outcomes," and we have a collective totality from all these trends and unfolding developments in the West paving the way towards normalization and decriminalization of pedophilia.

It should be pointed out that there is no current consensus amongst the scientific community that maintains pedophilia is a sexual orientation or neurological predisposition just because new research receiving lots more press these days “suggests” so.[cxci] The “I was born this way” mindset can become a convenient excuse unintentionally propagated by experts leaning toward the nature etiology as the cause. However, this view is challenged and opposed by a number of mental health professionals who are adherents of the belief that pedophilia is more a learned condition, potentially caused or exacerbated by any number of biological, developmental or environmental factors such as childhood abuse, early childhood experience, cognitive distortions, poor impulse control, lack of social skills, isolation, absence of an adequate social support system, psychopathy.[cxcii] Pedophilia as a mental disorder does not preclude offenders from taking moral responsibility for their actions.[cxciii] This could merely be a deceptive ploy attempting to silence children as the real victims by turning perpetrators into grossly misunderstood, wrongfully persecuted victims of a fate they never chose or can control, ultimately blaming society for only increasing child abuse by others’ harsh punitive treatment and stigmatization toward pedophiles. An irrefutable counterargument to the “I was born this way” deference is simply asking the question, if some individuals were born with homicidal thoughts, would it grant them the right to commit murder?

The only agreed upon assumption shared by both the “nature vs. nurture” camps is that more research is necessary to learn the true etiology of this mental disorder. The movement pushing pedophilia as a fixed, involuntary, biological condition is being used as a convenient rationale to promote the false notion that like heterosexuality and homosexuality, it’s simply a birthright that should be accepted as another normalized variant on human sexuality. This slippery paraphilic slope will then lead to bestiality/zoophilia, then after that it will be necrophilia’s turn, as society’s descends deeper into Luciferian hell.

Another example is how acceptance of pedophilia has seeped into US military policy and doctrine under the amoral leftist commander-in-chief Obama. The directives from the Pentagon ordered US troops in Afghanistan to respectfully ignore the Afghan bacha bazi (boy play) custom where Afghan allied commanders regularly sexually abuse young Afghan boys and girls.[cxciv] American GI’s reported that they were supposed to pretend they weren’t hearing the screams at night coming from little boys being raped within earshot even on US military bases by Afghan pedophiles because it would undermine local credibility and authority of the leaders the US was training and placing in charge. When an incident occurred with a Green Beret sergeant roughing up an Afghan commander for his sexually abusing children, it was the American warrior with a conscience who was punished, not the pedophile.[cxcv]

Leave it to the liberal left hipster crowd of Sweden to take acceptance of pedophilia and sexual deviance to a whole new level of lunacy. The progressive Scandinavian nation’s Liberal Youth League recently made official its endorsement of necrophilia (sex with dead corpses), polygamy, child pornography and incest.[cxcvi] Add to this list of “progressive” tolerance the youth party’s already embraced pro-position on bestiality and you have the embodiment of today’s upside down world of anything goes perversion. Sodom and Gomorrah never left. It’s in Sweden.

The pedophilic ruling elite’s biggest weapons of mass destruction are polluting the minds of the masses through entertainment industry and MSM propaganda,[cxcvii] nefariously engaging in mind control to normalize pedophilia as yet another legal lifestyle choice and social justice birthright.[cxcviii] The social justice warrior class, so easily manipulated by the billion$ from George Soros, are targeted as unsuspecting mind control victims, thoroughly brainwashed by the flood of leftist propaganda that elitist pedophiles utilize to win over clueless hipster generations that are amassing in July to riot with intent to overthrow by any means necessary the only anti-child sex abuse president the US has had.[cxcix] The enemy of both the American people and Trump is running scared with a "him or me" mentality, which is why the elites are working overtime to incite a second civil war and mind control the masses into believing pedophilia crimes are normal and harmless.

The father of American propaganda, Edward Bernays,[cc] wrote in 1928 nearly a century ago in his seminal book Propaganda:

> The conscious and intelligent manipulation of the organized habits and opinions of the masses is an important element in democratic society. Those who manipulate this unseen mechanism of society constitute an invisible government which is the true ruling power of our country. We are governed, our minds are molded, our tastes formed, and our ideas suggested, largely by men we have never heard of… It is they who pull the wires that control the public mind.[cci]

Like the Orwellian semantics game as another weaponized device within the propaganda machine, pedophilia has become the euphemistic term now deceitfully being redefined as "attraction to minors," conveniently deployed new language to sanitize the down and dirty truth of child rape, sodomy and exploitation that constitute criminal pedophilic acts and child pornography.[ccii] Changes in language and meaning play a significant role in modifying public opinion, perception and belief. An organization calling itself B4U-Act, comprised supposedly of mental health professionals, began in 2003 renaming pedophiles “minor attracted people” in its inexorable drive to normalize and legalize child rape.[cciii]

Unfortunately in today’s culture we have is a hipster crowd of “new age” moral relativists who espouse an “anything goes” philosophy. They’ve removed the entire concept of right versus wrong right out of our vocabulary and consciousness. Yet this damaging, anything but “truth-bomb” is contaminating young impressionable minds, especially when instilled early, potentially becoming irreparable. If one grows up without a strong moral foundation, minus any sense of right and wrong, one is far more apt to make unhealthy choices both detrimental to oneself as well as to others.[cciv] But then that’s the elite’s whole point. The moral relativism of our times embodies contrite expressions like “who’s to judge?” or “that’s your truth, someone else’s might be different,” “everything is relative,” “if it feels right, do it” or “life is made of shades of gray, and there are no black and white absolutes.”[ccv] All these perspectives convey a similarly common world view that clouds and obscures the fundamental issue of right and wrong, subtly juxtapositioning pedophilia to be promoted as an amenable, inalienable individual right and choice.

As the mainstream purveyors of “fake news,” CNN, CBS, Associated Press, the Washington Post and New York Times et al are news outlets whose job is at all cost to protect the pedophiles by never reporting pedophilia a global epidemic, much less that it’s controlled and operated by the pedo-elite and their pedo-puppet minions in government and entertainment. Despite Trump and company appears to be making it a priority to bust global child sex trafficking networks,[ccvi] arresting over 3,000 suspects in his first three months as president,[ccvii] lame stream continues to deny and lie as if all those past undisputed child abuse scandals never ever happened. In February this year the CIA that runs WaPo[ccviii] even hired Pizzagate suspect himself John Podesta as a featured columnist.[ccix]

Another notorious attempt by the six oligarch owned and controlled mainstream media giants to upgrade the criminal image of the pedophile was a New York Times op/ed piece from October 2014 entitled “Pedophilia: A Disorder, Not a Crime” written by a Rutgers law professor, another pedo apologist from ivory tower academia.[ccx] After running through the usual pity party pseudo-science postulates of a condition that happens to pedos as victims, despite the poor efficacy of treatment, the author does make one valid point at the very end:

Acknowledging that pedophiles have a mental disorder, and removing the obstacles to their coming forward and seeking help*, is not only the right thing to do, but it would also advance efforts to protect children from harm*. [Boldface mine]

Turning from media to entertainment, most of the Hollywood moguls and many of today’s biggest superstars in the film, television and music industry are pedophiles,[ccxi] or, like so many politicians, are compromised ones by sexual blackmail. Because entertainment icons are the prime conduits of mass mind control, wielding the power to influence and control potentially billions of people on this planet, they too are systematically targeted, mind controlled[ccxii] and misused and abused especially for resisting[ccxiii] their diabolical purpose to spew out satanic perversion and pornography designed to make pedophilia seem clean and acceptable by comparison. Anything wicked goes, in fact they’re pit in competition for who can come off as the most wicked in Satan’s Hollywood.

Former child actors like Corey Feldman[ccxiv] and Elijah Wood have been vocal of the rampant, notorious abuses suffered by young vulnerable child actors.[ccxv] Feldman's best friend was the now deceased Corey Haim who was violently raped at age 11 and died of drug overdose at age 38.[ccxvi] The powerfully moving documentary "An Open Secret"[ccxvii] chronicles the plight of victimized children in Hollywood[ccxviii] and how their sexual predators lurking throughout the industry use alcohol and drugs to intoxicate to then sodomize vulnerable victims. Both Open Secret and Corey Haim graphically illustrate how being sodomized by rapists who remain free taunts and gnaws at victims, often turning to drugs and alcohol to self-medicate and cope with their post-traumatic demons that never leave, only to have their lives tragically cut short way ahead of their time, 20 years on average.[ccxix] How dare those pedo-loving APA shrinks lying through their teeth in 1998, claiming no ill effects from childhood sexual abuse!

To the child abusing publicists, photographers, directors, producers[ccxx] and other adult actors, kids are fair game. Because the news media industry, the television industry, the film industry and the music industry are all pretty much owned by the same mass media moguls, it becomes easy for those who own and control Hollywood to remain above the law,[ccxxi] especially when police are often pedophiles themselves or under strict control of the perps sitting atop the Sodom and Gomorrah cesspool.

Then with the briefest glimpse of any typical programming content from TV, film, music[ccxxii] and video gaming, one can readily see the graphic sex and violence saturating every entertainment medium, including more in our face satanic imagery,[ccxxiii] and it becomes blatantly evident that those who run Hollywood are operating from the demonic dark side.[ccxxiv] An anything goes depravity and perversion are depicted throughout every so called artistic medium within the industry. At great risk brave entertainment insiders and whistleblowers are beginning to emerge exposing demonic child sacrifice on altars.[ccxxv] In recent decades a growing number of films have featured pedophilic relationships followed by typically favorable reviews from papers like the NYT, generally validating or leaning towards pedophilia as a viable life choice within the naturally complicated world of human desire and sexual intimacy.[ccxxvi] The aim of the Hollywood propaganda machine is to pump out subliminal if not overt messages to present pedophilia as increasingly more commonplace and acceptable.

The enormously successful and powerful Disney Company (parent to ABC) has marketed its multiplicity of products and venues primarily for children's consumption for the last 90 years. But during the last couple decades, the old 33 degree Freemason's Walt Disney Company has become highly suspect for its constant encrypted hidden sexual themes promoting homosexuality and pedophilia galore. In 1998 40% of its employees were leaked out by CEO Michael Eisner to be gay, no doubt a sizeable majority by now.[ccxxvii] Whereas for many years the incessant gay cues were subtle and usually hidden, this year's remake of "Beauty and the Beast" includes its first openly gay kissing scene in Disney cinematic history. Now that Disney's gayness is finally graphically out of the closet, this year's Beast has turned into Baphomet himself, complete with large horns, symbolizing Satan.[ccxxviii] The message to children [and adults] - love Satan and the world's riches will be yours.

The Disney Company is no longer the home of family values, anything but. A book exposé entitled Disney: The Mouse Betrayed[ccxxix] reveals that Disney has a major pedophile problem in its midst amongst employees working in all facets of the business, from its animation department to costumes at the Disney studio, Disney World in Florida and Disneyland in Southern California.[ccxxx] Countless Disney workers have been arrested for sexually abusing children. And the company has a law enforcement reputation for willfully obstructing the ongoing investigations. Additionally, Disney also owns one of the largest soft porn distributors, apparently maintaining exclusive contracts with the industry's most prominent porn stars.

Just as in 1776 with Rothschild money, Illuminati founder Adam Weishaupt targeted both family and religion as primary obstacles to worldwide domination and control,[ccxxxi] so too is Disney now being used as a subversive, weaponized Trojan horse spreading constant subliminal messages designed to undermine and destroy both family and religious values.[ccxxxii] Hyper-sexualization of young girls and age-inappropriate sexual innuendo have become running Disney themes in all their movies and products for some time now. The latest example is the Disney toy that's one big phallic penis, perfect for early indoctrination targeting future pedophile victims.[ccxxxiii] Needless to say, the innocence of the Bambi years died decades ago.

Now that I have unveiled the elite's demonic design to make pedophilia both a normalized life choice and legal right, removing it as a serious mental sickness and egregious crime that it is, the next chapters will expose the elite's bloodlust for sodomizing and sacrificing children from ancient times to the present, led by Catholic Church as the Synagogue of Satan that for centuries has enabled and shielded pedophiles around the world.

Many of the planetary controllers are blood feasting pedophiles, parasitic monsters literally and predatorily feeding off the 8 million children gone missing each year around the world.[1] Global child sex trafficking networks generate huge profits, run by the world’s most powerful individuals. A 2014 International Labor Organization report estimates that two thirds of the annual profits from forced labor come from sexual slavery that amounts to $99 billion USD each year.[2] And of that $99 billion, most is produced off the blood, sweat, tears and flesh of helpless underage child sex slaves caught up in global trafficking rings operated by this same diabolical global elite. At the top of this planet’s rulers are 13 family bloodlines that include the Rothschilds and Rockefellers as well as European royalty,[3] controlling thousands of compromised, bribed and blackmailed puppet politicians, bankers, judges, CEO’s, military generals, entertainers, top level spies and police chiefs.

Blackmailed pedophile politicians,[4] [5] many of whom are well known elected representatives occupying critically important positions in virtually every national government, particularly in the West, have remained insularly protected and immune from investigation and prosecution.[6] Why? Because those running these global child sex networks internationally control both them as well as law enforcement and the high courts.[7] Pedophiles are disbursed amongst such elitist think tanks as the Council on Foreign Relations, the Trilateral Commission, the Bilderbergers as well as various covert organizations like Yale's Skull and Bones Society, 33rd degree and higher Freemasonry and the secret Jesuits. The bottom line is too many of these "upstanding" members lead two distinct lives, one being their public life upholding their respected reputation as so called public servants, and the other being their secret dark life as satanic worshipping, bloodthirsty child rapists and killers. Pizzagate and the Podestas and Clintons,[8] the Weiners and Jeffrey Epstein are merely the tip of the iceberg[9] to this pedophilic black holed world that's ruled over this planet for eons of time.

With last year's Pizzagate turned this year's Pedogate scandal exposing these malevolent cockroaches like never before,[10] 2017 finds this diabolical elite frantically heading for the hills, buying up private islands[11] and submerging underground,[12] while aggressively acting out above ground with false flags every other week[13] and by the day desperately pushing humanity off doomsday cliff, closer to world war and global economic collapse.[14] Faking staged events has become an unholy racket of government theater.[15] With attention of the public masses distracted and forced into preoccupation with everyday signs that our world appears to be fast falling apart, desperate monsters fearing loss of control are banking on their sins against our children being drowned out by the elite's manufactured storm of earthly chaos, shock and awe noise and escalating terror of ongoing violence, war and ultimate global destruction.[16]

While the pedophilia epidemic currently has us never closer to bringing the hordes of guilty child rapists finally to justice,[17] it's no accident that we've also never been closer to self-annihilation as a human species.[18] Before the psychopathic criminals who only have contempt for humanity are taken down, they're determined to first destroy Trump and Putin as well as the rest of us,[19] drastically reducing the world population by their divide and conquer,[20] fast kill methods[21] of war and violence using their "Russians did it" fabrication as their false pretense.[22] If the Illuminati controlled deep state cannot break or destroy the proposed allied partnership forged by Trump and Putin to truly fight against globalism, the deep state created ISIS terrorists and the child rapists and killers as the planetary overlords of chaos and destruction, expect to only see more subterfuge, false flags and destabilizing violence globally inflicted on humanity through economic collapse and world war. Over their dead bodies, the last thing those ruling this earth want is peace and prosperity for us humans.

This chapter analyzes and exposes through history the very dark, sinister, most egregious atrocities against humanity - the despicably sick, voracious appetite planetary controllers have had for children's flesh and blood.[23] Like the demonic vampires they are, the blood of the innocent literally becomes the lifeblood that rejuvenates their own vitality, strength and bloodlust to demonically and compulsively feast on yet more of their targeted defenseless prey. The elite has long known the veracity of the latest scientific breakthroughs and discoveries confirming the incredible dividends gained from consuming young people's healthier blood that restores vitality, aids them reverse the aging process to enhance their quest to live forever. It's only being made more public at this time as part of the elite's deceitful strategy to condition the masses into accepting the controllers' ancient practice of exploiting children for their flesh, blood and internal organs,[24] paralleling their quest to normalize and legalize pedophilia as just another variation of this same demonic agenda. The remainder of this chapter focuses on this systematic child rape, murder and blood sacrifice throughout history from ancient times to the present.

Ancient Practice of Human and Child Sacrifice

Over the centuries many cultures from virtually every corner of the globe have been guilty of the shameful practice of child and/or human sacrifice.[25] Based on recently uncovered evidence, ancient Greece may be the latest civilization discovered to have conducted child sacrifice.[26] A teenage boy's remains were found last August in an identified location commonly reserved for animal sacrifice to Zeus. Other known ancient cultures that regressed into sacrificing fellow humans in the Middle East are the Egyptians, the Mesopotamians, the Babylonians, the Canaanites, the Ammonites, the Israelites, the Carthaginians in North Africa,[27] in Europe the Etruscans (from Italy's Tuscany region)[28] and the Celts of the British Isles,[29] in Pacific Asia the Chinese,[30] the Japanese,[31] the Koreans[32] and Hawaiians,[33] and in Central and South America the Aztecs, the Mayans and the Incas.[34] Indeed child sacrifice may appear to be a common practice that at times increases during the descending collapse of various civilizations throughout history.

In recent decades undeniable archeological/scientific evidence is emerging that clearly demonstrates that extraterrestrial civilizations from other galaxies migrated to the earth and interbred with existing human populations over hundreds of thousands and perhaps even millions of years, shattering the status quo myths of both religions and conventional pseudo-science that falsely insist human origins are limited to just 5,000-10,000 years ago.[35] [36] Other technologically advanced so called intelligent alien species may have retained their earthly presence through the ages in both physical genetic hybrid form as well as purely supernatural entities that actually possess a parasitic, vampiric, survival need to feed off the adrenalized blood of the young innocents.[37] Be they powerful Illuminati subhuman types or lowly demonic supernatural forces, both thrive on the flesh and blood of defenseless children. This profoundly disturbing truth is explored in much deeper analysis in a later chapter.

In addition to the secret satanic practice of Illuminati today preying on the blood sacrifice of children, the ancient custom can also be currently found in places like India and Africa where children's purity and innocence are believed to make the perpetrators more potent, younger and healthier, [38] exactly the same pretext that motivates Western Satan worshippers. Coming full circle, this entire book focuses on evidence that satanic sacrifice of children currently practiced by cults and secret societies throughout Europe and North America and beyond, hidden in plain sight along with interlocking global child sex trafficking rings, is tragically being carried out all over this planet. And its long history sadly reminds us only that it has never stopped.

The Jews' ancient biblical forebears, the Israelites, burnt children alive at the altar of Moloch. From the Old Testament comes the Israelite warrior Jephthah who proclaims if granted victory over his enemy, he'll sacrifice the first "whatsoever" that comes from his house to greet him upon his return.[39] It just so happened to be his virgin daughter and unlike with Abraham, this time God didn't intercede and the Semitic child was sacrificed around 1125 BC. The Old Testament fails to mention exactly how she was sacrificed.[40] But according to prescribed methods for animal sacrifice, Jephthah or the temple priest would slit the daughter's throat, drain her blood, cut off her arms, legs and head, cut up her torso in sections while smearing blood around the altar and burning her flesh… pretty gruesome. Additionally, several other Jewish kings in the Old Testament sacrificed their children by burning them alive. Jews in Carthage in 300 BC who worshipped Baal were also offing their kids. The practice of abducting a non-Jewish stranger, bringing him to their Jerusalem temple, cutting his body up and sacrificing a gentile every seven years was first documented by Greek philosophers and historians Apion and Democritus in 168 BC, well over a century before Christ.[41]

This next section addresses a little known, abhorrent chapter in Jewish history, exposing incidents involving bloodthirsty religious fanatics, engaging in ritualistic human sacrifice to drain blood for religious holidays.

Ritualized Jewish Blood Sacrifice (from Middle Ages – 21st Century)

Since the Middle Ages in Europe, traditionally at times of Passover, celebrating Israelites freedom from slavery in Egypt,[42] most frequently led by local rabbis, there have been Jews who have periodically abducted and ritualistically murdered Christian children. There are literally hundreds of documented cases.[43] In Prague in 1067 six Jews killed a three year old child, puncturing his body to drain his blood that was then given away to other Jews in another city.[44] Less than 80 years after King William Norman first brought Jews to Great Britain in 1066, in the year 1144 in Norwich, Jews apprehended their first Christian child named William and crucified him on the eve of the Passover ritual in symbolic replication of killing the king of the Christians. But the child’s relative was educated monk Thomas of Monmouth who wrote a book about his murdered nephew in an effort to alert all parents.[45] In 1290 in Oxford another Jew was caught after a ritual murder of a gentile, resulting a month later in England banning all Jews for the next four centuries. Spain later followed banishing all its Jews from its borders in 1492.

Though early on Jews were generally brought into Western Europe as the kings’ tax collectors and considered monarchy property,[46] legally well-represented by the best attorneys money could buy, the Jewish child murderers were rarely found innocent.[47] The deniers are quick to claim that the Jews found guilty were tortured into confessing their crimes.

But by law at a later time given the opportunity to recant when not under duress, most didn’t, often going to their execution still boasting about what they’d done, proudly viewing themselves as loyal martyrs for their Jewish faith, rather than feeling remorse or upset over being falsely accused.

Jews accused and brought to trial for murder and found guilty methodically repeated the same ritualistic crime, sequentially circumcising their child victims, then systematically torturing and crucifying them to drain their blood used in Passover rites ceremony.[48] The Christian blood was as an ingredient mixed with wine for Passover unleavened bread. Blood was also used in healing potions as well as for cabbalist curses. Rabbis were always present in these murders to ensure the extracted blood and flesh were kosher which permitted it to be bottled and sold as a black market commodity, not unlike today’s Israelis as the prime movers in control of the international human organ trafficking operations.[49]

The most infamous of these ritualized cases in Europe occurred in Trent, northern Italy in 1475. The murdered boy was Simon of Trent who until a few years ago was a celebrated saint; that is until the Vatican succumbed to the Jewish thought control PC police. Over twenty of these Jewish murdered children were made saints. Based on historic court records and two sets of standard operating procedure confessions by the accused Germanic speaking Jews, a recent scholarly review written by Ariel Toaff analyzing all available evidence concludes that Simon was murdered on the Passover eve for the expressed purpose of religious ritual sacrifice.[50]

Yet the term “blood libel” is the customary Jewish practice and seemingly automatic response that flatly denies that any of these crimes ever once took place, despite even

Jewish historians and scholars admitting that these atrocities did in fact occur.[51] One such brave critic is respected writer-journalist Israel Shamir who astutely makes the valid point that as a matter of state policy, more innocent Palestinian children have been brutally murdered by Jews in recent years than the sum total of all Christian victims since the Middle Ages.[52] If given the fact that Jews in cold blood have been methodically murdering non-Jews en masse in recent years, why is it so hard to believe that Jewish extremists over many centuries targeted and killed less children for being non-Jews? Being a persecuted European minority steeped in rigid Talmudic tradition that degrades non-Jews to lowly animal status, the underlying psychological and historic dynamics are sufficient to provide motive for the crimes.[53] University of Jerusalem Professor Ehak Spinzak stated that Talmudic extremists “believe that it’s God’s will to commit violence against goyim” (gentiles).[54] With wholesale denial that ritual murders of Christian children ever took place, the tiresome “anti-Semitic” catch-all label cannot dismiss the mountain of evidence.

Talmudic Judaism and Cabbalism Meld into NWO Satanic Practice

The Jews in charge of the temples at the time of Jesus Christ’s ministry were the Pharisees who also wrote Talmudic Law. Seeing how the Jewish leaders were moneychangers exploiting their own people with usury and corruption,[55] Jesus actually threw a tizzy fit inside their not so holy temple, upending coffers and tables, rightfully calling it a “a robber’s den,”[56] and refers to fake believers (be they Jews or Christians) practicing their religion in a “synagogue of Satan.”[57] It wasn’t until this dramatic clash that rebel Jesus posed such a serious threat to corrupt authorities that ultimately sealed his fate.[58] With the Federal Reserve the private central banks run largely by Jews getting richer by printing fiat money out of thin air to charge interest and collect taxes to payback interests on bankers' nonstop wars, now $20 trillion in the red,[59] our debtor nation and haplessly bled citizens are still usury slaves. Sadly in 2000 years, times have not changed at all,[60] and, with humanity on the brink of total self-destruction, conditions in our times have only grown worse.

Between the third and sixth centuries, "learned" rabbis recorded in Hebrew their oral teachings and laws they claim were handed down to them by Moses, calling their finished product the Talmud, the holy book for people of the Jewish faith that supersedes the Old Testament. Yet the Talmud is extremely hateful and racist, touting blatant Jewish supremacism. Direct quotes from the Talmud readily tell the story.[61] Jews are ordered to view non-Jews as animals (Yebamoth 98a) and beasts (Baba Mezia 114b).[62] Even the best of the "goyim" should be killed (Soferim 15). Talmudic law encourages Jews to deceive gentiles, any way to take advantage for a Jew's self-gain at non-Jews' expense,[63] even resorting to murder and committing adultery if it can be rationalized as best for the nation of Israel.

Moreover, the Torah, considered Jewish Written Law,[64] apparently embraces pedophilia:

If a grown up man has intercourse with a little girl, it is nothing, for having intercourse with a girl less than three years old is like putting a finger in the eye (Ketubot 11b).[65]

… Intercourse with a boy under nine years old is not considered a significant sexual act… (Ketubot 11b).

A decade ago when Israeli soldiers were on another bloodbath killing spree against Palestinians in Gaza, Sephardi chief rabbi Mordechai Eliyahu wrote a letter to the prime minister advocating indiscriminate murder of civilian women and children.[66] Unfortunately far too many in the Knesset agree and the ethnic purging as official apartheid policy has been allowed to drag on year after bloody year with total impunity… despite a growing consensus of disapproval from other nations that never amounts to any real consequence to Israel. Another prominent rabbi, Ovadia Yosef, the spiritual advisor to the Shas, a religious fundamentalist party and chief coalition partner in the Israeli government,[67] echoed the Talmud dogma, claiming "the sole purpose of non-Jews is to serve Jews."

Perhaps the most raw, unadulterated account by one brutally honest, reprehensible Jewish American who four decades ago braggingly exposed the ultimate power and arrogance that the Jewish elite aka mafia wields in America through complete control over the media, banking, entertainment, academia and political bribery business disclosed in one 1976 interview with a 29-year old congressional aide of New York Senator Jacob Javits. Harold Rosenthal's gleeful, boastful pride, bitter contempt and hatred toward non-Jews for their dupability and sheer ignorance permeates his every scathing utterance. Essentially Rosenthal admits that his "chosen people" riding atop the global power pyramid answer to only one god - Lucifer[68]. Because he reveals far more in-depth truth than his fellow chosen brethren care to have on public record, several months later Rosenthal met an abrupt end as a suspected murder victim of a Mossad hit thinly veiled as an attempted Israeli airliner hijacking.

Three weeks after Israel and the neocons, with a little help from their Saudi friends, pulled off the bloodiest false flag in history in 2001,[69] boldly out in the open was former Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon arrogantly declaring:

We, the Jewish people control America, and the Americans know.[70]

And just to show how preferential the US is to Israel, the elite think tank responsible for all US wars in the last century - the Council on Foreign Relations, requires every member to be an American citizen except two, current Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and former Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.[71]

The Talmudic tradition is Judaic law and Cabbalism is hidden Jewish mysticism practiced for millenniums and forwarded into modernity by the Ashkenazi Jews of central and western Russia and Eastern Europe [and now Israel], also known as the Khazars.[72] This form of Judaism dates directly back to the warlike Babylonian ruler Nimrod (later renamed Marduk)[73] and his 2,000 year old Temple of Baal or Bel (meaning “lord”) where child sacrifice was common custom, located in the presently recaptured Syrian city of Palmyra, destroyed along with ancient Roman ruins by ISIS a couple years ago.[74] [75]

The Babylonian deity Baal subsequently evolved into the Greek deity Osiris, representing the birth of ancient pre-Christian pagan religions in the Middle East and Greece. And each of these deities unmistakably shares underpinnings of the fallen angel Satan. An estimated 97.5% of today’s Jewish State population claiming to be of Hebrew descent,[76] are actually Ashkenazi Jews descended from the Turkish-Mongol Khazars, reclaiming their “roots” in the Jewish homeland,[77] all share ancestors who never once set foot in the Holy Land of the Middle East. In fact, the DNA of the native Palestinians being exterminated are the true Semites.[78] So much of the Jewish story as part of the greater human story is built on lies, cover-ups and hoax. A growing number of researchers and analysts have referred to the Khazarian mafia running the international crime cabal that’s used interchangeably with the Satanic Cult of the All Seeing Eye.[79] A mix of some evil non-Jews and some evil Jews working together for Satan are in the process of culling the human herd down from 7.5 billion people presently to just a half billion of us left shortly.

[80] Their agenda puts 14 out of 15 of us in their eugenics crosshairs.[81]

A year ago in New York City and later London (and in "1000 other cities" to come) a near five story high replication of the famous Baal arch was constructed as part of the Rockefeller created United Nations UNESCO's World Heritage site,[82] also supported by the financially endowed Harvard University Masonic Lodge. The Baal arch as the temple gateway served as a portal to the worshipping altar of the pagan god that many today believe represents Satan.[83] Paganism as practiced by a plethora of ancient cultures has been defined as a religious system based on the worship of the fallen angels.

After constructed exhibitions in New York and London, for the third time the Babylonian archway was once again on full prominent display earlier this year for the opening of the fifth annual World Government Summit held in Dubai, attended by 4000 world leaders from 130 nations.[84] Among the notable globalists paying homage to the satanic fallen angel was UN Secretary General Antonio Gutteres,[85] IMF Director Christine Lagarde (two months earlier awarded another 5-year term as IMF head despite avoiding a year in prison for her conviction approving a large taxpayer payoff bogus to French billionaire),[86] and Elon Musk who in Dubai was busily advocating the merger between humans and machines and touting globalist socialism. Sovereign nation destroyer Obama attended the first of these NWO conferences back in 2013. For three days in mid-February 100 speakers pontificated their one world "utopian" government and their elitist design to promote globalism, multiculturalism, statism, Big Government, social engineering, and UN Agenda 21 and Agenda 2030 sustainability.[87] At these NWO kumbayas like this one, the Bilderberg meetings and Bohemian Grove soirees, the elite's busily plotting our demise right before our eyes.

Judaism’s “Dirty” Stepchild: 17th- 18th Century Sabbatean-Frankist Movement

There exists a little known sub-branch of Judaism that the Orthodoxy would prefer to bury in its revisionist, subversively repackaged design on human history. The Jewish establishment of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries declared the renegade Sabbatean-turned-Frankist movement heresy in back-to-back centuries in order to formally distance itself from the then flourishing, “embarrassing” Jewish offshoots taking hold.[88] Though the movement’s followers were supposed to have died out shortly after the deaths of their messianic leaders SabbataiZevi (1626-1676)[89] and Jacob Frank (1726-1791),[90] their ideology, values, beliefs and practices definitely did not, and today they very much remain alive and are in fact thriving. Our upside down Orwellian world is presently living in an age of deceit,[91] where so called good is actually evil and lies are constantly broadcast as truth.[92] Now posing as the satanic Cult of the All-seeing Eye, its demonic influence is visible everywhere in today’s world through gradual successful infiltration in recent centuries into all domains of earthly power and control.[93]

Sabbatai Zevi was of Spanish Jewish descent originally from Smyrna, Greece until banned as a false prophet from his hometown at age 25. Zevi promptly found a new residence in nearby Salonika, rapidly rising to prominence there as an ordained Sephardic rabbi and cabbalist claiming to a receptive audience that he was the long awaited Jewish Messiah.[94] Sabbatai Zevi generated a devout following that was most active within the Ottoman Empire of modern day Turkey, although his reach spread quickly into much of Europe, at its peak claiming a million Jewish followers.[95]

At the height of his fame and influence at age 40, ten years prior to his death, the Sultan Mehmed IV gave the imprisoned Zevi the choice, die or convert to Islam.[96] So the charismatic con man chose to avoid martyrdom by saving his own neck as a Muslim in name only. The sultan then bestowed the title "Keeper of the Gate" on Zevi who began a close working relationship with the Shia Bektashi Sufis.[97] According to renowned researcher and author Gershom Scholem, the Sabbatean movement was "the largest and most momentous messianic movement in Jewish History,"[98] captivating over half the world's Jewry at the time.[99] But on the low, Sabbatai continued practicing his own heretic guru-esque style of hedonistic, orgiastic, ritualized, "feel good" Judaism.

The year that a Jew named Columbus "discovered" a New World to conquer and colonize for the flag he sailed under - Spain in 1492,[100] was also the same year and nation that kicked out all its Jews. The subsequent Jewish migration to Ottoman territory that opened its borders to the newcomers,[101] brought a large influx of Jewish immigrants to where Sabbatai Zevi's family settled. The prevailing culture and climate a century and a half later that Zevi was born and raised in was steeped in religious oppression and "end of the world" anxiety for Jews during Europe's Inquisition. When in 1648 Sabbatai's doomsday prediction failed, he declared himself the new messiah.[102]

His radical departure from run-of-the-mill Judaic stoicism, promising not only redemption but an alternative lifestyle of secret magic bestowing wisdom and power, the gift of prophecy, direct communication with God (Zevi himself) and his angels,[103] and a sensual smorgasbord of unbridled sexual liberation and carnal ecstasy.[104] Sabbateanism "freed up" humans from their inescapable trap of sin-based, guilt-ridden fear and dread of God's moral judgment and eternal wrath. Zevi preached that as imperfect beings, the way to the divine is following the path of sinful bliss (i.e., doing the opposite of what is "good" and "righteous").[105]

By 1666, the year the Satan worshipper became a closeted Jew in Muslim clothing also was his second bust at predicting the end of the world. But just the same, his hedonistic brand of religion caught on bigtime in popularity, spreading through both Europe and the Near East.

Unlike the highly chauvinistic rabbinic Judaism that prohibited women from attaining positions of public stature and religious or state authority,[106] Sabbatai's runaway rebellious sect embraced women for full membership and active enlistment in its messianic prophetic ranks, which back in the 16 and 1700's was unheard of, greatly adding to its popularity and appeal. Because Zevi's widespread influence and messianic message extended beyond Turkey and Greece to Eastern Europe especially, his hardcore Sabbatean adherents lasted well into the 19th century, though his diehard faithful gradually dwindled in numbers after his death.[107] Many of his followers also converted with him in name only to Islam (known as Dönmeh), others returned to conventional rabbinic Judaism. But Sabbatai's particular brand of anti-Talmudic religion amassed quite an appeal for its time, formally rejecting normative Jewish law, openly embracing Cabbalistic mysticism with messianic fervor of redemption that many Jews avidly sought through his unorthodox, radicalized approach to Judaism.

But within a few short decades in the vacuum created by his death, the prominence of Sabbateanism was to be resurrected and given new, even more invigorated life by another charismatic messianic Jewish con man named Jacob Frank, who boldly sold himself as not only the reincarnate of Sabbatai Zevi but the biblical patriarch Jacob as well.[108] Hailing from Podolia, Poland (now in Ukraine), Jakub Lejbowicz may have been the son of a rabbi and a Zevi devotee,[109] even as a young boy in Poland rejecting the Talmud,[110] and later priding himself on being an "untutored man." As a traveling merchant, Jacob Frank lived a good part of his young adult life in Turkey amongst a Sabbatean stronghold where his Polish-Ashkenazi Jewish ethnicity had the Turkish locals calling him Frank, a name that Jacob willingly allowed to stick. It was at this time that he is believed to have also converted, like his predecessor before him, to Islam Sabbatean-style.[111]

Frank was everything Zevi was, except he took evil up a notch or two, preaching, “Since we can’t all be saints, let’s all be sinners.”[112] He was a master at reverse psychology, claiming the best way to imitate God, is to violate every conceivable boundary and taboo under the sun. Ritualized orgy-fests featuring wife swapping, incest and pedophilia were his commandments.[113] Sabbatean-Frankists practiced witchcraft and animal as well as human sacrifices.

At age 29 he returned to Poland where he gathered quite a following of Sabbateans. The ambitious upstart openly defied all traditional Jewish law, proclaiming himself part of the holy trinity, posing a direct threat to local conservative Talmudic rabbis who sought to have him and his followers excommunicated.[114] Frank contacted the Roman Catholic bishop that presided over all religions in Poland,[115] calling for a disputation where the anti-Talmudist leader presented his case as a believer in Jewish Zohar cabbalism that doesn’t conflict with the Christian holy trinity doctrine. The bishop ruled in Frank’s favor, ordering the burning of all copies of the Talmud in Poland.[116] But a year later, the bishop died and without his ally, the outraged rabbis persecuted Frank and his tribe with a vengeance, despite Frank obtaining an edict issued by Poland’s Augustus III protecting his growing Sabbatean clan.

In dramatic response to his stiff rabbinic opposition, Jacob Frank declared himself the direct successor of Sabbatai Zevi, assuring his burgeoning flock that he was receiving his revelations straight from heaven.[117] In line with Frank’s political strategy to align himself behind the power of the Roman Catholic Church as a defensive buffer against his Jewish establishment enemy and avoid the gallows, he arranged a second disputation with the rabbis again under the auspices of the Catholic Church.[118] But by this time the Christian arbiters had become suspicious of the antinomian Frankist movement and its purported reputation promoting adultery, incest and pedophilia.[119] Frank had always gone out of his way to be publicly crude and brash, often boasting of his sexual prowess and debauchery. It appeared his sexual self-aggrandizing had finally caught up with him.

The skeptical Church authorities required more concrete evidence beyond just words that Frank and his devotees were righteously motivated for conversion to Catholicism.[120] So to curry favor, the renegade zealot ordered mass baptism and in 1759 he and 500 Frankist Jews were baptized. This shrewd move facilitated Polish nobility to becoming his and his baptized converts’ godparents, with Augustus himself agreeing to be Frank’s godfather. Over the next three decades in Poland, the Frankists swayed close to 30,000 Jews to become baptized Christians.[121]

Despite the official holy water bath, the Catholic Church remained unconvinced of Frank’s “spiritual” sincerity due to his strange doctrines, promiscuous deviance and rumored religious orgies, and in 1760 Jacob Frank was arrested for heresy and imprisoned at a monastery for the next thirteen years.[122] However, becoming a jailed martyr only helped his diabolical cause, for his popularity only grew and the satanic infiltration of the Catholic Church and European royalty was underway and taking root.

The wide phenomenon of the “crypto Jews” (from Greek word “kryptos” meaning hidden) whereby Jews posing as religious converts,[123] especially during the anti-Jewish Inquisition, reformation and renaissance periods (from the 15th-17th centuries), crypto Jews infiltrated other religions (i.e., the Sabbateans to Islam and Frankists to Christianity). Yet secretly they retained their hidden Jewish identity and religious doctrine; also co-related is the Jewish propensity of frequent name changing (albeit partly due to avoiding anti-Semitic persecution).[124] But the demonic subversion of secret societies permeating top echelons of global power across the diaspora in finance, government, big business, mass media, communication arts and academia by both crypto Jews and Jewish globalists alike cannot be denied.[125]

Returning to the dangerous Satanist and false messiah Jacob Frank, he saw himself above all previous religious patriarchs, including his own inspiration Sabbatai Zevi, faulting him for an unsuccessful search for God, much less his shortcoming for failing to actually be God. In Frank's warped world, all laws supporting the existing order had to be abolished.[126] Frank's perverse thinking was that nothing short of overthrowing and destroying society could possibly save humankind. Only anarchy and revolutionary destruction of every religion and positive belief system would clear the deck for rebuilding life cast in Luciferian "light." He believed the religious baton had passed from Judaism to Islam and now it was his turn for his "true believers" to outwardly turn to Catholicism while secretly worshipping him as the true messiah and living God.[127]

Invading Russians eventually freed Frank from prison in 1773,[128] the same year the Satanist Frank met with fellow Satanists - Jesuit trained Adam Weishaupt[129] and banker gangster Meyer Amschel Rothschild, of the Khazarian-descended,[130] wealthiest Jewish family in the world. Funding would flow to both Weishaupt and Frank once Weishaupt agreed to accept Frankist doctrine and the satanic grand plan was thus launched by the unholiest trinity ever.[131] Three years later in Bavaria Weishaupt would formally resurrect the ancient Order of Illuminati that on May 1st this year is 241 years old.[132] The three conspired to secretly and methodically take over the world by subterfuge, deception and devilry. Chief financier would be Europe's wealthiest family, corrupter and infiltrator of Freemasonry,[133] the Catholic Church and governments would be the Illuminati Weishaupt and Frank would continue subverting and conquering the big three religions as well as the political aristocratic domain.[134]

Jacob Frank lived out the last 18 years of his life in opulent luxury, the last few years in a castle in the German city of Offenbach just south of Frankfurt,[135] the benefactor of Frankfurt resident Rothschild, plus crown support from royal courts of Poland, Russia and Austria, as well as his thousands of loyal followers. Frank took the title Baron, whether legitimately given him by Austrian archduchess[136] and Queen Maria Theresa or not.[137] Gradually Frank's daughter Eva took over his powerful sect as his incestuous "holy mistress," although she too lived above her means and with her wealth drying up after the Napoleonic Wars, she died in 1816.

But the poisonous die had been cast. The Frankist Cabbalistic secrets were combined with the philosophical ideals of Enlightenment to lay fertile groundwork for conflict, revolution and bloodshed.[138] Frankist infiltrators populated the Hapsburg dynasty. The Freemasons, Illuminati and Frankists were secret allies in movement through European nobility.[139] Intermarriage amongst prominent families consolidated power. Frank's nephew Moses Dobruschka changed his name and entered Hapsburg society as a Freemason.[140] As the Satanists collectively wheeled and dealed, faithful to their mission to create chaos out of sin, massive revolt, conflict and world upheaval followed. Rothschild-Frankist-Freemason-Jesuit members were actively behind the American and French Revolutions,[141] Marxism,[142] Zionism,[143] the Bolshevik Revolution,[144] pro-incest

Frankist Freud,[145] and the archduke assassination triggering WWI.[146] Since virtually every war has been ignited by a conspired false flag event, involving secret satanic societies, it would be a safe bet that the Frankist-Freemason-Illuminati-Jesuit-Rothschild nexus is the All-seeing Eye mastermind.[147]

Slowly but surely over the next couple centuries, their secret plan and vision has come to near full fruition. With Frankist Satanist and other secret society plants saturated in the world of politics, big business, finance, media and entertainment, they're now vying for full implementation of their New World Order,[148] complete with one world government,[149] one world religion[150] and one world army,[151] just a world war and collapsed world economy away.[152]

Many Jewish scholars and writers that only learned of Zevi and Frank from recent books about their life and movement are quick to discard these two messianic cult leaders because, from their Jewish perspective, each converted to an "enemy" religious camp and thus are viewed as irrelevant footnotes, "black sheep" heretic losers leaving an unwanted, shameful stain on Jewish history.[153] What these armchair critics dismissively fail to realize is that Zevi and Frank's "anything goes because I'm your [satanic] god" ideology and subversive perversion that has co-opted and infiltrated not only three major religions but Freemasonry, and the elite's power structure is the embodiment of the Illuminati Satanist cult that controls virtually everything on earth. So writing these two guys off as forgotten nobody's proves only that ignorance is anything but bliss.

The Rothschilds financed the Sabbatean-Frankist movement and, along with a dozen other family bloodlines, are the New World Order's gold card members atop Satan's private club, controlling all Western governments (and a lesser extent Eastern ones as well) and the entire Western criminal financial enslavement system that's ready to crash,[154] global child sex trafficking and human organ trafficking networks worldwide,[155] the globalized mass media empire's demonic mind control brainwashing as well as the globalized war machine currently plunging humanity into World War III.[156] So it's more than foolish to underestimate the powerful impact that these two so called "footnotes" have had on human history.

Talmudic Heresy Traditions Converge with Freemasonry to Deliver Luciferian Bloodlust of Pedophile Sex Rings

Turning to Zevi and Frank's indispensable NWO ally, the Freemasons' own encyclopedia makes perfectly clear who the Masons worship:

The promise of life is Osiris. The great doctrine, the great revelation of all the true Mysteries, is that Osiris lives: but he is known by other names. We also, as Masons, look forward to union...with Osiris...To be united with him forever.[157]

Perhaps the most infamous of the Freemasons - Albert Pike, once said, "Masonry is identical to the ancient Mysteries."[158] Pike also reveals the plain truth that the light of his lord is not God but Lucifer himself:

Lucifer, the Light-bearer! Strange and mysterious name to give to the Spirit of Darkness! Lucifer, the Son of the Morning! Is it he who bears the Light, and with its splendors intolerable, blinds feeble, sensual, or selfish souls? Doubt it not![159]

So the light that every Masonic initiate seeks in actuality is Luciferian darkness.[160] The constant theme by which all these pagan satanic cults operate is through deceit, twisting and inversing everything to obscure truth. Its presence in today's Orwellian doublespeak world is in our face at every turn.[161]

As Egyptian pagan god Luciferian worshippers, the Masonic Lodge is also obviously a pagan religion, incorporating all the Luciferian and cabbalistic rituals, doctrines, symbols and occult philosophies rooted in secret Egyptian deity worship.[162] The most well-known Masonic symbol - the square and compass, prominently displayed on Masonic lodges and temples around the world,[163] is strikingly similar to the highest symbol of the occult, the Jewish six-pointed hexagram star found on both Israel's national flag and virtually every Jewish synagogue.[164] As if that's not glaring enough, the Jewish six-pointed star is also called the Star of Moloch, the satanic god by which children are sacrificed, the same god Hillary's staff references in an email.[165]

Like the sexual imagery on full display in Egyptian pagan worship and ancient Jewish mythology, Freemasonry is also flooded with phallic imagery in both the obelisk architecture as well as Masonic hexagrams and triangles.[166] And the finishing piece to this satanic hexagram story is that the only reason it's on the Israeli flag and has come to symbolize Jews is because Mayer Amschel Bauer centuries ago decided to change his name to Rothschild and post the hexagram outside his door,[167] later making it his family coat of arms. Why would Jews choose as their national flag anything even remotely to do with a satanic god that sacrifices children?[168] In keeping with the Frankist chaos and conflict mantra, the Rothschilds,[169]the Zionist founders and the Rockefeller funded United Nations spearheading the birth of the Jewish State in 1948 were no real friends to the Jews.[170] Their loyalty lies much closer to Satan.[171]

The Old Testament refers to the Canaan god Moloch, but other ancient cultures like the Israelites and Egyptians also worshipped Moloch and practiced child sacrifice,[172] and today it's still being worshipped and practiced through secret occult societies and religious sects like Freemasonry, Sabbatean-Frankism, Illuminati and the Jesuit Order that all share the same fallen angel Lucifer. [173] Such close parallels between Masonry, Talmudic Judaism and Sabbatean-Frankism as offshoots from the same source, the pagan Egyptian Star deity that shares the same secret occult ties as Skull and Bones and the Illuminati all have one thing in common - they all worship Lucifer and answer to Satan.[174]

Freemasonry and the Jewish State bearing direct homage to Egyptian pagan roots also manifest through shared statues, [175] motifs, art and architecture. Hebrew University and Israel's Supreme Court building both feature the Egyptian obelisks and Masonic design.[176] Another illustrative example is the Masonic memorial that includes a large Egyptian pyramid showcased on a boulevard in the city of Eilat, Israel.[177] Finally, the founder of the modern Illuminati order and Freemason dabbler and infiltrator Adam Weishaupt was bankrolled in the late 1700's by Mayer Amschel Rothschild, and much of the occultic Egyptian and Masonic-themed architecture[178] and motifs located throughout Israel and springing up across the planet today, [179] all by satanic design, have been funded by that wealthiest Jewish banker family synonymous with New World Order Satanism. A look at the physical layout of America's own capital city Washington DC is also rife with Freemasonic Luciferian symbols.[180]

Pretty much all the top level Masons who have ever written about their secret organization and its history, near unanimously praise Lucifer.[181] Biblically speaking, Lucifer and Satan represent the same fallen angel that Freemasons, Frankists, Illuminati, Jesuits, all worship as their god, in contrast relegating Jesus to "inferior god,"[182] "just another man" status.[183] As we explore Freemasonry and its worship of Lucifer, it's important to distinguish between the highest levels that do worship Lucifer and Satan (and the 33 degree Masons that run the world), and the vast majority of lower degree Masons who do not worship Satan nor run the world.

Lower degree Masons simply don’t have access to the sinister truth of their superiors. Again, there are many good Masons like there are many good Jews just like there are good lower level FBI and CIA agents. It’s the ones at the top that are the evildoers.

Understanding Freemasonry symbols and examining Masons’ writings, it becomes more than clear that they do in fact worship Satan.[184] Albert Churchward, another Masonic writer, points out that the common Masonic symbol of the triangle with the upward pointed apex represents Set, Osiris’ Egyptian pagan god brother as well as one of the infernal names for Satan. This same satanic triangle on the back of every single US dollar bill,[185] the larger pyramid triangle just below the smaller all-seeing eye triangle is also the earthly triangle symbolizing what 33 degree Masonic author George Steinmetz calls “the perfect or divine man.”[186]

Another singular thread through all these pagan religions maintains that human mortals in these secret clubs that bestow power can become God. Well known twentieth century author-mystic and 33 degree Mason Manly P. Hall wrote,[187] “Man is a God in the making…” Yet another Masonic writer Joseph Fort Newton proclaims,[188] “… to the profoundest insight of the human soul - that God becomes man that man may become God.” So the Masonic allegiance is to the pagan Egyptian god Osiris that’s synonymous with the Lucifer/Satan god, certainly not the monotheistic one God worshipped by every major religion – like the Christians, Torah worshipping Jews, Muslims, Hindus, Buddhists, Taoists, Shintoists and on and on.

Like the six-pointed star as a central iconic symbol, the 5-pointed pentagram star is yet another significant link that Freemasonry shares with Satan.[189] The Masons use two 5-pointed stars - the one with just one point upward representing the “good” Lucifer and the star with the two-points upward the “evil” Satan. All it takes is a 33 degree clockwise or counterclockwise turn to shift the good one-point star into the evil satanic two pointed pentagram. And with the 33 degree Masons so actively bent on destroying our world, there’s no coincidence in their symbolism.

Touching on the history of Freemasonry, the oldest Masonic lodge dating back to 1599 is located in Edinburgh, Scotland, complete with its 6-pointed star etched into sandstone above its entrance.[190] Stonemason guilds existed in Scotland and England during the Middle Ages, but the oldest meeting minutes still existing come from Scottish lodges in 1599. The official Grand Lodge of England began in London in 1717, which is the date formally credited for Freemasonry’s founding.[191]

The famous 1782 Congress of Wilhelmsbad held at Meyer Amschel Rothschild’s German castle was a who’s who amongst Satanists because,[192] per Rothschild’s edict,[193] it invited all the secret organizations in Europe numbering 3 million members together for the first time. Wilhelmsbad also marked the first occasion where Jews were admitted as Masonic Lodge members per the Rothschild-Frank-Weishaupt contract drawn several years earlier. After the 1782 conference the Illuminati dominated Freemasonry as it was no longer seen as a competitor but a conjoined secret partner forging the same sinister schemes. Weishaupt set about using his Illuminati and Jesuit Order to control the Vatican. Assassinations of the king of France and emperor of Austria were voted on and planned. In March 1792 a Masonic Jew killed the Austrian emperor. That same month Sweden’s king also went down.

Many of America’s founding fathers were Masons, including George Washington, Ben Franklin, Paul Revere, John Hancock, James Monroe and first Chief Justice John Marshall.[194] This list of great Americans speaks to life’s complexity that one may belong to an evil organization yet still be good. Indeed one third of the US presidents and many of the top European leaders have been high degree Masons.[195] Back in December 2011 the EU and Freemason honchos got together to plot Europe's future.[196] No doubt an NWO favorite - multiculturalism - and the mass migration debacle to come, designed to destroy the continent, must have been high on their agenda.[197] The Freemasonry organization currently boasts over 6 million members worldwide.[198]

Political instability through subversive cloak and daggery plotting wars, murders, overthrows, blackmails, betrayals, all perpetrated by Satanists, have been plaguing this planet for eons of time. Regardless which particular brand of Satanism is practiced, the Talmudic, Cabbalistic or Sabbatean-Frankist Jewry, Freemason[199], Malta or Jesuit, Skull and Bones[200] or Illuminati,[201] CFR[202] or Trilateral Commission,[203] Bilderberger[204] or Club of Rome,[205] all are fast track avenues to the top of the psychopathic food chain, where debauchery like pedophilia and incest is the required norm, their common denominator being the worship of Satan.[206]

The Rothschilds and Rockefellers and their ilk preside over Satan's secret societies. A few photos from a 1972 Rothschild Illuminati Ball are quite revealing.[207] Another fitting gesture is eyewitnesses who have dined at the Rothschild family estate in England insist that a place at the dinner table is ritualistically and faithfully set for their favorite invited guest and god Satan.[208] Initiates of all the satanic organizations whose members are running the world amok have all taken oaths swearing to never divulge the truth behind their evil deeds and secrets.[209] Those who've gone public or exposed the diabolical truth risk death.

With Satanists reigning full control over all earthly affairs, incisive author and observer Henry Makow succinctly sizes up our present predicament:

Society is totally subverted. Government, education, entertainment and the news media, think tanks, foundations, NGO’s, professional associations and major charities are totally in the hands of the central banking cartel. Intelligence agencies report to the central bankers. They and Masonic secret societies are a central part of the mechanism of control. Society is helpless to address its real problem: the untenable concentration of wealth, power and cultural influence in the hands of Cabbala-believing bankers secretly intent on culling or enslaving us. Mankind is being put into a coma based on sex and money. The last thing the bankers want to do is awaken the cattle from their slumber.[210]

Today’s Satanic Bloodlust: Ritualized Rape, Torture and Murder Involving Blood-Drinking, Flesh-Eating Elitist Pedophiles

As an extension from ancient times, the folklore legend of vampires in Romania and Bulgaria that author Bram Stoker made famous in Dracula (based on the real life of Vlad the Impaler) stems from sucking the blood of young victims as the elixir to eternal life.[211] In recent years Hollywood’s romanticized obsession over vampirism and zombies is no accident, methodically promoting a glorified image of consuming human blood as the lifeblood sustenance that leads to eternal life. To notable extent in the same way mainstream media has overtly attempted to normalize pedophilia, aided by popular culture, vampirism has also been casually presented as if it’s a mere life choice, a cult bonding likeminded fetish aficionados, though the “vampires” themselves would maintain that their compulsion for sucking and drinking blood is not a volitional act but an actual physical craving and absolute need, just like any other highly addictive substance.[212] Likewise through the ages, satanic blood drinking and pedophilia have acted as mainliner drugs in the ritualistic blood sacrifice of children.

The fact that actual traumatized victims secrete the stress hormone adrenaline into their bloodstream and body moments leading up to death chemically acts as an addictive drug for the murdering Luciferian elite that engages in cannibalism and imbibes on blood.[213] [214] Numerous accounts from courageous survivors detailing their horrid satanic abuse have come forth over the years providing lots of credible, convincing testimony. A woman calling herself Kendall recently appeared on the Dr. Phil Show describing her many years of captivity within a child sex slavery ring where Illuminati figures raped and forced her to eat body parts of sacrificed children. In 1989 while a guest on the Oprah Winfrey Show, Vicki Polin disclosed that she was an incest survivor trapped in a Satanic Jewish cult where ritualized abuse occurred in her synagogue.[215] Her “upstanding” Midwestern family was part of the secret Frankist Movement, dedicated to following the worst, most depraved Cabbalist traditions while worshipping Satan.

Franklin scandal victim Paul Bonacci testified that on July 24th, 1984,[216] he witnessed a child sacrifice killing of a young boy he was forced at gunpoint to have sex with at the infamous pedophile summer camp Bohemian Grove,[217] where the elite regularly gather to pay homage to their version of Baal in the 40 foot stone owl statue they call Moloch.[218] Bonacci even identified bizarre journalist-author Hunter Thompson as an attendee making a snuff film.[219] The night before Gonzo’s “suicide” in early March 2005, Thompson told a friend, “They're gonna make it look like suicide. I know how those bastards think.”[220] Hunter was working on a 9/11 story about how the WTC towers really came down. Often those who know too much and want to reveal what the controllers don’t want people to know, die suddenly in a “suicide” cover-up.

And obviously for blackmail control over the politician puppets, pedophilia, cannibalism and murder are often caught on film.[221] The planetary controllers deploy Mossad and the CIA to regularly entrap elitist stooges through pedophilia rings. Mossad used convicted child sex offender billionaire Jeffrey Epstein and his Sex Slave Island to get the dirt on scores of powerful scum still in power in Washington.[222]

With Pizzagate/PedoGate exposing the global child sex trafficking rings that have been operating for many decades,[223] [224] pedophile scandals are being uncovered on a near weekly basis in the United Kingdom [225]and Europe, [226] Australia, [227] Canada, [228]and America involving a massive interlocking global operation.[229] [230] And raping children, blood draining and drinking, and murdering child victims have been a permanent fixture since ancient times. This presentation has encapsulated that long horrifying history that has led to this current epidemic. But we are finally turning the corner now on this despicable human blight, and the momentum is swinging towards growing public awareness and outrage, pushing for accountability and justice for our children.

The next section documents one eyewitness who was exposed to this satanic pedophile empire, had the conscience and courage to talk about it, and then just recently paid for it with his life.

One Illuminati Whistleblower’s Recent Firsthand Account of Ritualized Child Sacrifice and His Suspicious Death

Dutch entrepreneur Ronald Bernard was interviewed earlier this year based on his extended involvement in the international crime cabal’s darkest domain.[231] He openly disclosed that for five years he operated at the top levels of power in Iraq and elsewhere, directly involved in currency exchange, money laundering enormous amounts of cash across borders. His work included interfacing with central banks, national governments, various deep state players like the CIA and Mossad, transnational oil corporations and US-Israeli-Saudi backed terrorist organizations, all the while maintaining as low a profile as possible to avoid detection. As a money handler employed in illicit global smuggling operations involving drugs, weapons and global child sex trafficking, up close and personal Bernard encountered the Luciferian world of the globalist crime cabal, at the heart of the US war making Empire machine, witnessing child pedophilia and children being ritualistically sacrificed.

Mr. Bernard explained how his blind ambition and lust for money led him on a path toward becoming a psychopath, but when he saw little kids being raped, tortured and murdered, his long buried conscience quickly shot to the surface. He astoundingly realized how the Luciferian worshippers all around him at the top of the predatory food chain detested human beings and in fact life itself. It sickened Ronald to see how his peers had literally sold their soul to the devil in exchange for all the riches, decadent luxury and sexual depravities big money and power buy. But like every organized crime syndicate, once you’re in, it’s extremely difficult getting out. After refusing to play the game any longer, and enduring torture on multiple levels, he underwent a protracted period of living hell, experiencing a total breakdown of both his mental and physical health, ending up in a hospital ICU. An out of body experience and cathartic spiritual transformation granted him the courage as an Illuminati whistleblower to speak out, revealing his riveting, harrowing story. His account fully exposes the demonic barbarity of the soulless beast that is the hidden satanic cult currently running this world.

Sadly, after moving to the United States and marrying an American, in late August 2017 Illuminati whistleblower

Ronald Bernard was found dead after taking a walk in a rural area of Sebring, Florida. He called authorities stating he was lost and his life was in danger. Several hours later his body was discovered face down in shallow water.[232] Revealing the dirty laundry of the planetary controllers rarely comes without grave consequence.

Satanic Snuff Films and Cannibalism

I must warn the reader that the content and imagery evoked from a graphic description of two snuff films seen by an individual who wrote about what he'd viewed years later is extremely disturbing.[233] For the faint of heart, too disturbing. The films obviously left an indelible imprint that would never be forgotten. It seems like a very real glimpse into the dark world of Illuminati Satanists caught on film in action, cutting the throats of two toddlers, draining their blood, and then two cooks on camera instructing how to prepare and cook human flesh for dinner guests wearing masks that cover their eyes. It's so shocking it seems like a devil's cooking show from a Fellini movie.

The next scene is at the dining table with assembled guests and host couple. All are Satanists. The host has recently hired a young man for an executive position in his company, and he and his wife are the special guests. They're filmed eating the two children. The new employee and his wife are nervous but the ten other diners at the table remain jovial. After the meal comes dessert and a wine toast followed by the host lecturing his new hire on treating the general public like peasant and cattle, emphasizing how different they the elite are from the "sub-human" animals that they detest and can barely tolerate. Finally the servants come out with two trays that they take the covers off to expose the toddler's heads. The young man and his wife convulse with shock and the husband vomits. They just passed their initiation into the "good life" of the upper crust Illuminates.

The second film is even more disturbing. A young homeless pregnant woman has been taken in by the Illuminati under the pretense of receiving support from a social charity service. She has been set up in an apartment and provided medical care for her child’s birth. The film features the same host who has invited the young mother to dine with the same satanic friends including the young couple from the last film. The mother wants to see her baby but the host claims she’s being taken care of by a nurse and wants to get to know her without the child distraction. They end up serving the mother her own baby’s flesh. The idea amongst these psychopathic monsters is the more evil the act, the more you’ll be rewarded by Satan. When the tray of her child’s head is displayed, the woman of course begins flipping out uncontrollably. Though the film ends there, the young mother was murdered shortly afterwards.

The reason the two murder scenes were made available for the writer to view is the Illuminati member tasked with making the films showed it to him. Though the filmmaker was a Satanist himself, he had become upset with the child sacrifices and was trying to get the leadership within the Illuminati committee to be purged. So he’d kept copies of the snuff films and showed them to people he was unauthorized to give access to. He had renounced his Satanism and become a Christian but when higher ranking members learned he’d let others watch the films, he too was murdered.

Skeptics can easily scoff that this story could well be fictional, and of course that’s true. But knowing that little children are brutally murdered and filmed, and Satanists do regularly eat children’s flesh, this account appears both realistic and credible. Take it for what it’s worth. It’s included here at the end of this bloodlust chapter to leave a graphically sober and jarring impression, so that motivation and determination to halt this heinously insane savagery can build and spread the world over. We must stop the slaughter of our children!

The sprawling mighty Roman Empire owned and controlled the Holy Land (and the entire Mediterranean region) even prior to it becoming “holy,” but from internal corruption and economic collapse it crumbled in 476 AD, inviting land grabbing invaders from the north.[1] Christianity had already been divided in 330 AD by Christian convert and Roman Emperor Constantine I into a Western Latin branch still presided over by Rome’s Catholic pope,[2] and an Eastern Orthodox branch that Constantine relocated to “New Rome,” otherwise known as Constantinople (now Istanbul). Instead of using the official language of the western Catholic branch which was always Latin, the new Eastern Roman Empire that included most of Eastern Europe, Asia Minor and the eastern Mediterranean in the Middle East adopted as its official language Greek, and marked the birth of the enduring Byzantine Empire. Thus the course of world history was taking a major turn.

In the 7th century with the rise of Mohammed and Islam, a Muslim Arab Caliphate seized possession of the Byzantine southern provinces of Syria and Egypt, and by 638 AD the Holy City of Jerusalem.[3] Just prior to that, the Persians had a 15 year stint (614-629 AD) occupying Jerusalem.[4] Due to Palestine’s location as both a three continent geo-center and the overlapping epicenter of the three major religions Judaism, Christianity and Islam, it was coveted turf that throughout history has constantly been invaded and occupied by dozens of warring tribes and nations. Once the Holy Land was taken, expansionist Muslim Arabs pushed westward by sea and by land, even threatening conquest of Constantinople as well. Ultimately after launching two failed sieges on the Byzantine capital ending in 718 AD, a period of relative calm and truce prevailed in the region…[5] that is until the Macedonian Dynasty between 920 and 976 AD when Byzantine Christian forces rose up to retake northern Syria and Greater Armenia,[6] the first nation to declare Christianity its state religion back in 301 AD.[7] A number of Armenians were among the Byzantine emperors that consolidated Christian holdings in the Balkans and Middle East as the Eastern Roman Empire lasted nearly a millennium before being overrun by the expanding Ottoman Turk Empire.[8]

But since 638 AD, the Holy Land had remained under Muslim rule, with the Jews, Christians and Muslims living side by side in Jerusalem in relative peace and calm under mostly tolerant Islamic control.[9] But malevolent forces were at work near the end of the 11th century in Western Europe that would permanently upset the Holy Land’s culture of peace and religious tolerance. Surviving in an ultra-violent world where aristocratic lords and kings imposed death feuds and wars on their feudal subjects, constantly clashing with other clans and kingdoms, day-to-day life in the post-Dark Age was hardly giving way to any better life in the Middle Ages.[10] Since the fall of the Roman Empire, there was no monetary currency system. The peasant class was born and died owned as feudal subjects, human commodities completely controlled by nobility in an enslavement system that was both violent and inhumane. In medieval Europe the growing economic disparity between peasant Christian masses as landless serfs and the uneasy, contentious partnership of aristocratic nobility and entrenched Roman Catholic hierarchy planted seeds of unrest and upheaval amidst so much despair and abject poverty. Seething tension and conflict had been brewing for centuries within the psyche of the peasant masses, activated especially when a series of droughts struck Europe in the late 11th century.[11] Life was cheap, food was scarce and death hung everywhere in the air. In Western Europe this was the dire setting both culturally and economically on the eve of the 12th century.

In contrast to the miserable plight of Europe's Christian masses, life in the Byzantine Empire and in particular the Muslim controlled East with its developed mercantile system,[12] free flowing currency spurred on by the lucrative spice trade promoting economic and cultural wealth and prosperity, envy, ignorance and bigotry was growing in Western Europe.[13] Conditions were ripe for scapegoating any group of a different persuasion, specifically targeting the Islamic infidels. Rather than recognize the root of their misery falling squarely on the profound inequality and injustice born into a fixed feudal system based on bondage perpetrated by the 1% religious-aristocracy class (striking an uncanny parallel to today),[14] it's always easier to allow the brainwashing oppressors - the church and state - to readily point to a scapegoat, an identified, designated enemy possessing a different religion or skin pigment than get honest and confront the true cause of misery.

The unfolding dark clouds were ideal for creating the perfect storm then crystalizing as the Christian Crusades, ignited in 1095 at the Council of Clermont in France by a fiery orator in Pope Urban II, whose exaggerated lies intentionally manipulated a "holy war," (where have we seen this before?),[15] falsely alleging that Muslims were viciously attacking Christians in Jerusalem and Palestine and desecrating Christianity's sacred ground. And that was all the unhappy, strife-ridden, angry, desperate, bigoted Christians needed to hear.

Meanwhile, the Eastern Roman Empire was slowly losing ground to the recent Muslim converts, the nomadic Seljuk Turks that had migrated from the steppes of Central Asia. The Byzantine Emperor's major military defeat in 1071 at the eastern outpost Battle of Manzikert in Armenia set the stage in the short term for increasingly bold Turkish raids deeper into Mesopotamia and Anatolia (now eastern Turkey) and the ensuing clash of civilizations,[16] and in the longer term manifesting nearly a millennium later with last century's first genocide against those same Christian Armenians (1915-17).[17] To make matters worse, also in the same year of 1071, it was anything but all quiet on the western front as well. Byzantium's final presence in Italy was lost to invading Normans.[18] While the Turks captured the ancient city of Nicaea in Asia Minor drawing ever closer to the capital Constantinople, smelling blood off their recent Italian triumph, the advancing Normans decided to also launch an attack on Constantinople. Though the official fall of the Byzantine Empire would be held off until the mighty fortress walls of New Rome came tumbling down in 1453 by Ottoman Turks,[19] four and a half centuries earlier in 1095, the Eastern Roman Empire found itself being hit from all sides by multiple enemies, both Muslim and Christian alike.

Also smelling blood, in response to Byzantine Emperor Alexius I's request to the Catholic pope for mercenary assistance to stem the tide of territorial gains by the Turks,[20] the power hungry, ambitious Pope Urban II seized upon the opportunity to potentially reunite both branches of Christianity under his sole authoritarian rule by declaring the larger holy war in the Middle East.[21] In so many words he proclaimed, "Save your soul and go kill some Muslims," instead of themselves as many warring knights and peasants had been accustomed to doing. To the poor serfs who already had it rough, a guaranteed "free" ticket to heaven fighting for God sounded pretty good. Urban's words had a gargantuan immediate as well as lasting impact, changing the course of history forever.

To Europe's Christian peasant masses, it was really a no-brainer - continue suffering in status quo misery or blame everything on the Muslims, and begin killing them for God's guaranteed ticket to heaven (per the pope who to them was their earthly God). Blaming the true villain - members of the church and state ruling class was a dicey proposition, certain to result in either instant imprisonment or death punished to an afterlife of eternal hell and damnation. It's always been the same, from ancient times to the present, the master-of-deceit ruling class deploys its age-old divide and conquer, kill or be killed WMD con game on the manipulated ignorant masses and bingo! Just like clockwork, they fall prey to deception every single time. And sadly, nothing has changed as it's still going stronger than ever today.

And so thousands upon thousands of Christians became Crusaders marching to the Holy Land to liberate it from the designated enemy. As they moved through the Eastern Roman Empire closer to the Middle East, whenever the marauding Christians encountered Jews or Muslims along the way, they simply killed them and stole what they could.[22] A lawless hungry lynch mob mentality characterized the unholy caravans swarming in waves towards the "Holy Land." But reassured by Pope Urban that all their sins would be forgiven and that their reservation in heaven had already been booked as long as they kill for their Christian God, the desperately duped masses bloodthirstily did what they were manipulated to do.

After a five week siege of Jerusalem in the summer heat,[23] the Holy City was overrun by famished, determined invaders from the north, culminating three years of fierce bloodletting combat resulting in thousands, perhaps millions of dead

Christians, Muslims and Jews, chapter one's senseless carnage came to a tumultuous close in 1099 as the first of seven (or eight depending on historian) more Crusades to follow. Byzantine Emperor Alexius lived to regret asking for help from the Catholic pope as he'd been hoping on a few extra mercenaries to clean house in his own backyard, not the endless throngs of Crusading Catholics that raped, killed, burned and pillaged their way through his empire. As dire as it was for Byzantium prior to the First Crusade, afterwards it was left in even worse shape. The warlike Turks were still on the warpath grabbing more turf, but even the important Byzantine port city Antioch wound up in the greedy hands of a Norman invader that betrayed his oath not to steal Eastern Roman Empire land from fellow Christians. And to top it off, it was the Norman son in Antioch of the land-grabbing Norman father in Italy both laying claim to Byzantine territory not theirs… so much for the concept of Christian brotherhood.

Then to illustrate how the victorious Christian Crusaders were so far removed from the original compassionate teachings of their supposed Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, Desmond Seward's The Monks of War chronicles events of the three day Holy City conquest:

> Jerusalem was stormed in July 1099. The rabid ferocity of its sack showed just how little the Church had succeeded in Christianizing atavistic instincts. The entire population of the Holy City was put to the sword, Jews as well as Moslems, 70,000 men, women and children perished in a holocaust, which raged for three days. In places men waded in blood up to their ankles and horsemen were splashed by it as they rode through the streets.[24]

Crusade apologists always make sure to add that the slaughter was merely standard policy, as if that makes it any less evil.[25]

Less than 20 years after the Christians claimed their Holy Land grand prize, Turkish forces were already at it again, regaining a foothold in Mesopotamia, and appeared soon knocking on Jerusalem's door once again.[26] That was all it took to conjure up renewed barbarism and bloodlust among the Christian diehards to want to go kill some more Muslims, thus spawning the Second Crusade. But unlike the first, this time they'd additionally be armed with a special Christian military order of knighthood to help defend, conquer and ostensibly ensure that Jerusalem remain under imperialistic Western Catholic control in the "holy war" that the planetary controllers have never stopped manipulating and exploiting to this very day.[27]

The latest round of zealotry culminated in 1118 with the founding of the Order of Templar Knights to protect the next major pilgrimage to the Holy Land.[28] The safe passage of Crusaders was the false premise used to found this new Christian military order. The first Christian military Order of the Knights of Hospitallers, later known as the Knights of Malta, were already established and pope endorsed in 1113 for that very same purpose.[29] The nine noblemen of wealthy means deceptively calling themselves the "Poor" Knights of Christ and the Temple of Solomon,[30] better known later as the Order of the Knights of Templar, actually had something entirely different in mind. The King of Jerusalem granted their authorization to literally set up camp on top of the ancient King Solomon temple ruins. Their new Order had the knights religiously poking around for any recoverable relics, artifacts and otherwise magic bullets that would bestow upon them an added advantage in their quest for power and supremacy that also happened to include a war not only on Islam but Christianity as well.[31] The original founders of the Templar Order were never loyal to Jesus Christ or Christianity to begin with. But that incredibly significant reality will be addressed shortly.

Speculation still abounds over whether the Templar Knights might have discovered the famous Ark of Covenant or Holy Grail that may well have been hidden in a secret cavern below the excavated Solomon Temple.[32] Apparently they did stumble upon something big though, something so esoterically mysterious and enticing that it changed their world-view forever.[33] And this could have been the beginning of the end that fated their alleged downfall less than two centuries later. Scholars have concluded that the Templar Knights pursued secret knowledge contained in the mystical Jewish traditions of the Cabala and as such, actively sought out Cabalists for consultation in both Jerusalem and Europe.[34]

News of their prized newfound “wisdom” and/or magically powerful possessions uncovered in the Jerusalem ruins, despite the details remaining hidden, combined with the official endorsement of Pope Innocent II in 1129, attracted noblemen from all over Europe clamoring to sign up for what the Templar Order was offering.[35] The Templar Knights were fully blessed by the pope in 1139, once they underwent the mere formality of swearing to an oath of strict allegiance only to the pope that undoubtedly the inner Templar brethren had no intention of keeping. A revealing passage from the book Holy Blood, Holy Grail:

> In 1139, a papal bull was issued by Pope Innocent II - a former Cistercian monk at Clairvaux and protégé of Saint Bernard. According to this bull the Templars would owe allegiance to no secular or ecclesiastical power other than the Pope himself. In other words, they were rendered totally independent of all kings, princes, and prelates, and of all interference from both political and religious authorities. They had become, in effect, a law unto themselves, an autonomous international empire.[36]

As a historical backdrop to the Templar Order, a brief digression here is necessary. Jews have survived a very long history of horrendous prejudice and persecution, countless purges and pogroms throughout the ages. So of course it’s no wonder that to survive, many of Jewish descent have been forced to flee, convert or go underground, and remain incognito to others in their surrounding local environment. Hence the term crypto-Jewry (mentioned in the last chapter in connection with Sabbatai Zevi and Jacob Frank being messianic crypto-Jew Satanists) as the phenomenon whereby in order to ostensibly avoid mistreatment and harm,[37] thousands of chameleon-like Jews have been forced, felt compelled or some chose to change their names and/or convert to other religions such as Christian or Islam, yet secretly retained their original Jewish identity and religion handed down from one generation to the next.

During the Dark Ages of the 5th-7th centuries, for nefarious, subversive reasons, crypto-Jews from the Merovingian bloodline chose to convert to Christianity in order to infiltrate and marry into European royalty to reach top positions of power in both church and state.[38] The Merovingian clan proudly and boldly traces its ancestry back to King David, King Solomon, Jesus Christ and Mary Magdalene, while remaining steeped in the Jewish mystical tradition of Cabalism. It was the crypto-Jews who masterminded and financed both the Crusades and later the Renaissance. The ambitious Pope Urban II who ignited the 200 years of Crusade atrocities was the sixth French crypto-Jewish pope from this same Merovingian lineage.[39] Not by accident, so were all the original founding Knights of Templar, including their chief sponsor St. Bernard who authored the Rule of Knights Templar and his popular propaganda piece “In Praise of the New Knighthood.”[40] And there was good reason the founding knights assembled in Jerusalem and requested fellow crypto-Jew the King of Jerusalem King Baldwin II to set up headquarters adjacent the Solomon Temple ruins. The knights who excavated the ancient underground caverns and chambers below the temple were convinced that it was their Merovingian Jewish birthright to reclaim their families’ lost treasures belonging to ancestors that hid priceless relics and secret Cabalist knowledge prior to fleeing Palestine for Europe right after the Middle East was engulfed by the Roman Empire conquest.[41]

Despite being eight centuries ahead of The Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion released in Russia in 1905,[42] as crypto-Jewish infiltrators of the Christian religion and incendiaries of the Christian vs. Muslim unholy wars, the Templar Knights and their sponsors were strategically positioned to implement Protocol #7:[43]

Throughout all Europe, and by means of relations with Europe, in other continents also, we must create ferments, discords, and hostility. Therein we gain a double advantage.

Whether the Protocols are a hoax or not,[44] whether written by an anti-Semite out to demonize Judaism and the Jews,[45] or a transparent attempt to attract and recruit more anti-Jewish bigots, or whether it really is the work of ambitious Jewish Zionist leaders plotting their world takeover in the latter 19th century, the accuracy with which it describes in detail the methodical Satanic conspiracy led by the planet’s ruling elite speaks for itself. With a couple of simple word juxtapositions, replacing the words “Jews,” “elders” or “Zion,” with the word “elite,” “Illuminati” or “Satanists” and the word “goyim” or “Gentiles” with “humanity,” or “us,” it perfectly divulges the ruling elite’s takeover plan of this planet. And regardless of whether Satanists are crypto-Jews, Jews, or non-Jews, or whatever subgroup they might fall into, Satanists have made it their enduring age-old agenda to divide and destroy all religions in their larger war against humanity. With utter contempt and hatred, they loathe our Creator, all life, love, peace and all people who are good, who possess a conscience and a heart and everything they lack. So by exposing a small evil minority of crypto-Jews and their inflammatory, devastating impact on all human history including Jews, truth can never be attacked or dismissed as pure anti-Semitism. Regardless of religion, ethnic race or nationality, evil is as evil does.

That said, crypto-Jews' subversive infiltration into every realm of the global power pyramid, from ancient times to the present, has never adhered to the teachings of Jesus Christ. Instead as Cabalist practitioners, they were always aligned far more closely with occult black magic,[46] all the while secretly worshipping their fallen angel Lucifer. That's why throughout history as infiltrating false prophets and agents provocateur summoning dark demonic forces within their secret society rituals, they have consistently sown the seeds of deception through divisive teachings, false doctrine and dogmatic extremism in order to subversively manipulate and incite political and religious upheaval and mass movements of violence that explode on an epic scale.

As such, crypto-Jews have been the architects of the Crusades,[47] the French Revolution, Marxism,[48] the Bolshevik Revolution and Armenian genocide as part of the first of two world war bloodbaths - the biggest in human history,[49] [50] giving rise to history's deadliest tyrants Hitler,[51] Stalin and Mao, and finally onto the Anglo-American-Zionist movement wreaking out-of-control havoc to this very day. Zionist crypto-Jews having converted to the Synagogue of Satan, made a secret deal with a few other Satanists like Prescott Bush, the Rothschilds, Rockefellers and the international bankers as the usual suspects,[52] investing in Hitler and World War II, justifying the loss of 60 million lives for a Jewish State using as their bargaining chip the sacrificial lambs exterminated in concentration camps - the non-Zionist Jews.[53] This was the Satanists’ way of continuing the Crusades right into the 21st century,[54] indefinitely using their “divide and conquer” clash of civilizations as their M.O - ethnically cleansing Palestinians to make room for the Greater Israel Project.[55] The astute geopolitical analyst and author Henry Makow succinctly sizes it up this way:

Israel has little to do with the Jewish people. Zionism, Communism, Feminism, Nazism, are all creations of the same satanic cabal. These ‘isms are all means to the final goal, a neo feudal global dictatorship.[56]

And speaking of evil, the Merovingian Illuminati bloodline still lives on today in the crypto-Jews known the world over as both the Dutch and British royals,[57] both descendants of the House of Orange. Queen Elizabeth,[58] Prince Philip and Prince Charles are full fledge Illuminati Satan worshippers who indisputably protected longtime fellow Satanist, the child murdering rapist Jimmy Savile who for over a half century supplied children to the royals and UK VIP rapists.[59] Pedophilia permeates the royal family inbreeding. So does Nazism.[60]

The royals plotted and murdered Princess Diana and her Muslim lover about to become her fiancé,[61] all the while remaining in deep up to their Baphomet horns in satanic ritual sexual abuse of children and their globalized child sex trafficking network. The British royals decapitated Diana’s bodyguard-lover Barry Mannakee in a motorcycle “accident” and upon hearing Diana had died,[62] Queen Elizabeth’s first words were “someone must have greased the brakes” because once before the brakes in Diana’s Audi had been tampered with.[63] When the princess began her affair with Dodi Fayed who Islamophobe Prince Philip referred to as “an oily bed hopper,”[64] Diana was warned of befalling a similar fate as her former bodyguard. Knowing firsthand how evil the British royals actually are and that her life was in serious danger, Diana confided to friends about her in-laws, “they are not human,”[65] which goes right along with David Icke’s longtime contentions[66] (and a whole bunch of others like Helen Mirren and Lady Gaga)[67] that the royal family is a reptilian alien hybrid.[68] The bottom line is very strong evidence clearly shows that Diana was murdered by the royal family, afraid she would expose their Satan worshipping dirty laundry. So they assassinated her knowing as royals they are both legally and literally able to live completely above the law.

Queen Elizabeth and Prince Philip were the last known witnesses to see ten Native American children alive who disappeared while attending their Catholic school picnic outing with the royal couple back in 1964 British Columbia.[69] Over 50,000 aboriginal children from Canada have gone missing over the years, most often attending Catholic schools likely caught up in predatory global child trafficking networks. Closer to Her Majesty’s home, in March this year 800 bodies of children were uncovered in underground chambers below an Irish Catholic girls home for unwed mothers,[70] reminiscent of recent finds being dug up in countless sites like the pedophile paradise of UK’s Jersey Island where Savile and his royal friends came to play and abuse, with thousands of adult survivors coming forth to disclose the painful damage they sustained while living under the “care” of infamous children’s homes.[71] Over many centuries now the throwaway children from group homes and orphanages destroyed by a child welfare system that funnels and feeds for profit a fresh supply of young blood to the monster predators running this world have been a dietary mainstay for the parasitic Illuminati bloodlines.

This all sounds unbelievable until you look at the astounding numbers of children gone missing worldwide each year – 8 million and growing by the year. A reported 350,800 missing children from Ireland, Spain and Canada alone have been discovered at countless Catholic mass grave sites.[72] Additionally, as of November 2013 an incredible 10,077,574 sex abuse cases have been filed against Catholic pedophile priests.[73] The Satanists of royal ilk and the Satanists within the Catholic Church have been deceitfully conspiring against both children and humanity while working directly with fellow Illuminati Satanist puppets deeply entrenched in government, international banking, and the corporate world as the evil movers and shakers and planetary controllers behind every war and economic collapse throughout modern enslavement history. To sustain and increase their power and control over their devil's dominion, they've literally needed a constant fresh supply of child victims. By maintaining top to bottom control of every agency designed to protect children by planting pedophiles at the top levels of the child welfare system, the courts, law enforcement, the media, education and the government, an insulated system of predatory foxes all guarding the young blood henhouse has been allowed to both flourish and increase its number of victims each year.

For a very long time these Satanists and their private coven, epitomized by all their overlapping multi-memberships in so many secret Satan worshipping societies - the Illuminati, Knights Templar-turned-Freemasonry, Malta Knights, Skull and Bones, CFR, Trilateral Commission, Bilderbergers to Bohemian Grove have all been hidden in plain sight. But now their global conspiracy of human genocide against us and our children is being exposed at a never before seen, unprecedented rate. By unveiling the truth, we can wrest power and control away from these murderous vampires. What they've been most afraid of is an informed, outraged masses that have caught on to their despicable high crimes and are demanding justice. And now for the first time in history, we've uncovered massive, overwhelming evidence to possess the opportunity to take back our planet by finally holding the evildoers accountable for millenniums' worth of ugly past sins committed against humanity.

Turning our focus back to more historical "evidence" of how we got here, back to the Second Crusade. By the time the Seljuk Turks had captured the Christian stronghold Edessa in Mesopotamia in 1144, not a moment too soon had the new religious army the Templars raised sufficient funds and material support to enable zealous "onward Christian soldiers" to launch their Second [bloody] Crusade in 1145.[74] Despite all the pomp and fanfare, the knights of Jerusalem could do little to assist the floundering Christian armies of the King of France and Emperor of Germany, each never coordinating their offensives, arriving in Asia Minor separately and both getting their asses militarily romped by the surging Turks. The only Christian gain was nowhere near the Holy Land but back in Europe where Lisbon became liberated from the Muslim Moors. Otherwise the two year campaign turned out to be a complete disaster.[75] So much for the knights from the now two infamous Catholic military orders saving the day, both the Templars and the order that would later be known as the Knights of Malta. As a murdering ruthless mob, the Christians fared better without them in the First Crusade.

Meanwhile, the defeat distracted the Knights of Templar from their war making long enough to begin building scores of Commanderies all over Europe, particularly in France, Italy, Portugal and Spain, constructing fortresses, cathedrals, bridges, improving roads, building entire church communities, vineyards and shelters for the Crusaders' safe passage, even developing their own fleet of ships.[76] Famous for its white tunic and eight-pointed blood red cross symbolizing martyrdom, the Templar Order Knights grew to its peak size of 20,000 in the 13th century (160,000 total including non-knights),[77] gaining the military strength to seize control over a considerable land mass in Europe extending south to the Kingdom of Jerusalem in the Middle East that had largely come under Arab or Turkish control. It seemed they were far more skilled at increasing their land holdings mostly in Europe than protecting Crusaders or Christian Holy Land. The Order consisted of nobleman knights, non-noble sergeants that did the grunt work and chaplains. Every knight that joined the Order relinquished all his worldly possessions, quickly becoming an ongoing source of revenue. Plus the Templar Knights enjoyed social prestige, hobnobbing with Europe's most powerful royalty, constantly showered with gifts of castles and contributions, all tax-free.[78] For a while it seemed these guys were blessed and could do no wrong.

Yet despite the utter failure of the Second Crusade fiasco and the Malta and Templar Knights inability to change the dismal outcome for the Christians, whenever Templar Knights did finally get around to waging combat, so much has been written about their heroic, larger-than-life exploits. Numerous accounts describe their work ethic on the battlefield of fierce fighting to the death most often resulting in victorious conquests that overnight caused their knightly reputation to soar to legendary cult-like status.[79]

One typical example claims that a decade after the Templar Order was outlawed by the king of France and disbanded by the pope, evidence supports the contention that about 7,000 Templars managed to escape and relocate to friendlier territory in Scotland. The famous Battle of Bannockburn in 1324 was made even more famous when depicted as the grand finale of Mel Gibson's film "Braveheart."[80] Legend has it that the mere appearance of a sudden wave of Templar Knights coming off a hillcrest riding at full speed on horseback in support of Scottish foot soldiers outnumbered 3:1 was all it took for the advanced English army to panic and flee the battlefield, leaving all their equipment, money, and weapons behind. This is the kind of embellished fantasy and maybe truth that's intrigued generations for nearly a millennium about the Templars, inspiring the chivalry of Camelot's King Arthur Knights of the Round Table and search for the Holy Grail.[81]

But my question is, beyond all this inflated hoopla, in view of the debacle that characterized pretty much every Crusade beyond the first as the only one that achieved its military objective and that was accomplished without the Malta or Templar Knights, how effective militarily were these two legendary knight orders if they lost every single major military campaign in the Crusades they fought in? Okay, technically one other Crusade avoided outright military rout only because no actual fighting took place. Without the pope's endorsement (granting license to any king to declare a Crusade), the Sixth Crusade was smartly ended through negotiation in 1229 by excommunicated Arabic speaking Holy Roman Emperor Frederick II as part of a 10-year truce that for a few years put Jerusalem back in Christian control (yet not its holy sites).[82] Of course no sooner had the decade long peace come to an end, right on cue the pope rallied his Christian troops for yet another 7th blunder of the Crusade world.[83] If measured strictly in terms of wars won and lost, the knights batted 0 for 7, not exactly a record any warrior would proudly claim, much less attain legendary status… which begs a second question, in whose eyes were these guys so fabulously heroic and militarily skilled? I'd say heavily biased Christian revisionists and war glorifying romanticists known for taking humongous leaps of deceit and liberty at fudging the truth.

Here's another one handed down from Pope Urban legend folklore. One of the Templar Knights' so called Muslim opponents, tagged with the killer name "the Assassins," otherwise known as the Nizari Ismailis,[84] developed a respect for their fellow warriors' combat skills from the north.

This heretical, undersized, fanatical Islamic Shiite renegade order was allegedly equally feared for its deadly strike force and guerilla warfare tactics using stealth and deception to target and smite its enemies as history's first Islamic suicide bombers if you will. On one occasion the Assassins paid tribute (or perhaps a peace offering) of 3,000 pieces of gold to the Templars.[85] But in between battles when they weren't slitting each other's throats, the Assassins and Templar Knights were known to mix it up and rub elbows together. With some of the Templars born and raised in the Middle East and fluent in Arabic, both these militias had reputations for working hard and playing harder as party animals. The knights were known to over-imbibe alcohol per the then popular expression "to drink like a Templar."[86] Dating back to Marco Polo's claim that the mystical Assassin Muslim Order smoked hashish and that their Arabic name Hashashins was possibly derived from the Arabic word hashishi has triggered debate that still persists to this day over whether the Assassins (and Templars by association) used a little hashish in between battles to connect better with Allah.[87]

It's been historically proven that the Templar Knights frequently made secret alliances with various Muslim factions. They aligned with the Assassins to take control of Tyre and conspired with the Muslim Emir of Damascus in a plot against their "fellow Christian" military Order of Hospitallers.[88]

Whatever the Templar Knights gained along the way militarily, politically and financially, they lost spiritually as once allegedly devoted loyal defenders of the Catholic faith (though the founders were crypto Jews steeped in Cabalism). Before long, success had gone to their heads, hearts and apparently their loins. During their initiation ceremony, knights were required to renounce Jesus and God as their Lord and Savior by literally spitting, pissing, hissing and trampling on the sacred cross while literally kissing each other’s ass or that of a goat or cat or penis of their Grand Master,[89] swearing an undying loyalty to each other as brother-in-arms, and that many initiation ceremonies in Italy and France included permission to be lovers-in-arms.[90] But clearly sworn allegiance and loyalty was most binding towards their patron deity, the mysterious head or skull known as Baphomet, whose image by the 19th century morphed into a grotesque horned goat-headed, bearded satanic god sporting female breasts, an LGBT nightmarish version of the devil incarnate. Scholars contend that a minority of knights openly engaged in homosexual relations. Despite its acceptance amongst their Order brethren, by the 12th century, homosexuality in medieval Europe was equated with sodomy, considered an ungodly “unnatural act” of the first order, clearly violating both biblical as well as criminal law punishable by death.[91]

Homosexual rituals imposed on all newcomers during Skull and Bones’ (and other secret society and military brotherhood) initiation ceremonies are directly patterned after the Templars. So are the modern Illuminati black arts occult and satanic practices. The knights’ taboo brand of religion also had them faithfully sworn to celibacy with women, yet okay apparently amongst some to conveniently relieve their horny masculine urges between themselves. But evidence shows that wasn’t enough, so their passionate merrymaking expanded to such taboo indulgences as bestiality,[92] sacrificing young children[93] and committing pedophilia with boys recruited into the Order as young as 11.[94] [95]

Through their devilish god Baphomet, it appears these spiritually lost and misguided soldiers of fortune chose to sell their soul to the devil for the sake of attaining unparalleled wealth and power.[96] Making a quick buck and engaging in an orgy of sensual ecstasy while bowing down to a worshipped head called Baphomet confirms they more than dabbled in dark demonic forces. It seems throughout history virtually every secret society invariably succumbs under this same intoxicatingly degenerate spell, lusting insatiably for power, pleasure and riches in exchange for worshipping Satan. The more times change, the more things stay the same.

Calling upon their supernatural forces for guidance and knowledge, the other worldly Baphomet beast introduced usury banking practices to the earthlings, accepting traveling Crusaders' real assets for paper issued credit,[97] for the first time in history offering credit loans with high interest rates to wary, conned Christian travelers who accepted a piece of paper unbacked by gold or tangible assets in exchange for all their own gold and tangible assets… not unlike the bankers' Jekyll Island USA takeover with the 1913 Federal Reserve/Income Tax con.[98] A class of very rich bankers emerged as the Templar Order came to own more land and wealth than the monarchy kingdoms. Of course their usury scam making profit out of paper thin air was seized upon a couple centuries later by the likes of Mayer Amschel Rothschild, who refined the art of swindling to new unprecedented heights,[99] establishing the modern central banking monstrosity still operating today as the bankrupt, debt-based slavery control system teetering on the brink of self-implosion.[100]

Despite the fame and glory of the Templar and Malta Knights' collective efforts to save their Holy City from falling into infidels' hands, after unifying the Arabs and learning his sister had been captured and taken prisoner, in 1187 the Kurdish Moslem warrior on a mission - Salah Ed-Din (known as Saladin to Westerners) - defeated the Christians at the critical Battle of Hatten and moved on to recapture Jerusalem after near nine decades under Christian control.[101] But unlike the Christians a century earlier, Salah Ed-Din chose to be merciful and not slaughter the Christian residents nor desecrate their holy shrines. Upon hearing the shocking news of another failed Crusade that lost the crown jewel Jerusalem, the pope allegedly keeled over and died on the spot, but apparently not before declaring the Third Crusade to avenge the loss of the Holy Land.[102] Within a couple months the revengeful English King Richard the Lionhearted was the first of the royals to grab the gauntlet gung ho for Round 3. Meanwhile, through his battlefield glory Salah Ed-Din had ascended to become the master of Syria, Palestine and Egypt ruling over a united team of Islam that the Christians were literally just dying to beat.

On another not so insignificant note, to further contrast the difference between how Muslims and Christians generally treat captured enemies and their leaders he had just conquered, Salah Ed-Din kept his enemies alive, treating them humanely. In the case of King of Jerusalem POW Guy Lusignan, in 1188 Salah Ed-Din let him go free on the condition that under oath,[103] Guy would never take up arms to resume fighting Muslims again. So immediately upon release, the first thing the Guy does is find a priest so he can be told that an oath with an infidel is invalid and doesn’t need to be honored.

Do you see a pattern here? Down through the annals of human history, it’s never truly been the “big bad bogey man” - the Muslims, or Putin and the Russians as the aggressors, mass murderers and liars as the government and Western media brainwash always promotes. Time and time again the historical facts point to leaders of the Christian Western civilization that have been the violent bloodthirsty villains throughout modern history. And this sobering reality has been a constant right up to this day.[104] Except with the ruling elite’s war on Christianity in full force now, it’s no longer fair to blame New World Order death and destruction on Christians. The running theme of this entire chapter and book is how Illuminati Satanists have for centuries been hidden in plain sight in the ruling elite bloodlines,[105] and through malevolent secret societies have infiltrated and taken control over the Catholic Church, international banking, corporate institutions and the globalized Anglo-American-Zionist crime cabal government. But more on the Catholic takeover later.

For many years the Order of Solomon's Temple had not been taking its orders from Rome but exclusively from their heady genie deity named Baphomet, and as a result, under the interdimensional, demonic entity's guidance, secret knowledge and control, the Order had acquired unprecedented strength and power throughout Europe, directly challenging the hitherto tyranny of both church and state that were nervously taking notice.[106] But by the late 13th century the Christians were running out of Crusade excuses after repeated bloody thrashings, the haughty, arrogant Templars had worn out their welcome in Jerusalem and were kicked out of Palestine for good. With Salah Ed-Din's capture of Jerusalem for the final time in 1187, the Order's functional role in the Holy Land was doomed. Eventually they were forced to retreat to their final port city Acre, where after coming under siege and attack in August 1291 by overwhelming Muslim forces,[107] and with Europe tired of losing, the Crusades were finally brought to a shameful close. Already considered has-beens, support for the Templars was fast drying up. Forced to retreat to the island of Cyprus, weak and vulnerable,[108] the majority of Templar Knights returned home to Europe with Paris their final headquarters just as the French crown moved in for the kill.

Already in deep debt to Templar loans for waging protracted war against rival England,[109] France's King Philip IV whose most recent request for credit had been soundly rejected, in 1307 felt so threatened by the Templars that he sent a dozen spies to infiltrate the Order to gather sufficient evidence to end up justifying a Friday the 13th of October arrest of 2,000 knights in France for heresy based on uncovered sexual debauchery and betrayal of the Roman Catholic Church. The Order's Grand Master and 51 other Templars who had recanted their initial confessions, in 1314 were summarily burnt at the stake,[110] two years after the pope dissolved the Templar Order.[111] But the bulk of the knights' wealth and priceless relics had mysteriously disappeared just prior to King Philip's attempted looting, leaving the king barely able to refurbish his own army along with a few former Templars while subsidizing the Templar's chief rival order the Knights of Malta. Other remaining Templar survivors and their alleged missing assets apparently found safe refuge in Scotland and in short-time began resurfacing as burgeoning Masonic lodges.[112] The Templars and Freemasons in ideology and practice are virtually synonymous.

In 2001 previously misfiled documents known as the Chinon Parchment were uncovered within the Vatican archives by Vatican medieval paleographer Barbara Frale, who authored a book published a decade later divulging the ”full story” about the controversial secret order.[113] The recent evidence shows that a second confession of crimes was obtained through the pope's inquiry while Templars were not under duress or torture. Many writers, both Catholics and Masons, have always insisted that the first confession of debauchery and demonic worship attained through torture was therefore false.[114] But the Vatican scholar who wrote the recent book unveiling the papal discovery confirmed the homosexual and pedophilic practices as well as the idol worship of Baphomet. Yet Frale's media spun press conferences misleadingly minimized these depravities.[115] Despite the obvious crime of heresy committed by satanic practicing Templars, Vatican Pope Clement V in 1307 absolved them of their crimes based solely on their confession, yet the following year charged them with 127 offenses. 700 years later the pope in power,[116] forced in 2013 to unprecedentedly resign his crown (not done in 600 years) over his criminal part in the pedophilia scandal cover-up, just prior to his papal exit, the Rat-zinger also “forgave” the pedophilic Templars.[117]

At the same time that the Templars had gone both gay and astray, far away from their Christian God, just as so many Catholic priests have historically followed suit to this day, child sexual abuse committed by Dark Age Catholic priests and monks was rather commonplace. Vatican archives confirm the church had been covering up priestly child rapists since the early days of the Middle Ages. [118] Peasant children were known to be sodomized and then found crucified in the fields or by the road perpetrated by frocked pedophilic murderers, purposely set up for local Jews to be falsely blamed for engaging in blood sacrifice discussed in the preceding chapter.[119] What was left of the Templars and its secret occult ideology firmly took root in Scotland and evolved into the Freemasons also covered in the last chapter. Next up is a critical examination of the Templars’ bitter Catholic archrival even more dangerously enduring secret society - the military knights from the Order of Malta.

Pedophilia & Empire: Satan, Sodomy, & The Deep State

Chapter 5: Sins of the Sovereign Military Order of Malta

Chapter 5: Sins of the Sovereign Military Order of Malta

The birth of the Order of St. John was in 1048.[i] A community in Amalfi of merchants and Catholic monks from the Order established a church, convent and the Hospital of St. John in Jerusalem in 1085 to care for the sick among the Christians visiting and living in the Holy Land. In 1099, the final year of the First Crusade, the Sovereign Military Order of St. John of Jerusalem or the Order of Hospitallers was formalized, officially recognized by the pope in 1113 and by 1126 the Knights of St. John expanded their services as the second secret military Christian order designated to defend devotees traveling from Europe during the Crusades.[ii] So this competitive rival to the Templar Order as the other major secret Christian militia has a more enduring, and impactful sinister history than the mysterious Templar Knight legends.

Aside from Philip's indebted French crown, the Knights of Malta had the most to gain from the Templars' disbandment,[iii] by default opportunistically taking full advantage of the vacuum created by assuming both unrivaled military and banking power throughout Europe and the Holy Land beginning in the 14th century.[iv] And as a result, over the near millennium of its existence, the Maltese Knights' strength and control as the Vatican's most public and official military order has increased dramatically both in power and influence. The Jesuit Order founded in the 16th century covered next is also a Vatican militia that is even more secretly guarded and dangerous. John J. Robinson in his book Born in Blood: The Lost Secrets of Freemasonry contends that the Malta Knights and Pope Clement V had colluded to allow King Philip to indulge in his witch hunt to destroy the Knights Templar.[v]

Due to Turkish forces taking control over Jerusalem in 1291, the Hospitaller Knights had to relocate their operation and hospital to the island of Cyprus where the Order began building a naval fleet. But instability on Cyprus led to shifting their center in 1310 to another Greek island Rhodes also located in the Mediterranean Sea.[vi] However, a couple centuries later in 1523 after a six month siege, the Order of St. John knights also lost its foothold on Rhodes to the Ottoman Empire's advancing Turkish Sultan Suleiman, forced to eventually retreat to the island of Malta in 1530. For the next 268 years the Order maintained its Malta headquarters and sovereignty over both the islands of Malta and Gozo.[vii] More sea battles and sieges defending their turf followed against the pressing Ottoman Turks throughout the 16th century. The Order lost its islands yet again when in 1798 French Emperor Napoleon invaded and left the military order without a home territory. At this point without a sovereign territory, the Jesuit Order took advantage of Sovereign Military Order of Malta's (SMOM) diminished power by subordinating it under Jesuit control,[viii] though both ostensibly pledge sworn to death blood oath loyalty to their common superior- the pope.

For such an allegedly fierce fighting force that subversively gained increasing political strength over the span of centuries, the Malta Knights lost considerable ground militarily over the millennium, ultimately in 1834 finally relocating to its permanent sovereign home within the city limits of Rome where it remains today. After Napoleon's defeat, the British maintained the island of Malta as a possession until its independence in 1964, becoming the Republic of Malta though choosing to stay a British Commonwealth nation.[ix] In lieu of a treaty between the Order and the Republic of Malta over reclaiming Malta's Fort St. Angelo under permanent extraterritorial sovereignty, a 99-year lease was signed in 1998. Thus on paper only the Order of Malta remains a sovereign nation, still in search of a territory.

Ever since 1446 when the pope granted the Knights of Malta sovereignty that permitted independence to possess ambassadors and extensive non-taxable property in every nation on the European continent,[x] the Order of Malta internationally and politically was viewed and treated by other nation states as a separate yet equal sovereign nation, subservient only to the pope who must approve the lifetime elected "Sovereign Prince" as the Grand Master to rule over the Order's Council. The native populations in Rhodes and Malta where the knights occupied and ruled for centuries had absolutely no say in how their own island states were governed. But then after living under monarchial feudalism for centuries, they probably rarely even noticed… not unlike citizens of the world today also having grown complacently accustomed to living under plutocratic crime cabal enslavement. Famous German writer Johann Goethe's quote comes to mind: "None are more hopelessly enslaved than those who falsely believe they are free."[xi]

In any event, the Knights of Malta's contribution to the wave after wave of ill-conceived Christian invasions of the Middle East lasting 200 years cost millions of lives, and the Christian forces led militarily by the Malta and Templar Knights may have actually killed as many fellow Christians and Jews as they did Muslims.[xii] For all it was worth in cost, two centuries of virtual nonstop war, afforded Christian military control over the Holy City just one 88 year stretch. But once achieving their initial Crusade "victory," every Crusader invasion thereafter resulted in abysmal failure at untold, agonizing sacrifice and suffering. And the sad irony is that life for Christians in Jerusalem was far better living under their so called enemy than it ever was under Christian control. Jews and Christians alike in the Middle East were treated far more humanely and tolerantly by Muslim Arabs, [xiii] minus the hatred, bigotry, bloodshed and lies that instigated and fueled the holy wars. With the royal bloodlines competing treacherously against factions from some of those same bloodlines that had infiltrated the powerful Catholic Church, even Rome's two Christian militias constantly competed, bickered, and fought against each other.[xiv] Really the debacle of the Crusades were doomed from the outset.[xv]

But the real tragedy is that those same secret Christian societies - the Knights of Malta and the Templar-turned-Freemasons,[xvi] and the Jesuit Pope's Vatican and ruling bloodlines, today are no longer waging war against each other. Now united together, they've channeled all their venomous evil into a war still raging not just against Islam, but against all of humanity,[xvii] the natural earth and the earth's children. We are all Satan's enemy and in the name of their befallen god, they are desperately recoiling from the light of truth that we the people possess. Considered armed and dangerous to their very core existence, the globalists both hate and fear us, knowing we are now finally onto them in the name of truth and God, fighting to slay the demonic dragon in our midst.

There is a major history lesson as well as wake-up call here that unfortunately through elite deep state propaganda gets lost on Westerners' dumbed down short attention span (measured at only 8 seconds now),[xviii] at least that's what they're still desperately counting on, that we the masses remain so truth-starved, clueless, and docile that we never grasp either history lessons or the truth. Hence, through their nonstop 24/7 brainwash barrage, the planetary controllers always easily manipulate the global masses into blind acceptance and acquiescence that a perpetual state of war on earth is simply the unavoidable consequence of our present human condition. That presumption is yet another lie. It is only because we allow perpetual war, conditioned to impotently and passively believe we have no say or control, that it continues unabated. In recent years the war drum propaganda determined to make a World War III enemy out of Putin is one gargantuan fabrication that deep state is still determined to pull off with its exhaustive “hacked election” meme.[xix] The real war is against humanity and the elite’s desperation to cover up their pedophilia epidemic explains why they can’t possibly let go of their worn-out “the Russians did it” delusion.[xx] The globalists know if they cannot plunge us into world war soon, they will be toast, stripped and exposed as naked, decrepitly diseased child rapists they are, and that their long dominion controlling this earth through their diabolical crime cabal is inevitably crashing down now.[xxi] Do I hear an “Amen?”

This is why we need to see through the deception they’ve laid all around us. If you visit the Knights of Malta website, you may initially be fooled, perhaps even be impressed by the Order’s charity efforts and medical missions sanctimoniously displayed in over 120 nations around the world from last century to the present.[xxii] It’s their glossy propaganda portfolio to the world, their cover to deceive the true evil they propagate, obscuring their bottom line mission held by every secret society for over a century - to deliver New World Order tyranny through totalitarian one world government and one world religion that in actuality goes by the name of Satanism.[xxiii]

Under the auspices of Catholicism, the Knights of Malta are deceitfully running a cultural war on behalf of Christianity directed against Muslims, exactly like the Crusades, using the neocon conspired 9/11 and “war on terror” as their fake pretext. Bush Jr called his response to 9/11 a “crusade, this war on terrorism,"[xxiv] explaining how the Islamic terrorists "hate our freedoms"[xxv] right after he and Cheney committed 9/11 false flag treason[xxvi] so they could war on Middle East Muslims while pushing anthrax[xxvii] and their pre-written Patriot Act to take our freedoms away patterned after the cold war Soviet totalitarianism. That's demonic deception the satanic way.

Renowned journalist Seymour Hersh has asserted that SMOM draws its members from the highest levels of US deep state including the Pentagon, secret services, and counterparts in friendly allied nations. While speaking at perhaps the foremost prestigious one - Georgetown University's Foreign Policy School, Seymour Hersh explained the Knights of Malta this way:

They do see what they're doing… It's a crusade, literally. They see themselves as the protectors of the Christians. They're protecting them from the Muslims [as in] the 13th century. And this is their function.[xxviii]

Some Malta Order facts… for over 900 years it's been a closed fraternal order whose members are initiated by invitation only. To be a knight one must be Catholic, have served in the military service, and the higher ranks are most definitely upper crusty, requiring proof of aristocratic family coat of arms handed down from father to son unbroken for at least 300 years.[xxix] Nearly half[xxx] of its 13,500 present members are of European nobility.[xxxi] The Grand Master, appointed for life and approved of by the pope, is typically of exclusive Illuminati bloodline lineage possessing head of state status with secular rank of prince and ecclesiastical equivalent to a cardinal. The military order was also granted sovereign nation status with its own Constitution despite no territorial claim beyond its Rome headquarters. The Order benefits from permanent observer status at the UN, maintains diplomatic relations with 106 countries[xxxii] and its members enjoy diplomatic immunity,[xxxiii] thus possessing a license of impunity to live above the law. As a sovereign “nation,” this convenient loophole freely permits illegal transfer of money across international borders with zero oversight.[xxxiv] Members swear loyalty to this sovereign Order/”nation” and their supreme boss the pope over and above their own nations, which minimally amounts to a conflict of interest[xxxv] and potentially a betrayal of their own countries’ constitutions, essentially making them traitors. But that’s the whole idea, as a covert enemy to all nations’ sovereignty, SMOM’s mission is one world government (like pretty much all secret societies).[xxxvi] It’s a New World Order snake pit linking the Vatican to royalty and fascist dictatorships around the globe through an underground web of fellow criminal secret societies. As such, it is closely affiliated with Freemasonry, particularly Italy’s fascist P2 masonic lodge as well as the Illuminati.[xxxvii] And they all secretly practice Satanism, which by its hidden demonic nature includes pedophilia and both child and human sacrifice.[xxxviii]

In 1927 the Knights of Malta Order opened up its exclusive membership to Roman Catholic American males of high wealth and prominence. One such early American invitee who co-founded the US SMOM branch was DuPont Treasurer, General Motors Chairman and onetime head of the Democratic National Committee John Raskob. In 1934 Raskob the US traitor led an unsuccessful attempt to overthrow the sitting US President in Franklin D. Roosevelt.[xxxix] Thanks to an American patriot - the heroic General Smedley “war is a racket” Butler, the coup was thwarted but the treasonous conspirators were never properly investigated nor arrested.[xl] This shameful, little known chapter in US history illustrates the kind of fascist criminal elements and activities that the Malta Knight Order promotes, raw naked power that subversively undermines and blatantly violates all international and national sovereign laws in favor of brutal centralized authoritarian control. With the recent forced resignation of a former DNC chair and the DNC today facing more criminal subterfuge charges,[xli] bent on pursuing by any means available a similar mission to overthrow yet another US president.[xlii] Sadly and pathetically for lawless America, times have changed very little.

Still another example of how the SMOM as a sovereign entity functions within the larger sphere of international clandestine operations, because it can issue its own passports (along with stamps and coins), during CIA's Operation Paperclip the Maltese Order served as a Vatican-Nazi ratline supplying false identity passports to US enemy war criminals and brutal concentration camp scientists to circumvent Nuremberg prosecution.[xliii] The Order of Malta Knights along with the pope,[xliv] the Vatican, Dutch[xlv] and British royalty[xlvi] and a host of American internationalist kingpins like John D. Rockefeller,[xlvii] Henry Ford as well as General Motors,[xlviii] Prescott Bush,[xlix] and the Dulles brothers[l] all treasonously admired and supported Hitler and the Nazis. And with popes and Malta Order's penchant for supporting fascist dictators around the world, that nefarious elitist thread continues today. Additionally, just like the Knights of Templar Order, according to the Project for the Exposure of Hidden Institutions (PEHI), the ultra-secret Order of Malta Knights has also been implicated in occultism, and as such, "a number of prestigious members" have been linked to such satanic practices as pedophilia, vampirism and cannibalism.[li]

In order to understand what the Knights of Malta are all about and what these "prestigious members" actually stand for, a quick perusal of past and current membership is most illuminating. The list of Maltese Knights[lii] reads like a who's who of all the earth's down and dirty movers and shakers over the last 100 years (and beyond).[liii] The Talmud worshipping patriarch of the Jewish Illuminati Rothschild bloodline, Mayer Amschel Rothschild from Bavaria,[liv] became a closeted Catholic Jesuit[lv] and Malta Knight who financed both the Vatican and fellow Jesuit crypto-Jew Illuminati "founder" Adam Weishaupt in the 18th century[lvi] (though the true Illuminati origins date back to at least Spain in 1492 with the Alumbrados)[lvii] That Rothschild is the earliest listed Malta Knight is telling enough as the family banking dynasty's tentacles soon owned both the Bank of England housed in the City of London (the independent sovereign corporation called the Crown apart from England or its capital London)[lviii] as well as controlling interests of the Vatican Bank, not to mention financing both sides to every major war ever fought over the last few centuries. Aside from that, the Rothschild Empire controls the European Central Bank, the privately owned foreign cartel the "US" Federal Reserve,[lix] the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund and the Bank of International Settlements.[lx]

After commandeering Britain's Bank of England by crashing its stock market in 1812,[lxi] it was Mayer Amschel's son Nathan who accurately boasted:

I care not what puppet is placed upon the throne of England to rule the Empire on which the sun never sets. The man who controls Britain's money supply controls the British Empire, and I control the British money supply.[lxii]

Since Nathan was but one of five Rothschild sons, each securing a banking monopoly over different European nations' capitals including the US, coupled with the consolidation of wealth and power that globalization has enabled over the last century,[lxiii] Nathan Rothschild's above statement would today be far more accurate simply substituting the word "world" for "Britain." It's been reported that only three nations' banks on this planet have yet to be conquered under the Rothschild domain - Iran, Cuba and North Korea.[lxiv] A couple more amazing facts: the Rothschild fortune is said to equal the totality of wealth owned by the entire 7.5 billion world population[lxv] and that the richest 1% own more than the rest of us 99%.[lxvi] So the glaring and growing disparity between the elite handful and the global population would logically follow that the earth's richest family worth an estimated half a quadrillion dollars[lxvii] (whose vast hidden assets are distributed amongst enough heirs to avoid appearing on Forbes' annual "rich list") that owns the world's most gold and controls its rigged market[lxviii]would have to be an early invitee into every secret private club, if not the kingpin boss of every Luciferian society ruling this planet. And plenty of evidence indicates that the Rothschilds' higher power does not come from God but Satan himself.[lxix]

Other infamous Knights of Malta notables from this last century are a bunch of Nazis that include Hitler enabler and supporter Franz von Papen,[lxx] Hitler's financiers Fritz Thyssen and Prescott Bush,[lxxi] Hitler WWII Axis partner fascist Italian dictator Benito Mussolini, Hitler's SS leader and satanic worshipping black occultist Heinrich Himmler.[lxxii] Hitler's Eastern front intelligence head, sadistic war criminal General Reinhard Gehlen, as a Malta Knight received SMOM's highest award and through Paperclip was recruited to direct West Germany's first secret service. [lxxiii] The CIA utilized Gehlen's knowledge of Russia who, more than any other intel operative, was responsible for starting the Cold War.[lxxiv]

Hitler and Himmler were so enamored with the organized infrastructure of the secret Catholic militia orders that they patterned their own Nazi government after the fanatical assassin order of Jesuits (covered in the next chapter).[lxxv] Prior to World War II, Pope Pius XII was the infamous Hitler buddy in the Vatican who squelched Catholic opposition to the Nazis and, as an anti-Semite, turned his back on the Jewish holocaust.[lxxvi] Get the picture? The Nazis, the Vatican, the Malta Knights, the CIA and Western fascists in power created America's postwar Russian Commie bogeyman that's still being used as their sorry ass excuse for launching World War III. Again, only the names, faces and dates change while history stays the same.

General "Wild Bill" Donovan and Allen Dulles, both WWII OSS leaders and postwar architects of the CIA as well as obedient Malta Knights,[lxxvii] along with Allen's brother Secretary of State John Foster Dulles[lxxviii] (whose son Avery was a Jesuit Cardinal till his 2008 death) through their Operation Paperclip[lxxix] worked hand in hand with every Malta Knight's blood sworn superior, the Nazi friendly pope, his Vatican and Nazi war criminals to covertly funnel safe passage of 1,600 German scientists and engineers to the United States[lxxx] and 10,000 Nazi military personnel to South America[lxxxi] as a means of escaping trial and death at Nuremberg. And for his obedience in laying the groundwork to save so many sadistic Nazi killers, Hitler's Pope Pius XII in 1944 rewarded Malta man Wild Bill the Grand Cross of the Order of St. Sylvester, the Vatican's highest award.[lxxxii] Subsequently, virtually every CIA director in US history has been a Malta Knight, starting with its first director Dulles, John McCone, William Casey, George Tenet, William Webster, John Deutch, William Colby[lxxxiii] (who like Defense Secretary James Forrestal in 1949[lxxxiv] was likely murdered for pushing too hard for alien disclosure) and Leon Panetta (also Jesuit educated)[lxxxv] just to name a few. These early CIA Malta Knight scoundrels were responsible for employing the likes of Nazi Dr. Mengele to develop CIA's top secret, highly illegal and inhumane MK Ultra/Monarch mind control programs[lxxxvi] now operating worldwide through drugs, torture, hypnosis and sexual trauma training multiple generations of super soldier assassins, spies, sex slaves and of course Manchurian Candidate presidents like Clinton[lxxxvii] and Obama.[lxxxviii] So not for one second should we believe that the sugarcoated hospital work saving the poor people of the world is all that the satanic Order has been up to over this last century.

Not surprisingly, longtime Federal Bureau of Investigation kingpin, transvestite-pedophile[lxxxix] and COINTELPRO[xc] blackmailer-mastermind J. Edgar Hoover was also a Knight of Malta.[xci] Having so many heads of US intelligence and law enforcement as active key members of the pope's "intelligentsia" machine easily operating under the veil of total secrecy provides the "ideal" cover by which to commit espionage, government coups, terrorism attacks and trigger wars, all by elitist design to consolidate global power and control into fewer hidden bloodline hands. And who would believe that the benevolent Holy Pope made them do it? After all, with the pope's blessing, the Knights of Malta generously export their heartwarming charities and humanitarian causes to the lowly masses in need from every corner of the globe.

This sleight of hand deception has ensured that such public Illuminati faces rise to the top through the backdoor method as US history's only unelected vice president Nelson Rockefeller[xcii] and his international crime cabal boss brother, the finally deceased David Rockefeller[xciii] teamed up with fellow NWO architect and Trilateral Commission co-founder, the also recently dead Zbigniew Brzezinski,[xciv] along with Illuminati boss, credibly accused homosexual rapist[xcv]-MK sex slave handler[xcvi]-NWO guru,[xcvii] the still croaking Henry Kissinger[xcviii] as the leading members of virtually every secret society known to Satan, also card carrying, never leave home without it, globetrotting, power-broking, proud-to-be Malta Knights. Over many decades they have nefariously colluded and confabulated with the pope and such Malta Order European royalty luminaries as Queen Elizabeth, Dutch Queen Beatrix and their hubby princes to fast forward their collective New World Order vision.[xcix]

Queen Elizabeth’s family, the House of Windsor, only went Anglo in the face of raging anti-German sentiment during WWI. The real family name, the House of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha,[c] are crypto-Nazis as members of both Prince Philip[ci] and Queen Elizabeth’s families, especially her uncle the onetime King of England, were loyal Hitler supporters.[cii] The English royals date back to the English Templars that reinvented themselves as Freemasons.[ciii] This ruling hierarchy all ties together as the popes, the Vatican, the Malta Knights, the Jesuits, along with European royalty and Black Nobility (royal bloodlines seeking to regain lost monarchies)[civ] as well as the CIA all share a long history of peddling and installing fascist dictatorships. Hell, dictatorship and New World Order fit together like a hand in glove. With all these Malta VIP’s beholding to the pope, for centuries the earth’s policy ringleaders have been able to subversively rule, control and destroy the world at will through pedophilia, war and their theft-based financial system of global population enslavement.

It was the Sovereign Military Order of Malta Knights that created Britain’s Royal Institute of International Affairs in 1919 and America’s Council on Foreign Relations in 1921.[cv] As the world’s financial power, the City of London’s core secret societies include SMOM, the Pilgrims Society[cvi] with branches in both England and America, the Freemasons’ parent company headed by Queen Elizabeth - the Order of the Garter,[cvii] and finally atop the Illuminati pyramid’s Committee of 300 (aka the Olympians), a 1727 historical offshoot of the British Empire’s first monopoly - the British East India Company.[cviii] By the end of World War II the CFR had created the United Nations as another trial run at one world governance after post-WWI's League of Nations flopped under the orchestrated onset of WWII.[cix] Of course the Malta Order keeps its all seeing eye on the UN with "observer status" membership.[cx]

Nearly every modern US president and even their fathers are/were Malta Knights as in Hitler financier-US traitor Grandpa Prescott[cxi] and his treasonous kin, pedophile[cxii] [cxiii] NWO Presidents George H.W.[cxiv] and George W.[cxv] [cxvi] along with the family underachiever Jeb Bush, 9/11 mastermind[cxvii] VP pedophile Dick Cheney,[cxviii] and their Democratic NWO partner-in-crime,[cxix] serial rapist predator[cxx] and fellow pedophile criminal Bill Clinton[cxxi] along with child fondler (and no doubt pedo) VP Joe Biden.[cxxii] Other presidents include pedophile Gerald Ford,[cxxiii] bestiality porn addict[cxxiv] and underage callboy to the White House President Ronnie Reagan,[cxxv] Dwight D. Eisenhower[cxxvi] and even the last US "good guy" president and alleged pedophile JFK[cxxvii] have all been Knights of Malta. US presidents, Knights of Malta, mind control and pedo sex rings go together.[cxxviii]

Of course too many to count, high powered Council on Foreign Relations members[cxxix] like current and former CFR presidents Richard Haass[cxxx] and Peter G. Peterson.[cxxxi] Holding dual Israeli citizenship[cxxxii] and Maltese membership pledging utmost loyalty to both Tel Aviv and the Catholic pope, as the 14-year head of the premier globalist NWO think tank dictating US foreign policy over the last century,[cxxxiii] by default perennial Bilderberger[cxxxiv] Richard Haass' loyalty to America has to be last on his list of priorities. Following CFR's marching orders are the prominent foreign relations puppet-senators John Danforth,[cxxxv] Pete Domenici,[cxxxvi] Jeremiah Denton,[cxxxvii] Cuban born now Morgan/Rockefeller banking lobbyist[cxxxviii] Mel Martinez,[cxxxix] 33 degree Mason Bob Dole,[cxl] [cxli] Ted Kennedy[cxlii] (along with father Joe),[cxliii] Opus Dei fanatic Rick Santorum, [cxliv] [cxlv] and Diane Feinstein[cxlvi] all are or were Knights. Other California politicians in this private Maltese club include former LA city mayor Richard Riordan,[cxlvii] former governor Arnold Schwarzenegger and Congressman Darrell Issa.[cxlviii]

Then there are Malta Knights who were key henchmen in such illegal operations as Reagan-Bush's Contra arms-for-drug pusher Lt. Col. Oliver North,[cxlix] [cl] or "Israel first-US last" dual citizens[cli] Bush-Cheney neocon fixture former UN Ambassador John Bolton[clii] and fellow neocon neocon 9/11 conspirator DHS head and pre-9/11 Patriot Act author Michael Chertoff. Chertoff shared writing the treasonous Patriot Act with its main architect, fellow Malta Jesuit Georgetown law professor Viet Dinh,[cliii] an alleged relative of South Vietnam's onetime US installed then US assassinated Catholic dictator puppet Ngo Dinh Diem.[cliv] Then there's daddy Bush partner-in-crime, Carlyle CEO-deep state VIP Frank Carlucci.[clv] The Maltese Order of course is saturated with criminal US defense, state and treasury department secretaries as well as high-brow think tank honchos and central bankster gangsters.[clvi]

The Order of Malta Knights also recruited two former NYC mayors - anti-2nd Amendment fanatic Michael Bloomberg[clvii] and 9/11 co-conspirator-public transvestite Rudy Giuliani.[clviii] [clix] Incidentally, with so many crisis actor-staged Islamic lone gunman mass shootings in America,[clx] ex-mayor Bloomberg is simply following his Malta Knighthood-Vatican orders that supports the strictest gun restriction legislation that will lead to complete elimination of civilian gun ownership in the US.[clxi] It seems those most fervently demanding to infringe on our constitutional gun rights domestically are the most gung ho about bombing other countries internationally,[clxii] waging war around the world… which brings us to the Malta Order's US military warriors. Aside from General Eisenhower, the following warmonger generals are Malta Knights: the protagonist loser of the Maltese-CIA drug war (aka Vietnam War) William Westmoreland,[clxiii] [clxiv] the ever-ambitious "I'm in control here" Alexander Haig (immediately following Reagan getting shot),[clxv] William Boykin,[clxvi] Stanley McChrystal and Admiral William McRaven (both also Opus Dei according to very credible journalist Seymour Hersh)[clxvii] and retired Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff (I went to school with for three years at West Point)[clxviii] Martin Dempsey.[clxix] Then speaking of wars, there's Blackwater mercenary founder the Maltese Christian Crusader Erik Prince and former Pentagon Inspector General turned Blackwater exec (and also Opus Dei) Joseph Edward Schmitz.[clxx]

Then as if those aforementioned peace hater-killers from the US aren't Luciferian enough, the Order of Malta seeks out for membership likeminded fascist tyrants around the world. Over the years the demons in the Catholic Church have regularly teamed up with the US crime cabal players to prop up bloodthirsty dictators as totalitarian "useful idiot" tools to expedite Illuminati's New World Order mission. Then when they've been used up, swiftly the Vatican-US war machine replaces them by either death or imprisonment. Illuminati boss Kissinger has played his hand in both the rise and fall of most or all - Shah of Iran, Ngo Dinh Diem, Pol Pot, Manuel Noriega, Ferdinand Marcos, Osama bin Laden, Muamar Gaddafi, and Saddam Hussein just to name more than a few.[clxxi]

Examples of Malta Knight recruitment amongst these murderous despots include Kissinger and his CIA-Maltese-neo-Nazi nexus pulling off yet another coup – their first infamous 9/11 in 1973, installing Chilean General Augusto Pinochet.[clxxii] Aside from Pinochet, other colorful Latin American dictators as favorite Malta Knight inductees are Argentina's Juan Peron,[clxxiii] even Jesuit trained US "nemesis" Cuban tough guy, the late Fidel Castro, alleged to be of Jesuit creator Black Nobility Farnese family bloodline,[clxxiv] [clxxv] [clxxvi] former Nazi Austrian President Kurt Waldheim[clxxvii] and weasel-like, infamous pedophilia cover-upper-war criminal UK Prime Minister Tony Blair.[clxxviii] Finally, we have the Bourbon bloodline reinstalled after dictator Franco's death in 1975 with Spain's Jesuit trained King Juan Carlos holding black court as the Malta King of Jerusalem, Middle East and North Africa while his son took over for him in Spain in 2014. King Carlos[clxxix] is the patriarch descendant heading the Templars of Aragon claiming direct lineage to the Merovingian Illuminati bloodline.[clxxx] Do you see a Hegelian "problem-reaction-solution" pattern here" All the key players typically from ancient Ptolemaic bloodlines involved in international coups, covert subversion, perennial drug wars, global terrorism and fascist subterfuge like Vietnam, Contra, 9/11, Iraq and Afghanistan are working undercover and consistently rewarded by the pope's Malta Order.

To realize how important Jerusalem is to the Catholic hierarchy (that includes the pope, King Carlos and Queen Elizabeth II), historically as Jesus' old stomping grounds, both symbolically and literally, the Vatican owns over 60% of the land inside the city of Jerusalem.[clxxxi] Thus, the Crusades never really ended as the Catholic power elite is still hell bent on removing every Muslim trace in Palestine, and for that matter the Jews as well, from "their Holy Land." On behalf of the Vatican as the new Holy Roman Emperor, King Carlos oversees this quest to revive Rome's "Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem" for "the Vicar of Christ." But according to a number of Jews, the Third Hebrew Temple must still be built on the King Solomon's Temple Mount in Jerusalem by human hands as the End Days go-ahead to set the stage for their Messiah's return.[clxxxii] This one spot on earth where for centuries the big three religions each have converged to contentiously lay claim as their own precious and scared turf acts as the epochal proverbial clash of civilizations as well as the convenient excuse to perpetuate the planetary controllers' always profitable endless wars.

Among the Catholic-Satanist High Priest crowd within the Malta Knight Order comes Archbishop Bernard Francis Law who ran a child sex trafficking ring out of his Boston Archdiocese until he resigned in December 2002[clxxxiii] after getting busted by the Boston Globe journalists featured in the Oscar winning 2015 film "The Spotlight."[clxxxiv] Moving down the Atlantic Coastline from Boston to New York City, similar to J Edgar's heavy-handed role in the FBI, from 1939 to 1967 fellow pedophile-Malta Knight Francis Cardinal Spellman dictatorially ruled over both Big Apple's Catholic Archdiocese but also as Grand Protector and Spiritual Advisor[clxxxv] of the Malta Order ruled with iron fist over all US Maltese operations.[clxxxvi] [clxxxvii] The closeted tyrant had the New York Times cowering even years after his death from daring to print the hypocritical truth about how Catholic kingpins love young choir boys in all the wrong ways. Spellman and his CIA Malta henchmen Dulles and McCone have been implicated as heavies in the John F Kennedy assassination for the president's refusal to expand the war in Vietnam (among a several reasons taken up in the next chapter that unveils the power of the Jesuit Order).[clxxxviii]

Then there are powerful US Supreme Court Judges who are also Opus Dei members like Chief Justice John Roberts, Samuel Alito, Clarence Thomas and the murdered (for knowing too much) alleged pedophile[clxxxix] Antonin Scalia.[cxc] [cxci]Turning to Maltese moneylenders, the front and center globalist finance puppeteers are well represented in former Federal Reserve chairmen Alan Greenspan[cxcii] and Paul Volcker (who also double dutied as super elitist Pilgrim Society VP).[cxciii] Heading up Malta's corporate team is JFK co-conspirator Ford then Chrysler's Lee Iacocca (for concealing bullet hole evidence),[cxciv] Conrad Hilton and son Barron[cxcv] of the Hilton Hotel chain[cxcvi] and Monsanto founder-planet destroyer John Francis Queeny.[cxcvii] The Malta Order couldn't kill presidents, start wars and kill millions without their mass media propagandist-moguls such as Time and Life Magazines publisher, CFR and Skull and Bones-er and JFK assassination cover-upper Henry Luce and fellow accomplice wife Clare Boothe Luce,[cxcviii] the News Corporation/Fox disinfo Mockingbird magnate Rupert Murdoch[cxcix] and eugenics fanatic and CNN patriarch Ted Turner,[cc] [cci] longtime media intellectual-columnist and former CIA operative and Skull and Bonesman William F. Buckley,[ccii] and Builderberger-CFR-Jesuit coadjutor and MSM TV fixture Charlie Rose.[cciii] [cciv] [ccv] Then of course for PR purposes comes the Order's entertainment section that includes Hollywood director Frank Capra,[ccvi] sex slave handler-pedophile Bob Hope,[ccvii] [ccviii] notorious Satanist, serial child rapist and pimp Jimmy Savile,[ccix] Frank Sinatra since the crooner and the knights are both known for maintaining close ties to the mob,[ccx] country western singer Ricky Skaggs,[ccxi] Walt's brother Roy E. Disney.[ccxii]

If you haven't figured it out yet, other than perhaps one or two from the fringe PR section, the Maltese Order exclusively invites only the crème-de-la-crème scum-de-la-earth to their private parties to plot their next assassination, terrorist false flag event or imperialistic war that right on Hegelian cue leads to their coveted NWO fascist police state takeover[ccxiii] while happily cutting up and devouring the latest fresh batch of just trafficked in flesh and blood children. This is neither exaggeration nor conspiracy theory, it's the cold dark grimmest of realities that we can no longer afford to ignore and keep our heads in the sand because it's just too disturbing to face. If we're ever going to put a stop to this abominable disgrace, we must directly confront this evil brutality and slaughter and blow up this international child rapist killing machine once and for all – before it kills us.

But just to throw us off their wicked bread crumb trail, again no doubt for purposes of positive publicity, the motley Malta crew every now and then throws in a few figures considered to be good guys and international figures, like the anti-apartheid heroes Nelson Mandela,[ccxiv] and Desmond Tutu.[ccxv] Even former Congressman Ron Paul has been listed as a Knight of Malta[ccxvi] although researching it further for incontrovertible evidence is nonexistent. One site attempting to make a case that Ron Paul's a freemason is at best weak.[ccxvii] A stronger case shows veteran GOP/media consultant Pat Buchanan may well be a controlled opposition plant.[ccxviii] [ccxix] Even progressive dissent guru Noam Chomsky [ccxx] [ccxxi] and pioneering alt news rabble-rouser Alex Jones (who admits family members have been CIA operatives)[ccxxii] are speculated to be a Malta Knights.[ccxxiii] Jones' InfoWars website[ccxxiv] never even mentions the nefarious Malta Order in any of their thousands of articles over the years. The one time an article was actually posted was an AP piece marking Malta's 900th anniversary.[ccxxv] That's about as benignly milquetoast and unrevealing as you can get. Meanwhile, Malta Knight Buchanan has been a guest on AJ's show.

Now to understand what all of the above planetary controllers are doing on behalf of who owns them, and what their obligations are, they must all undergo blood sworn oaths of strictest allegiance to the pope to complete their initiation ceremony. Let's take an eye-opening look at this unbelievable oath that commits every one of these illustrious Knights of Malta swearing their lifelong loyalty and obedience to Rome's pontiff.[ccxxvi] From two separate officially confirmed sources - Congressional Record of 1913 and Library of Congress,[ccxxvii] comes the text of the sworn blood oath that is standard protocol for every initiate to commit to obeying for life in the Malta Order, the Jesuit Order, Knights of Columbus Order and every other secret Catholic society. All incoming members are duty-bound till death do them part to deploy graphically violent methods in their sworn vow to eliminate every so called potential enemy of the pope as their supreme commander, and that includes by their definition the over 6 billion of us humans on this earth who happen not to be Catholic:

I do further promise and declare that I will, when opportunity presents, make and wage relentless war, secretly and openly against all heretics, Protestants and Masons, as I am directed to do to extirpate them from the face of the whole earth; and that I will spare neither age, sex, or condition, and that will hang, bum, waste, boil, flay, strangle, and bury alive these infamous heretics; rip up the stomachs and wombs of their women, and crush their infants' heads against the walls in order to annihilate their execrable race. That when the same cannot be done openly, I will secretly use the poisonous cup, the strangulation cord, the steel of the poniard, or the leaden bullet, regardless of the honor, rank, dignity, or authority of the persons, whatever may be their condition in life, either public or private, as I at any time may be directed so to do by any agents of the Pope or superior of the Brotherhood of the Holy Father of the Society of Jesus.

In confirmation of which I hereby dedicate my life, soul, and all corporal powers, and with the dagger which I now receive I will subscribe my name written in my blood in testimony thereof; and should I prove false or weaken in my determination, may my brethren and fellow soldiers of the militia of the Pope cut off my hands and feet and my throat from ear to ear, my belly opened and Sulphur burned therein with all the punishment that can be inflicted upon me on earth and my soul shall be tortured by demons in eternal hell forever.

Sounds like venomous S&M hate spewing straight out of the mouth of Satan himself. It would be laughable if it weren't true that all the royal Illuminati bloodlines that every US president in history shares the same genetic linkage with the British Windsor's, are all committed to honoring this same undying oath that devotes their exclusive loyalty to the pope alone, not to God, not to Jesus, not to their nation nor their family or humanity, but elevates only the pope to their satanic pedestal as their one and only earth god. And the fact that royalty, presidents and the most powerful shadow government figures in the world for many decades have been taking this blood sworn oath to be faithful only to the pope, and no one or nothing else, what does that say about their intentions towards the rest of us on this planet? In their eyes those of us not amongst the Catholic faithful are deemed heretics who need to be exterminated sooner than later. This information gives renewed impetus and explanation to the rulers' existing depopulation agenda.

The part where the oath demands relentless war waged against Freemasons as their eternal enemy is total bullshit. Near half of the powerful Malta Order members just cited are also 33 degree Masons. For instance, Allen Dulles, J Edgar Hoover, Henry Kissinger, Ronald Reagan, George HW Bush, Bill Clinton and Tony Blair are all high degree Masonic Malta Knights.[ccxxviii] While Queen Elizabeth is the Sovereign Head of the Order of St. John, the Protestant arm of the Knights of Malta,[ccxxix] her husband Prince Philip is a 33rd degree Mason who wants to be reincarnated as a killer virus that will reduce the world population.[ccxxx] [ccxxxi] Again, all the powerful secret societies want most of us dead and for the minority of genocidal survivors their tyrannical enslavement totally controlled by a one world government master and one world religion called Satanism.

A longtime goal of the Freemasons has been to infiltrate and take over the Vatican, ultimately destroying both the Catholic Church and Christianity.[ccxxxii] How Satanists have specifically seized control over the papacy will be further discussed in chapter seven. At one point in 1903 Cardinal Rampolla, a closet mason, came very close to being selected pope.[ccxxxiii] But by the close of Pope Paul VI's Second Vatican Council in 1965, the papacy had already been thoroughly invaded by Freemasons. And more recently, an infested Masonic network within the Vatican promoted Jorge Bergoglio to become history's first Jesuit pope for good reason - Pope Francis has hinted at his temporal status as an 80-year old pontiff,[ccxxxiv] also implying he may be the final Catholic pope as reinforced by prophecy,[ccxxxv] and more than hinted at establishing a one world religion.[ccxxxvi] Francis' call in recent months to purge Freemasons out of the Church and from the Order of Malta Knights in particular[ccxxxvii] in the aftermath of firing the Maltese Grand Master in January,[ccxxxviii] alludes to the masonic foothold deeply entrenched inside the current Vatican. Considering that an already well established Masonic network operating within the church crowned Francis pontiff in 2013, you can rest assure that the first Jesuit pope isn't seriously interested in extirpating either Satan or Freemasonry from either his church or his satanic brand of one world religion any time soon.

A superficial historical analysis might cite the Malta Order's medieval competition with its archrival Templar Order Knights and the rooted close link shared between the Templars and Masons[ccxxxix] ostensibly predisposing Freemasons to consider the Maltese Order their competitor and common enemy and vice versa. But let's cut to the chase, the one commonality shared by every single one of these secret society ideologues at the highest degrees and vows is their sworn undying loyalty and obedience to satanic pagan gods.[ccxl] And due to the degenerate filth operating at the top of today's Catholic Church, with the pope seemingly answering to Satan, more than enough evidence emanates directly from inside the unholy Vatican itself to sadly corroborate this veracity. But as alluded to earlier, more on Satan's conquest over Rome later.

Probably the most blatant evidence that Freemasons and the Knights of Malta Order are in fact tainted blood brothers, blasting this entire myth that they're sworn enemies is Italy's most powerful Masonic lodge otherwise known as P2. Aside from the remarkable overlap membership between Rome's P2 (Propaganda Due) masonic lodge and Rome's Malta Knights, the pragmatics of an Italian marriage of convenience won out between the mafia and the boot nation's boot-licking fascist elite.[ccxli] Their criminally subversive joint activities with the Vatican are also linked to the CIA and NATO's infamously bloody Gladio false flag terrorist operations waged against the communist party that also included bank robberies, bank fraud and assassinations.[ccxlii] Moreover, the P2, the Malta Order and Vatican are all implicated in the murder of Pope John Paul I in 1978 just 33 days after he was elected pope.[ccxliii] From the late 1940's to the 1990's, the CIA, military intelligence, mob, P2, Malta and Jesuits working together as a secret army brought terror to Italy and Europe, and, more recently in the mid-1990's, with MI6-CIA-NATO's Gladio B operations spreading to Turkey using Islamic proxy terrorists.[ccxliv] Both covert and overt wars, international terrorism, and illegal smuggling of arms, drugs, body parts and sacrificial children have become the huge deadly business of Rome's Vatican, Rothschild and royalty's City of London and Washington's US Empire as the Satanic headquarters, of course presided over by none other than the fallen Lucifer himself.

Be it in Europe, Turkey, the Middle East war zones, or for that matter anywhere on earth, this is the global trade that

Belgian entrepreneur, banker and former Illuminati associate Ronald Bernard spoke of earlier this year.[ccxlv] The nexus of organized crime, secret societies (i.e., Illuminati, Freemasonry, Malta Order, Opus Dei, and Jesuits), the Vatican, the global intelligence community and their crime boss puppet-stringed government leaders, all covertly work hand-in-hand to money launder trillions of dollars through central banks, doing their dirty bidding in the name of Satan. Once Bernard was exposed to the satanic blood sacrifice of children, the aphrodisiac of unlimited power, wealth and sex with beautiful women no longer held the same compelling allure. But because the 61-year old Illuminati whistleblower's graphic emotional account of how big business operates deep inside a Luciferian underworld leaked too much truth out, he recently paid for it with his life. Ronald Bernard died under mysterious circumstances while out hiking on a recent August afternoon in Florida.[ccxlvi] His death is clearly a warning for others who like him may wish to come clean, revealing the sins of the planetary controllers… all the more reason to offer Truth and Reconciliation Commission for insiders to safely come forth with their testimony.

Yet another ultra-right wing, notorious secret Catholic society of ill repute is Opus Dei, a hardcore anti-Communist, Islamophobic organization that includes both Catholic clergy as well as Catholic laypersons.[ccxlvii] It was founded in 1928 by a conservative Spanish priest named Josemaria Escriva (1902-1975) who openly supported oppressive fascist dictatorships led by the likes of Franco as his spiritual advisor and admirer and apologist for Hitler. Opus Dei was heavily represented in both the Franco tyranny making up over half his cabinet[ccxlviii] as well as in the bloody Pinochet regime that included an Opus Dei member serving as Chile's foreign minister.[ccxlix]

Yet in 2002 Pope John Paul II rushed through to prelature status Opus Dei, and then Escriva’s canonization to dubious sainthood faster than any other saint in church history up to that time.[ccl] What does that tell us? With its mission to fervently support strong arm tyrants, which the last three popes – John Paul, Ratzinger and Francis are all guilty of, endorsing the Opus Dei movement automatically includes endorsing its overactive role in the massive Catholic pedophile cover-up.

The dangerous rise of Opus Dei has run a parallel course with the ascent of its infiltrating members being amongst the most powerful bishops and cardinals in Rome sitting on the Vatican’s governing council Curia. Likewise Opus Dei’s following amongst the clerical ranks out in the missionary field has also surged in the Americas, Africa and Philippines.[ccli] Its numbers worldwide stand at 80,000 with 2,000 priests and 3,000 members in the US.[cclii] It holds assets worth about $3 billion. But like those in Scientology, many of its members renounce their membership calling it a cult that forcibly distances followers from their families and rigidly controls every aspect of a person’s life, and in exchange for income confiscation, each member is issued a modest monthly stipend that requires every expenditure to be closely accounted for.[ccliii]

Like the Order of Malta, its members have also expanded as covertly operated seepage into all the highest levels of corrupt powerful institutions far beyond Rome, extending to the European Union, NATO and Washington, including the Supreme Court, FBI, CIA and mainstream media.[ccliv] As a relevant aside, America’s most damaging spy in US history, Robert Hanssen, was a daily Catholic churchgoer and Opus Dei devotee who as a career FBI agent for over 20 years managed to give away America’s top secrets to Russia without getting caught.[cclv]

During the 1980's with former CIA director then Vice President George H.W. Bush's illegal Contra operation, the CIA, Opus Dei and Knights of Malta along with Sun Myung Moon were all covertly funneling money through such agencies as the World Anti-Communist League and AmericiCares in support of death squads (that Reagan affectionately called "freedom fighters") in Nicaragua, Guatemala and El Salvador.[cclvi] With Bush senior's brother Prescott Jr on its advisory board and its top funding source[cclvii] and founder HW's old Yale roommate Robert Macauley, AmeriCares was closely linked to a privatized social service agency that the Reagan-Bush administration lavishly praised called the Covenant House run by known pedophile and AmeriCares VP Father Bruce Ritter. A CIA linked business partner of the US backed former Nicaraguan dictator Anastasio Somoza (a West Point graduate) headed the Covenant House pilot program in Guatemala.

With Macauley, pedo-prez GHW Bush, Prescott Jr, pedo-Ritter and the Somoza partner all five Malta Knight members, according to intelligence sources of former Nebraska State Senator John DeCamp instrumental in exposing and writing The Franklin Cover-Up, AmeriCares and the Covenant House were alleged to procure Latin American children in a major child sex trafficking ring.[cclviii] A couple more SMOM players, former Treasury Secretary William Simon[cclix] and the late globalist guru Brzezinski sat on AmeriCares' board of directors while HW's Quaker oatmeal wife Barbara Bush was AmeriCares' "ambassador-at-large." As a Malta non-Catholic, Macauley was the first "infidel" to receive the Order's top prize, the Cross of the Commander award.[cclx] But his AmeriCares and SMOM resurfaced yet again[cclxi] in the aftermath of the infamous Sandy Hook false flag.[cclxii]

Note how this insulated criminal joint operation between velvet glove AmeriCares and secret Catholic military Malta

Order and the CIA stinks foul of fascist cronyism, nepotism and pedophilia trafficking to perfectly illustrate the ultra-prevalent theme of the predator fox infiltrating and feasting inside their guarded henhouse. Again, this is their tried and true method of how Satan worshipping child raping war criminals never have to answer for their horrendous assaults against humanity. Their penchant for illegal war making around the globe provides unlimited access to drug-weapons-organ-child trafficking as their most diabolic and evil line of work and play.

An ultra-conservative religious group financed by cult leader Sun Myung Moon (in addition to funding AmeriCares) is the Council for National Policy (CNP), boasting powerful religious and political members.[cclxiii] CNP is also a strong AmeriCares backer. President of the American Association of the Knights of Malta and a CNP player J. Peter Grace[cclxiv] helped found the charitable CIA front organization AmeriCares.[cclxv] Years earlier Grace made his American company a safe haven for Nazis in America, placing them on his board of directors or on his payroll as consultant - the notorious IG Farben chemist-director Otto Ambros, responsible for killing hundreds of Jews at Auschwitz. High profile CNP evangelist Pat Robertson is also one of AmeriCares largest contributors. When AmeriCares’ pedophile head “Father” Bruce Ritter was busted molesting kids from his youth organization, a former CEO of one of the nation’s top public relations firms Hill and Knowlton was rushed in pro bono to defend Ritter and AmeriCares, after all, it served as the perfect humanitarian front for George H W Bush’s international child trafficking and drug operations. Hill and Knowlton is the same fraudulent, unscrupulous outfit that staged the imposter pretending to be a 15-year old Kuwaiti hospital volunteer testifying with crocodile tears before Congress in 1990 the boldface lie that she had witnessed 312 Kuwaiti babies grabbed from their incubators and mercilessly dumped on the floor to die by Saddam Hussein's death squad soldiers.[cclxvi] The imposter turned out to be the Kuwaiti US ambassador's daughter. And the Hill and Knowlton CEO at the time that was brought in to "smooth over" the Ritter scandal was none other than Robert Keith Gray, a partner-in-crime with two CIA operatives that notoriously ran homosexual blackmail operations.[cclxvii]

The late John DeCamp who wrote the book on the Franklin pedo scandal, asserts that Gray's blackmail schemes were simply an extension of the infamous Roy Cohn's CIA linked illicit "Bronx boys" operation, a New York City pedophilia sex ring servicing politicians, high ranking military officers, and prominent court judges for blackmail hardline anticommunist Zionist control.[cclxviii] Cohn was both Senator Joe "Red Scare" McCarthy's lawyer as well as consigliere to every Italian and Jewish mobster kingpin in New York. And for 14 years prior to dying of AIDS in 1986, Cohn was also both the Trump family lawyer and the Donald's personal mentor.[cclxix] Cohn at one time led a John Birch Society organization called Western Goals Foundation that evolved into the Council for National Policy. Contained within Cohn's pedophilia ring may have even included the satanic cult that Son of Sam David Berkowitz referred to in his conversations with investigator Maury Terry.[cclxx] Though cast as the "lone gunman" devil, strong evidence corroborates that Berkowitz was a member of the Process Church of the Final Judgment that may have participated in the series of infamous murders in the New York area in the 1970's. The Process originated in London and over the years has been branded a notorious reputation akin to the Manson family.[cclxxi] Berkowitz told Terry that his Satan worshipping cult actually supplied children for sex to wealthy pedophile parties in upscale Westchester County, Long Island, Manhattan and Connecticut, and that one of those homes in Connecticut was none other than Roy Cohn's.[cclxxii]

That satanic cults interface and mix with satanic super-rich for hired assassination might explain the gruesome murder of a Wisconsin priest named Father Alfred Kunz. The Catholic priest was found with his throat slashed from ear to ear after he had been investigating child sex rings in the Catholic Church.[cclxxiii] On the March 1998 night that active CNP member and fellow priest Charles Fiore took over Kunz' Catholic Family Hour radio show to further expose evidence that he and Kunz had gathered, the Satan signatured murder of Father Kunz took place sending a blood-curdling warning that Fiore would be next.[cclxxiv] Powerful Luciferians possess both the means and the motive to take out potential threats like Fathers Kunz and Fiore or anyone else like Ronald Bernard who dare lift the veil exposing the demonic forces behind child rape and blood sacrifice networks - be they linked directly to the Church of Satan or the Church of Catholicism, since they serve the same master.

Along with his connection to the CNP, Roy Cohn's extensive experience working and playing kinky with 33rd degree Mason and Malta Knight J Edgar Hoover,[cclxxv] the CIA and reactionary anticommunist fascists while running pedophilia blackmail operations spawned a number of other blackmail schemes. Disguised by its façade of "family and religious values," the Council for National Policy and its tentacles that include the CIA, Opus Dei and the Malta Order represent at its diabolical occult core a satanic bedrock of deviant, perverse subculture. With help from their Luciferian friends in high places, the CIA, the Mossad, MI5 and MI6 have been running these sexual blackmail pedo operations for many years.[cclxxvi]

Murdered double agent superspy for both MI6 and Mossad Robert Maxwell[cclxxvii] had a daughter Ghislaine who posed as Jeffrey Epstein's girlfriend and procurer of his underage girls running a later blackmail operation that enticed the likes of the pedophile Clintons and Queen Elizabeth's pedophile son

Prince Andrew among many others.[cclxxviii] And as a onetime Epstein buddy, Trump is more than likely yet another compromised politician. Again, child trafficking pedophile victims for the elite's demonic consumption effectively controls the public policymakers prior to them ever being selected presidents to do the dutiful bidding of their Luciferian controllers, and secret societies Opus Dei, the Malta Knights, the Jesuits, the Templar-Freemasons, the Illuminati and the Skull and Bones have long been integral cogs in the Luciferian wheel.

Still another scandal linking the Catholic secret societies Opus Dei and Malta Knights to CNP and dirty Washington politics is the DC pedophile-call boy sex/spy ring out of the Watergate, Sheraton and Ritz Carlton hotels run by convicted felon,[cclxxix] CNP member and now reemerging GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff[cclxxx] during the Bush-Cheney years. For knowing too much, the DC Madame was very likely murdered in 2008 to ensure a tight lid be kept on her little black book that would incriminate scores of high level sexual predators in Washington scandals stay buried.[cclxxxi] Meanwhile, the year prior in 2007 George W. Bush fired eight US attorneys probing his and Abramoff's DC sex ring in a blatant attempt to further thwart investigation and obstruct justice.[cclxxxii] Insiders state that disgraced CNP affiliated Republican Congressman Mark Foley's forced resignation after being caught for years sending sexually explicit emails to young underage congressional pages was just the "tip of the iceberg" during the Bush-Cheney regime.[cclxxxiii]

The Secret Service unvetted White House imposter reporter-former callboy himself Jeff Gannon who was suspiciously allowed access to not only attend press conferences to ask ass kissing pro-Bush questions from 2003-2005 but also invited to at least a dozen George W. Bush White House sleepovers.[cclxxxiv] Gannon is alleged to be the alias grownup version of 12-year old Iowa paperboy Johnny Gosch who was abducted in 1982[cclxxxv] into a daddy Bush pedo-ring run by Lawrence King of the Nebraska Franklin scandal.[cclxxxvi] Gosch was kidnapped by Satanist-pedophile-Monarch mind control programmer Lt. Colonel Michael Aquino.[cclxxxvii] It seems that Gannon and Abramoff allegedly procured young boys for politicians and high profile media figures' late night poker parties at the DC hotels,[cclxxxviii] financed by AIPAC and Netanyahu specifically for blackmail purposes[cclxxxix] to ensure that MSM and US Congress votes in favor of fighting Middle East wars for the Greater Israel Project.[ccxc]

The US territorial possession - the Northern Marianas Islands Commonwealth throughout the 1990's was rampant in a child sex slave trafficking ring that forced underage girls into prostitution and sweat shops in Saipan.[ccxci] But rather than stop it, now convicted pedophile then Speaker of the House, Dennis Hastert,[ccxcii] and the 3rd most powerful House member GOP Whip Tom DeLay made sure that US laws applied to the US territory that would have stopped the sex trade and pedophilia were sabotaged in committee and never voted on by the House. Lobbyist Jack Abramoff supplied thousands of tax paid dollars so that congressional perverts like DeLay and Hastert could make several trips to the Marianas to seal the deal and keep the lid on the scandal and abuse prolonging it right into the Bush administration. Abramoff's lobbying firm, a CNP participant, wrote the rebuttal to a Marianas teenage victim witness for Congressman Ralph Hall to present on the House floor. CNP member Tom DeLay even paid money to Hall to help squelch the sex abuse scandal in the Pacific and Hall's former staff assistant was a CNP member. The Council for National Policy has demonstrated a consistent policy of obstructing evidence and covering up international child sex trafficking and high profile pedophilia crimes.[ccxciii]

As long as we’re on the topic of US sponsored child trafficking and Christian pedophilia with international Maltese collusion, another example typifies such heavy-handed American interventionism applied in a most vile way is Chile’s Colonia Dignidad operated by German Nazi pedophile Paul Schaefer who as a boy was also active in Hitler’s Youth movement.[ccxciv] Schaefer’s Colonia included every heinous activity imaginable, from satanic ritual sexual abuse, child sex trafficking, torture and murder involving every nefarious outside agency and operation from Paperclip, the CIA, MK Ultra mind control brainwashing and assassination to AmeriCares, the Knights of Malta and the Vatican.

Facing pedophile charges back in Germany in 1959, the occultist Christian minister managed to successfully escape his homeland troubles in January 1961 with assistance from the Vatican-Nazi ratline to start life anew in the remote central Chilean wilderness at the foothills of the Andes 200 miles south of the capital Santiago.[ccxcv] With insider contacts, the conservative Chilean president granted him access to an isolated, rural farm. Schaefer’s cult following in Germany attracted some gullible (and some not) Christian followers to emigrate with him, incredibly even including some of the children involved in his pending charges, telling parents they were attending a short one day outing, only to never be heard from in Europe again.[ccxcvi] Under the guise of running an agricultural Christian commune based on Schaefer’s alleged anti-Communist and supposed Baptist principles, the Colonia residents unwittingly became conscripted slaves. While men and women were kept apart in a forced labor camp and prohibited from engaging in sex, cult leader Schaefer was free to rape and sodomize children at will. His Colonia Dignidad had absolutely nothing to do with either dignity or religious principles.[ccxcvii]

A consortium of South American intelligence services comprised the CIA's Operation Condor engaged in assassination, kidnappings and torture on foreign soil, including American, ostensibly as a counterterrorism measure. Kissinger and the CIA used Condor in an effort to implant fascist puppets in every Latin American country. Colonia Dignidad was a bizarre violent cult run by a pedophile Nazi Satanist with covert connections to an already existing Nazi ratline network running from the Vatican to South America (Paperclip vestige) extending through Operation Condor to very high places in governments in the Americas.[ccxcviii] A dozen years after Schaefer's arrival in Chile, Malta Knights Henry Kissinger and soon-to-be CIA director Bush led a successful coup to overthrow the democratically elected Chilean president Salvador Allende on 9/11/73 in order to install their fellow Malta Knight tyrant General Augusto Pinochet.[ccxcix] With assistance from the dictator's Chilean secret service as well as CIA personnel, Colonia quickly evolved into a modern day concentration camp for torture of "disappearing" Chilean dissidents.[ccc] A key CIA operative acting as the liaison between the US-Chilean governments, specifically between the CIA and Chilean secret police as a paid employee of both was one Iowa born Michael Townley,[ccci] instrumental in overthrowing Allende and as a CIA double agent assassin later convicted with several anti-Castro Cuban exiles in the bombing murder of Allende's former defense minister Orlando Letelier living in Washington DC in September 1976.[cccii]

Pinochet had placed a hit on Orlando Letelier, and sent Michael Townley with a fake passport to Washington DC to kill the outspoken critic of the Chilean junta regime. CIA director George H. W. Bush was given foreknowledge of the hit and deferring to the CIA-Malta-Condor agenda to promote fascism, Bush was complicit in letting the murder take place on US soil.[ccciii] Bush's right hand man, deputy CIA director General Vernon Walters, another Malta Knight, met with Pinochet's murderous secret police jefe General Manuel Contreras on several occasions during the mid 1970's,[ccciv] establishing a cozy relationship and even hiring him as a paid CIA asset.[cccv] Three years after the Allende coup, on his way to work Letelier's car blew up, killing him instantly along with his aide an American passenger and injuring her husband in the backseat.[cccvi] Bush went out of his way to conceal evidence, releasing false statements to the press clearing the Chilean government and sabotaging at every turn the FBI's car bomb investigation.[cccvii]

Fellow Malta fascists stick together, so columnist William F. Buckley[cccviii] lied when he wrote:

U.S. investigators think it unlikely that Chile would risk with an action of this kind the respect it has won with great difficulty during the past year in many Western countries, which before were hostile to its policies.[cccix]

If that's not incriminating enough, author of Death in Washington: The Murder of Orlando Letelier (1980), Donald Freed unveiled that William's brother James Buckley, also a fellow Skull and Bones Malta Knight,[cccx] met with assassin Michael Townley in New York just a week before Townley murdered Letelier.[cccxi] The bigger picture emerges of yet another subversive deadly plot of US state sponsored terrorism[cccxii] carried out on US soil for the sake of the CIA-Malta agenda to deliver NWO fascism to every corner of the globe. Thus that little trifling incident on Massachusetts Avenue was quickly forgotten so that Malta men - the Buckley boys, Kissinger, Bush, Walters and Pinochet - could all continue their next clandestine scheme as if the DC assassination had never even happened.

Pinochet-CIA assassin Townley with his Chilean wife also participated in another car bombing attack in September

1974 assassinating exiled Chilean General Carl Prats and his wife.[cccxiii] Townley stands accused of torturing to death Spanish-Chilean diplomat Carmelo Soria in 1976 as last year Chile's Supreme Court requested Townley and two others be extradited to face murder charges in Santiago.[cccxiv] In Italy the American assassin was convicted in absentia of attempted murder of former Chilean VP Bernardo Leighton who suffered irreversible brain damage resulting from gunshots fired at him and his wife in 1975 Rome.[cccxv] Michael Townley is also suspected of murdering Chile's famous Nobel Prize winning leftist poet Pablo Neruda.

Some have suggested Townley to be a mere wannabe CIA secret agent man.[cccxvi] But regardless, the Bush and the CIA used him and his lethal services to further their fascist cause and aim, so the point is mute. Townley was a frequent Colonia camp visitor and prime Schafer collaborator establishing interrogation and torture protocol, complete with soundproof underground torture chambers.[cccxvii] After doing five years in US prison for the Letelier assassination, the FBI placed Townley in its witness protection program to avoid extradition and escape justice for his multiple murders and international terrorism.[cccxviii] Receiving federal protection speaks for itself… definitely, a company man of US Empire, Inc., as a free man quietly reaping his reward in retirement now at age 75.

Meanwhile, under Pinochet Chile's Colonia was operating as a full scale internment labor camp, a foreign rendition torture center and an experimental lab replication of the CIA MK Ultra/Monarch mind control program for Bush and Kissinger. Evidence exists of children from Germany being trafficked in to Chile to maintain the Colonia population since no sex other than pedophilia was allowed on the compound. Also local native Chilean children from the adjacent area attending the Colonia school apparently were also abducted and abused.[cccxix] Shadowy elements operating deep within the German, Chilean and American governments were in direct support of Colonia Dignidad. For years under the Maltese eye of protection, the “charismatic” one eyed camp leader was knowingly allowed to sexually molest children while playing prison commandant overseeing occult satanic torture and murder of imprisoned Chilean political prisoners. The Colonia Dignidad community was residence to some 350 resident captives at one point. Once the Schaefer pedo scandal began surfacing in the late 1990’s, the population had shrunk to 198 by 2002.[cccxx]

Finally with Pinochet’s 27-year dictatorship 7 years removed and 25 kids reporting to staff at the Colonia free clinic and school that Schafer was molesting them, in 1997 the pedophile once again managed to magically escape the law (through friends in high places and Nazi underground network) until 8 years later he was apprehended in Argentina not far from Buenos Aires.[cccxxi]

The big picture has emerged to confirm that the CIA, Mossad, West German and Chilean secret services were all caught red-handed with their hands in the Colonia black ops cookie jar, steeped in drugs, ritualistic child sex abuse, torture, murder and mind control of kidnapped children as well as enslaved adults.[cccxxii] Pinochet’s secret service ties were linked to CIA Gladio Operations in Italy and Europe as well. Also similar to other Mossad-CIA blackmail operations in America and Caribbean, wheeler dealer Schaefer enticed numerous powerful businessmen, politicians, police chiefs, and German Embassy diplomats to parties where illicit sex and child abuse were photographed and filmed that Schaefer kept in secret files.[cccxxiii] This is how the elite puppet masters regularly control their elite puppets. Moreover, having become close friends with Pinochet himself, running a “religious charitable” enterprise that expanded into a major import-export business meant that Schaefer never had to pay any taxes.[cccxxiv] The pedophile even ran a Colonia lab that was developing chemical and biological weapons[cccxxv] according to former Chilean secret service agents who were trained by Schaefer himself in torture methods using drugs and electroshock.[cccxxvi] Similar to every international child sex ring involving the rich and powerful, the Colonia child rapist who forced one or two boys to sleep with him every night, using drugs if they resisted,[cccxxvii] relied on his influence and close connections to top Illuminati global players to keep the truth concealed for as many years as he did.

In the late 1970's when Chile and Argentina, both run by generals, were nearing the brink of all-out war, Pinochet even had a secret, under-the-table nuclear weapons deal going with Israel in cahoots with apartheid South Africa. A central figure in the Pinochet government machinations with ties to both Colonia and Israel was Sergio Melnick, a Chilean Jew who was Pinochet's Secretary of Planning.[cccxxviii] Chile's Colonia was just one Illuminati beehive where numerous NWO players inadvertently got caught and partially exposed. Pinochet had over 1200 other concentration camps and torture centers as well.[cccxxix] And the thousands of Illuminati "beehives" around the world rarely if ever see the light of day.

The US government has a long history through the CIA and military special operations of committing atrocities on every continent.[cccxxx] Globally Washington jointly continues to operate countless secret torture centers with dozens of other fascist tyrannical police state nations the US installs and protects,[cccxxxi] regularly imprisoning political dissidents, suspected so called insurgents, indiscriminately violating all domestic and international laws and Geneva Convention accords, to inflict unthinkable amounts of pain, suffering and murder on targeted victims that we never hear about it.[cccxxxii] We know illegal torture continued after the atrocious Bush-Cheney regime,[cccxxxiii] Obama just took it further underground.[cccxxxiv] And Trump went publicly gung ho to bring back the inhumane insanity[cccxxxv] that never works anyway.[cccxxxvi] So much of everything today operates in total secrecy. The Abu Ghraib's[cccxxxvii] and Guantanamo Bays[cccxxxviii] are everywhere but as top secret clandestine CIA-black ops, they remain unreported, including extrajudicial black sites even on American soil.[cccxxxix] Since at last count three years ago the US has supported fascists, druglords and terrorists in 35 countries,[cccxl] we know that number must be considerably higher now. Extrajudicial assassination by US killer drones of civilians both American and foreign are also perpetrated regularly under the public radar.[cccxli] Colonia Dignidad again is just another tip of another shameful Empire iceberg. Secret societies and shadow governments operate with near total impunity as they always have.

In absentia in 2004 with Schaefer still at large, he was tried, convicted and sentenced to 20 years in a Chilean prison.

According to Chilean journalist Hans Strange, who conducted an exhaustive investigation of the case:

> It was known since 1964 that the members of the commune were being subjected to torture; it was known since 1977 that political prisoners were tortured; and the child abuse was known about since the 1970's.[cccxlii]

Similar to Mexico's Father Maciel case covered in chapter seven, after more than six decades as a practicing pedophile with no real consequence, Schaefer spent the last five years of his life incarcerated prior to his 2010 death at the ripe old age of 89. For nearly four decades the child rapist and his Gestapo henchmen were allowed to abuse thousands of children and adults in Chile, murdering at least 100 victims before the concentration camp was ultimately "liberated" and shut down.[cccxliii] The largest weapons arsenal ever found in private hands in Chile's history was discovered at the Colonia, serving as yet more confirmation that Schaefer was subsidized by the Santiago government and supported by the US, Germany and Israel.[cccxliv] Strangely enough, after a quick name change and makeover, Villa Baviera was reopened and still operates today as both an agricultural community as well as a bizarre tourist attraction. A 2015 film entitled “The Colony” starring Emily Watson featured Colonia Dignidad’s dark and shameful story,[cccxlv] only made possible by Maltese support from four governments - Chile, the US, Germany and Israel.

Earlier this year a power struggle was won by Pope Francis over the Malta Grand Master Matthew Festing, forcing his resignation and in turn tarnishing the Order’s reputation as a sovereign entity.[cccxlvi] Though on the surface the squabble was over condoms, symbolizing the conservative wing of the Church in conflict with the pope’s liberal stance of offering condoms for everyone in the Third World. At the behest of fellow traditionalist US Cardinal Burke,[cccxlvii] a close friend and ally to Trump’s just canned advisor Steve Bannon,[cccxlviii][cccxlix] last December Festing fired the Malta Grand Chancellor for distributing condoms in Africa and Myanmar.

The sacked chancellor appealed to the Vatican Secretary of State Cardinal Parolin who advised Francis to intervene, especially after Festing told the Vatican and pope that the chancellor matter was an internal affair to be handled by his own sovereign Order, in so many words, to back off. Pope Francis promptly reinstated the chancellor and ousted the Festing instead, only the fourth time in a near millennium a Grand Master for life has been terminated and the first since 1799.[cccl] Matthew Festing forgot that his Order takes orders from his boss the pope. In April the Malta Order council selected the same Italian for a second time as lieutenant to the Grand Master to assume temporary one-year command over the internally disordered Order prior to choosing the next Grand Master.[cccli] For nearly three decades the Knights of Malta have been ruled by two Grand Pubahs hailing from England.[ccclii] The first, Andrew Bertie, serving from 1988 till his 2008 death, as a cousin of Queen Elizabeth, is a testimonial to the queen's influence over both the Maltese Order and her 53 nation Commonwealth that is one fifth of the earth's total land-mass.[cccliii]

Speculation abounds turning this recent showdown reflecting internal conflict within the Catholic Church as more than just liberal vs. traditional factions vying for upper hand power, maintaining that a much deeper schism has engulfed the Church against an array of challengers competing for New World Order power. One argument insists that the Malta Order representing the Khazarian mafia's old wealth was recently caught in New York attempting to grab control over the global financial system[cccliv] (which last time I checked, they already own) while another theory postulates that Trump and the Maltese are Freemasons in an open insurrection opposing the globalist Jesuit pope backed by his Rothschild-Clinton-Bush-Soros-deep state minions.[ccclv] But the popular pope is the front man for virtually all the NWO globalists and their secret societies, all pushing aggressively for the same long plotted one world religion,[ccclvi] one world economy and one world government[ccclvii] as the orchestrated "fix" to all of today's most pressing problems like the global warming/climate change hoax.[ccclviii] It appears more likely to be yet more sleight of hand subterfuge designed to cover up the criminality of their breadcrumb laden trail.

The next chapter addresses yet another secret Catholic military order that perhaps is the Vatican's most powerfully dangerous and treacherous creation of all – the benign sounding Society of Jesus, better known as the Jesuit Order and feared as the pope's secret intelligence service and army of assassins.

Pedophilia & Empire: Satan, Sodomy, & The Deep State

Chapter 6: The Jesuits as the Vatican's Order of Assassins

Chapter 6: The Jesuits as the Vatican’s Order of Assassins

Prior to examining the next chapter addressing the pope and Vatican roles in their Roman Catholic hierarchical stake in Satan’s rule over the earth and the NWO’s worldwide operation pedophilia, much has been made of the Jesuit Order controlling Pope Francis as the first Jesuit pope.[i] The Jesuit black pope[ii] and his legions in the Jesuit Order are said to control the “white” pope, the Knights of Malta, Opus Dei, Knights of Columbus and the dozens of other secret societies including the CIA, Freemasons, the Illuminati and their satanic family bloodlines. The devil’s earthly pecking order starts with Lucifer (translated “the light-bearer”)[iii] who became Satan the fallen angel, and all of Satan’s demonic, other worldly, interdimensional forces deceitfully deployed as both anti-God and anti-human WMD’s. Summoning dark demonic supernatural forces through black occult rituals dating back to the birth of Cabala in Babylon during the 6th century BC are still being used today for world domination by Satan’s devoted puppets, a handful of powerful sub-humanoid creatures David Icke and many others maintain are descendants of reptilian ET hybrids.[iv]

A most divisive, pervasive online debate pits as the power pyramid kingpins the Jesuit Order[v] vs. Jews[vi] represented collectively by the likes of R & R [Rothschild and Rockefeller] bankers, six mass media propaganda moguls,[vii] and anti-Semitic police and briber-blackmailers like AIPAC, B'nai B'rith and ADL, and Netanyahu and his transnational Zionist club of Greater Israel all making it a crime to speak the truth,[viii] in a pointless exercise of one-upmanship in blame game demonization. These two groups of villainous control freaks – the most powerful Jews and Jesuits - are both running this world as one and the same entity. Under their unifying umbrella Satanism, Satanists deceptively wear various brand name labels, very few being out-of-closet Satanists.

A fact based history of the Jesuit Order shows that the 16th century founders were Crypto Sephardic Jews who were Illuminati disciples in Spain calling themselves the Alumbrados, whose Talmudic cabalistic occult beliefs elevate men “enlightened” by secret knowledge to earthly god status.[ix] The Luciferian worshippers known as the Alumbrados were outlawed in Spain,[x] and one of their soldiers crippled in battle for life, one Ignatius of Loyola during the Inquisition while healing from his war wound decided to reinvent himself and his satanic beliefs, infiltrating Catholicism and proclaiming himself the first Jesuit supreme general in Jesus’s [or more aptly Satan’s] army he named the Society of Jesus, not unlike the greedy private central banksters deceptively calling themselves the US federal reserve early in the last century.[xi] Declaring war on Protestant Reformation, the Catholic Church backed his Counter Reformation military order for “Jesus.”

Sitting atop this demonic human predator food chain is an interbred Roman papal bloodline system operating under the Synagogue of Satan that goes by a host of names - the Jesuits, the Malta Knights, the Illuminati, the royal Windsors and Black Nobility, the Freemasons, the Skull and Bones, the Council on Foreign Relations, the Committee of 300, the Club of Rome, the Trilateral Commission, the Pilgrim Society, Bilderbergers, the Bohemian Grove child sacrifice on-the-altar boys, the list can go on and on. But bottom line, as the planetary controllers, ultimately they all do the bidding of their demonic god Lucifer. The Jesuit general as the black pope and his Jesuit Order work together with the current now Jesuit white pope, the Vatican, ancient Illuminati family bloodlines,[xii] and all the above listed secret elitist societies that include as their puppets the CIA, global intelligence community and virtually every government and military on earth. For centuries this handful of Satanists have been enslaving humanity in perpetual war, racial, religious and class divide, economic hardship and depravation in order to maintain its status quo power and control through mass deception and divide and conquer manipulation.[xiii] The big three religions were invented as a divide and conquer device to ensure control over the masses.[xiv]

This chapter lifts the veil of the Jesuit Order or Society of Jesus founded in 1534 by crypto-Jew Ignatius of Loyola (1491-1556), whose society was recognized by the pope in 1540.[xv] Within a year after Ignatius' 1491 birth, Jews were legally expelled from Spain. Ignatius grew up during the bloody Inquisition (1478-1834) when up to 68 million victims lost their lives in the name of God, and even more were tortured and imprisoned.[xvi] Born into this trauma when over half the Iberian Jewish population was forced to leave, die or convert, roughly 50,000 Jews elected baptism to remain in Spain as Roman Catholic converts known as conversos to avoid further persecution and death.[xvii] If Christians were killing Jews because they were Jews, to avoid death many converted. But how sincere would be their devotion and commitment to a religion whose violent adherents were busily killing off fellow Jews? Not very. But the Inquisition and pure blood laws in Europe specifically targeted Jewish converts deemed less than 100% faithful to Christianity, which had to be nearly all.

As a young man prior to becoming the first official Jesuit superior general, Ignatius had been a member of Spain's Illuminati Luciferian branch - the Alumbrados that preached that humans are capable of becoming divine gods in both wisdom and power through disciplined pursuit and practice of secret occult knowledge.[xviii] Initially during the first three decades of his Jesuit Order, Ignatius openly welcomed his fellow crypto-Jewry into his secret militant Catholic fold.[xix] As a successful and ambitious merchant and banking class, seeking freedom from persecution, many Marranos families (crypto Jewish converts in Spain) infiltrated Christian gentile society by strategically interbreeding with European nobility and, like Ignatius, also rising to stardom through the Catholic Church hierarchy. Over the millennium numerous popes, kings and queens in Europe have been and still are crypto Jews.[xx]

Ignatius was born and lived his entire life during the dark and dangerous Spanish Inquisition. Up to a million Muslim Moors (Moriscos) and 200,000 Jews (Marranos) in Spain converted to Catholicism under centuries of blood purity laws and mob violence barbarity.[xxi] Suspected of secretly retaining their original faiths, whether they were or weren't, many became victims of yet more brutal persecution. Spain hurt itself inducing a brain drain of 800,000 Jews who fled the anti-Semitic nation during the Inquisition. In 2012, the Madrid government attempted to make amends by offering Spanish citizenship to those whose Jewish Sephardic ancestors had left.[xxii] However, this free entry back into Spain centuries later was not extended to the hundreds of thousands of Islamic Moors who also escaped for their life and understandably Muslims have demanded reciprocity.

A sizeable percentage of crypto-Jewry in Europe must have developed an intense, seething hatred towards their Christian executioners issuing wave after wave of purging pogroms, murdering and imprisoning millions of Jews, Muslims and Protestants, eventually banning all non-Christians. Thus engrained early in Ignatius' psyche, he ultimately sought ways to survive by adopting a chameleon-like appearance, showing one side outwardly as a wise and benign spiritual leader that inwardly concealed another far sinister darker side entirely. Thus through tactics of deception, infiltration and unrelenting subversion, Jesuits were trained to gain the upper hand that eventually would lead to victory and opportunity for revenge and retribution against all enemies, be they Christian oppressors or loathsome Protestant or Muslim infidels. In this way, despite setbacks, the Jesuits persevered, gradually infiltrating and overtaking the Catholic Church.[xxiii]

Forming a Catholic society that superficially espouses the love of Jesus proved an effective ticket for Ignatius' worldly power ascension. In order to avoid risk of prejudice, Jewish Jesuit founders Ignatius and Francis Borgia took a hardline stance against fellow Jews using an attack dog approach. In 1593 the Order issued a law prohibiting Jews from entering the Society of Jesus, and removed those Jesuits already members that hadn't yet completed their final vow.[xxiv] But after 30 years of open enrollment, many crypto Jews that had attained their final fourth vow remained. To save themselves, their M.O. was to viciously turn on their own kind at least publicly. Surviving the Inquisition spawned the no-brainer rationale of sacrificing a few of your own to save your own skin. Secretly they would spend years plotting revenge to both perceived and real enemies, be they "fellow" Catholic oppressors, or Protestant, Jewish or Muslim infidels. Loyalty and expedience demanded a capacity to cunningly, fluidly change colors, living by the credo that ends always justify the means.[xxv] In their violently twisted world, personal safety and security could only be achieved through subversively gaining unlimited godlike power and control on earth, fanatical, disciplined application of the mindset "kill or be killed," and freedom from oppression and ruin could best be earned through assuming the role of oppressor-killer as secret benefactors of Luciferian wisdom and devotees of crypto-Satanism.

Some scholars contend that the Society of Jesus evolved directly from the defunct Templar Order (recall that they too were founded by cabbalistic crypto-Jews). After being disbanded by the pope two centuries earlier, a number of Templar Knights in Spain were absorbed into two Spanish military orders, that of Calatrava and the still active Order of Montesa,[xxvi] eventually emerging in 1541 as the Jesuit Order co-founded by St. Francis Borgia, the third Jesuit "black pope," and great grandson of Spain's King Ferdinand II of Aragon on his mother's side and great grandson of Borgia white Pope Alexander VI.[xxvii] The Borgias have long been a powerful Illuminati papal family of mixed Spanish-Jewish bloodline.[xxviii] The militantly extremist, subversive nature of the Jesuit Order quickly became its trademark, explicitly laid down by the founder's cunning, wolf-in-sheep's-clothing represented by Ignatius' unethical instruction below:

> Nor will it contribute a little to our advantage, if, with caution and secrecy, we foment and heighten the animosities that arise among princes and great men, even to such a degree that they may weaken each other. But if there appear any likelihood of reconciliation, then as soon as possible let us endeavor to be the mediators, lest others prevent us.
> Finally, Let all with such artfulness gain the ascendant over princes, noblemen, and the magistrates of every place, that they may be ready at our beck, even to sacrifice their nearest relations and most intimate friends, when we say it is for our interest and advantage.[xxix]

Devoted Catholics "in the know"quickly explain the letters IHS in the Jesuit logo as simply meaning Jesus in shorthand originating from the Greek letters "iota", "eta" and "sigma." Others who examine deeper equate Catholicism as a dark sinister offshoot of Babylonian and Egyptian paganism, and to them the IHS stands for the Egyptian deity triad of Isis (female protector representing the well-endowed black magick power of the eldest daughter of the most ancient Egyptian god Saturn), Horus (the son of Isis symbolizing god of the sky, kings, power and wisdom) and Set (god of the desert, disorder, war, often represented by Lucifer; killer of Isis' husband Osiris, uncle to Horus whom he battled and lost his Egyptian kingdom) derived from the same pagan Egyptian deities also worshipped by the Luciferian Templars and Freemasons.[xxx] Like the Illuminati, Freemasons, the Templars and the Malta Knights, the Jesuits are steeped in black arts and all of these secret societies worship under the same demonic false god within their Synagogue of Satan.

To reach the "professed" status of a fully ordained Jesuit priest having taken the Fourth [and final] Vow (beyond the Jesuit brother as temporal coadjutor), literally decades of additional study and prayer are required. Education [i.e., propaganda] was and is the prime component to the Jesuit mission designed as the Catholic Church's potent answer to the Protestant Reformation movement sweeping through Europe, diminishing the Church of Rome's authoritarian power. And within a century after the pope endorsed the Jesuit Order, by 1640 over 500 Jesuit institutions of higher learning were already established.[xxxi] Jesuit schools and universities have continued proliferating throughout Europe, America and the entire world indoctrinating 3 million Jesuit students worldwide. Over the centuries the Jesuit Modus Operandi has been infiltration and control of worldly affairs through spying, blackmail, assassination, and covert military black ops and intelligence operations.[xxxii]

The cunning nature of Ignatius taught his army of Jesuit priests to gain the upper hand and confidence of nobility for confessions, using acquired vital information to their advantage. Jesuits would manipulate their followers into having their sins absolved by banishing all Protestants as heretics.[xxxiii] They became masters at pitting groups against another and placing themselves as needed arbiters. Their skillfully aggressive tactics toward a pliable population quickly paid off. Initially during its first century the popular new Order's ranks swelled so that by 1710 they were 19,000 strong. By 1749 there were 22,000 Jesuits.[xxxiv]

But also by mid-century, the Jesuits' ruthless, contentious power grab and constant infiltrating, undermining and stirring up conflicts had kingdoms and governments alike banning the Order altogether, starting in Portugal in 1759, France following in 1764, Spain, and even Sicily and Naples by 1767, Austria by 1774 and Russia in 1786.[xxxv] With the Society of Jesus outlawed virtually everywhere but Rome, the anti-Jesuit domino effect forced the notorious Jesuit assassins to retreat and align with more tolerant Protestant Britain and Prussia since southern Europe and its New World colonies had all had enough of Jesuit troublemaking.[xxxvi] The Illuminati Hapsburg-Jesuit control over Europe was finally waning with the 18th century Bourbon reemergence, particularly in Spain under King Carlos III who took a strong moral stand against both the barbaric Inquisition and the treacherous Jesuits.

Jesuits in Spain and Portugal's New World colonies of Latin America were accused of fomenting insurrection, stealing both wealth and land from the crown,[xxxvii] providing ample additional motivation to abolish the Society of Jesus. The subversive Order was never a welcomed presence in the United States either. Other than Britain, over the centuries virtually every European country banished the malevolent Jesuits one time or another. From 1555 to 1931 a count of 83 nations, city-states and cities expelled the Jesuits.[xxxviii]

So much mounting pressure was on the Vatican to do something to stop the aggressive Jesuit usurper, in February 1769 Pope Clement XIII (1693-1769) was set to dissolve the Jesuit Order but fell ill the night before and died, his final words, “I am dying… it is very strange to attack the Jesuits.”[xxxix] Then incredibly, his successor Pope Clement XIV (1705-1774) by papal bull ended the Jesuit Order in 1773. But a mere year later his last words on his deathbed were:

> Alas, I knew they [i.e., the Jesuits] would poison me; but I did not expect to die in so slow and cruel a manner.[xl]

With the pope legally shutting down the Jesuit operations worldwide, as a sneaky alternative means continuing the Jesuit mission of world takeover, three years later and two months prior to America’s Declaration of Independence in 1776, yet another crypto Jew, Jesuit trained Adam Weishaupt secured Rothschild financing to found their new Bavarian branch of Illuminati. Author of The Secret Terrorists and the Enemy Unmasked Bill Hughes explains yet another application of how the Jesuits infiltrate likeminded secret societies:

> Weishaupt established the [modern version of the] Illuminati specifically to be a front organization behind which the Jesuits could hide. After being [formally] abolished by [Pope] Clement XIV in 1773, the Jesuits used the Illuminati and other organizations to carry out their operations. Thus, the front organizations would be blamed for the trouble caused by the Jesuits.[xli]

Two years later the Vatican in an Edict of 1778 declared war on the US constitutional republic, calling America an abomination of sin that must be destroyed by any means possible.[xlii] The Jesuits’ extreme reputation advocating violent overthrow and cutthroat treachery had worn thin in both Europe and America. Shunned virtually everywhere, the Jesuits were forced to secretly align with Freemasons in Prussia and Britain.

Meanwhile, joining a growing consensus, Emperor Napoleon Bonaparte (1769-1821) recognized the Jesuits for what they were:

The Jesuits are a military organization, not a religious order. Their chief is a general of an army, not the mere father abbot of a monastery. And the aim of this organization is: POWER. Power in its most despotic exercise. Absolute power, universal power, power to control the world by the volition of a single man. Jesuitism is the most absolute of despotisms: and at the same time the greatest and most enormous of abuses.[xliii]

But as soon as Napoleon was defeated in 1814, the imprisoned Pope Pius VII upon his release promptly restored the Jesuit Society. Reacting to the news, in 1816 former President John Adams (1735-1826) wrote his friend Thomas Jefferson stating:

Their restoration is indeed a step toward darkness, cruelty, perfidy, despotism, death . . . I do not like the appearance of the Jesuits. If ever there was a body of men who merited eternal damnation on earth and in hell, it is this Society of Loyola's.[xliv]

US Revolutionary War ally French General Marques de Lafayette (1757-1834) saw the writing on the wall about the Jesuits:

It is my opinion that if the liberties of this country - the United States of America - are destroyed, it will be by the subtlety of the Roman Catholic Jesuit priests, for they are the most crafty, dangerous enemies to civil and religious liberty. They have instigated MOST of the wars of Europe.[xlv]

The Jesuit forte has always been infiltration and revenge, dating back to the collusion between Pope Clement V and France's King Philip to abolish the Templar Order in 1312. The ideological affinity for Gnosticism and the occult that the Jesuits[xlvi] hold in common with the Templars originated in their own traceable roots linked to the enduring Templar influence.[xlvii] The Jesuits inherited the Templar rivalry against the Malta Knights that also played a hand in the demise of the Temple Order. So the revengeful motive to subordinate the Maltese was inherently built in. Then later in 1773 when another round of suppression issued by Pope Clement XIV was enforced in most of Europe dissolving the Jesuit Order, revenge toward Clement came in the form of the poison cup.[xlviii] The Society of Jesus made secret deals with Protestants in England in order to survive the continent's widespread Jesuit ban[xlix] and eventually the Jesuits seized control of the Vatican once England defeated Napoleon in 1814 and ever since they've never relinquished their unequalled power in Rome but only extended it across the globe.[l]

Less than a half century later another war to instigate and exploit came along. During the American Civil War the pro-Jesuit pope in power - Pope Pius IX - along with Rothschild bankers strongly supported the South in its secession fight against the North, writing a letter to Jefferson Davis designed to incite rebellion amongst Catholic northerners to join the Confederate cause against Lincoln in another holy war.[li] The Catholic Church had always profited from and subsidized the slavery trade and the Jesuit Order historically opposed liberty movements using its divide and conquer method to destabilize sovereign governments in Mexico, Spain and France. In its effort to break apart the American Republic, the Vatican had propagated lies that President Lincoln was born a Catholic, had been baptized by a priest, and become a demonized heretic and apostate that by canon law should be killed. And because murder endorsed by the pope who literally called himself infallible was not considered a sinful crime at all, the Vatican clearly intended to inspire a fanatical Catholic assassin to kill for God, not unlike the Crusades. In fact, Jesuit assassins had plotted an ambush of Lincoln in Baltimore, but privy to the plot, the president foiled their plan traveling hours ahead of his original schedule.

As an Illinois attorney in 1853, Abe Lincoln represented a priest named Charles Chiniquy in Urbana, Illinois who had dared to confront the Jesuit archbishop of Chicago's corruption and criminal activity. A conspiracy of slander to frame and destroy Chiniquy was promoted by an unscrupulous Jesuit priest but Lincoln, with the help of a last minute witness, was able to successfully expose the nefarious plot.[lii] Charles Chiniquy left the Catholic Church, ended up Lincoln's confidante and advisor on the subsequent threat of the Jesuits' violent retribution, and ended up writing the exposé Fifty Years in the Church of Rome where he presents an irrefutable case that the Jesuits were responsible for assassinating Lincoln using their fanatical Catholic patsy John Wilkes Booth to do their bidding.[liii] Chiniquy passionately warned Lincoln in person that Jesuit conspirators were determined to take him out, reminding the president of a number of other previous historical assassinations - the two Pope Clements, Admiral Coligny, Henry III, Henry IV and William of Taciturn, all committed by Jesuits.[liv] Two more victims of the Jesuit assassins were back to back Russian czars Alexander I and II during the 19th century for expelling the Society of Jesus from Russia. During the Civil War, Alexander II also supported President Lincoln and the United States, directly opposing the Jesuits, England and France's efforts to divide America.[lv]

Lincoln co-conspirators Mary Surratt and her Jesuit son John Surratt[lvi] had a couple priests living in Mary's DC residence holding regular meetings amongst Catholic clergy up to ten in the home, confirming a direct link to the Jesuit Order and the Vatican. It turned out that every arrested assassination conspirator was Catholic. John Harrison Surratt managed to escape to a Montreal where two Catholic priests took him in and with others arranged his transport to Europe under false identity where Surratt enlisted as a Papal Zouave, the pope's own infantry force from 1861-1870 to defend the Papal States in military resistance to a unified Italy.[lvii] Surratt was arrested in his Zouave uniform in Egypt and sent back to the US to face trial for both murder and conspiracy to kidnap Lincoln, resulting in a hung jury. He was then retried for engaging in rebellion but the case was mysteriously dropped.[lviii] Despite overwhelming evidence of Surratt's guilt, more than likely the Jesuit controlled Vatican interceded to protect him from punishment, unlike his mother and three other accomplices who after a military tribunal were swiftly hung within three months after Lincoln was shot.[lix] In contrast, John Surratt's civilian trial released him as a free man able to live out his life until his natural death in 1916 at the ripe age of 72.

Additionally, in a recovered letter from 1864 John Wilkes Booth wrote to another conspirator less than a year before Lincoln's death words that eerily resemble the Extreme Jesuit Oath (which almost word for word is the exact same blood sworn oath taken by Knights of Malta and Knights of Columbus) prescribing specific weapons used to subdue their enemies, "the poisoned cup, the strangulating cord, the steel of the poniard or the leaden bullet."[lx] Booth's letter makes reference to "the [poisoned] cup failed us once and might again," indicating one past failed attempt (besides the Baltimore incident) to kill the president. Moreover, one of the conspirators was a pharmacist very familiar with "poisoned cup" potions. Also while Booth attended Abe's second inauguration, he carried and planned to use a knife ("poniard") for murder but ultimately settled a few months later on a .44 caliber "leaden bullet."[lxi]

Over one stretch in time, from 1841 to 1865, the Jesuits were successful in assassinating three out of four US presidents in Benjamin Harrison, Zachary Taylor, James Buchanan (all through poisoning) and Abraham Lincoln with only Buchanan surviving.[lxii] Tired of losing its leaders to Catholic assassins, the US government broke off relations with the Vatican in 1867. In all up to seven presidents have likely been murdered by Jesuit-Illuminati henchmen.[lxiii] Andrew Jackson was fortunate enough to have an assassin's gun jam and defeated the Rothschild central banking scheme that Harrison, Taylor, Buchanan and Lincoln also resisted but each but one paid for it with their life. Lincoln refused to pay for war with banksters' loans and came up with Treasury printed Greenbacks as his novel solution and Kennedy set in motion a plan to strip the Federal Reserve of the power to supply money returning it back to the US Treasury Department, and both were likely killed for it.[lxiv]

After refusing to provide air support in the Cuban Bay of Pigs disaster, John Kennedy then further pissed off the military industrial complex recalling advisors from Vietnam that would have averted war in Southeast Asia.[lxv] Then he signed his own death warrant firing his evil CIA Director Allen Dulles[lxvi] and was preparing to overhaul the CIA.[lxvii] And Kennedy's plan to clip the Feds' wings threatened the Rothschild-Rockefeller-Morgan private central banks was three strikes and he's out. Prior to his murder, JFK spoke of the monolithic shadow government commonly referred to today as deep state. Knowing their history, President Kennedy was likely talking foremost about the Jesuits as well as the Malta Order, the Masons, the CIA and the bloodline bankers when he stated:

For we are opposed around the world by a monolithic and ruthless conspiracy that relies primarily on covert means for expanding its sphere of influence - on infiltration instead of invasion - on subversion instead of elections - on intimidation instead of free choice - on guerrillas by night instead of armies by day. It is a system which has conscripted vast human and material resources into the building of a tightly-knit, highly efficient machine that combines military, diplomatic, intelligence, economic, scientific and political operations. Its preparations are concealed not published. Its mistakes are buried, not headlined. Its dissenters are silenced, not praised. No expenditure is questioned, no rumor is printed, no secret is revealed.[lxviii]

The link between the central banking system, the Jesuits and assassinations aren't just limited to killing presidents. Evidence indicates that the Jesuits sank the Titanic to eliminate formidable competition openly opposing their agenda of a Federal Reserve System and their preplanned world war.[lxix] It's been documented that the British Jesuit Provintial met with and ordered the ship captain, a Jesuit temporal co-adjutor, to purposely sink the ship. After building the Titanic, Jesuit JP Morgan invited the three most important, powerful adversaries on the ship's 1912 maiden voyage across the Atlantic - Benjamin Guggenheim, Isador Strauss (Macy Department stores) and John Jacob Astor, the wealthiest man in the world.[lxx] At the last minute JP canceled and all three of his guests perished along with 1520 other murdered victims. The Federal Reserve Act of 1913 moved forward unencumbered by opposition while the bulk of Congress had already left for the Christmas break and the Jesuit elite enslaved America.[lxxi] The Federal Income Tax also passed that year was more globalist gravy theft. According to plan, less than a year later World War I was triggered.

This wholesale slaughter of human beings using cloak and dagger subversion has been repeatedly perpetrated on the world stage as both Jesuit oath honored tradition and historical fact diabolically right up to this present day. Fast forward over a half century later to former Jesuit priest Alberto Rivera's (1935-1997) observations:

The higher I went in the Jesuit Order, the more corruption I saw within the institution. I was invited to attend a secret black mass by high-ranking Jesuits [including Superior General Pedro Arrupe] in a monastery in the northern part of Spain. When I knelt to kiss the ring of a high official, I saw a symbol on that ring that made my blood run cold. It was a Masonic symbol [the compass and the square]! A thing I hated and I had been told to fight against it . . . I found out the Jesuit General was also a Mason and a member of the Communist Party in Spain.[lxxii]

Spaniard Alberto Rivera converted to Protestant Christianity by the late 1970's and for the rest of his life bravely went public exposing the sinister Jesuit agenda to rule the world through infiltration, systematically crushing any and all resistance by any and all means necessary.[lxxiii] After one "poisoned cup" attempt to permanently silence nearly killed him, four years later the assassins from Jesuit hell neutralized another poisoned cup fatality at age 61 for daring to reveal the full satanic lowdown on the Jesuit and Catholic criminal organizations.[lxxiv]

Meanwhile ex-Catholic Bishop Canadian Gerard Bouffard took up the truth gauntlet where Rivera left off, also confirming that the Jesuits and Vatican are Luciferian NWO rulers of this world. [lxxv] The former bishop who was the communication liaison between the pope and the Rome Jesuits stated that the infamous Jesuit superior general otherwise known as the black pope is actually the white pope's puppet master and that white Pope Francis controls the Illuminati. As of last October for the first time in history the black pope and white pope are both Jesuits, also for the first time are both from South America. Venezuela’s Arturo Sosa Abascal replaced Adolfo Nicolás Pachón as Pope Francis’ secret boss.[lxxvi] The Vatican secretly plays the good cop-bad cop game - while the “white pope” publicly prays for world peace, behind the scenes the “black pope” is busily inciting and exporting more war, conflict and terrorism to every corner of the globe.

As a Vatican insider, former Bishop Boussard corroborates the mounting evidence diligently compiled by both researchers and observant men throughout history that conclude that hidden in plain sight behind their benign “godly” robes are the most despicably dark and vile planetary controllers that have ever walked this earth. The now born again Christian Broussard maintains that having already infiltrated virtually all religions and governments, the Jesuit Order’s main objective is now controlling world leaders in order to foment global conflict into world war destruction to finish off the United States, the Middle East, Israel, Christianity, Islam and Judaism with most of the world, clearing Satan’s path toward totalitarian tyranny of one world government. In Gerard Boussard’s own words:

People can't imagine how evil and how much destruction they have caused and will cause while, at the same time using the perfect cover of hiding behind black robes and professing to be men of God… I know firsthand that the Vatican controls and monitors everything in Israel with the intention of destroying the Jews… They destroy everything from within and want to bring about the destruction of the Catholic Church, as well, in order to usher in a one world religion based on Satanism. This is also seen in the way priests worship in the Mass, actually worshipping the dead. Also, signs of Satanism are seen in many outward symbols, customs and vestments displayed by the Church.[lxxvii]

The Jesuit Order has been forced to pay off enormous amounts in lawsuits awarded child abuse victims at its many schools. A half decade ago in the Northwest and Alaska a huge settlement of $166.1 million was reached to compensate over 400 sexually molested Native Americans, the third highest settlement in Church history.[lxxviii] Only two Southern California Archdioceses had to pay out more, $660 million to 508 victims in LA and $200 million to 144 victims in San Diego.[lxxix] And like all the Catholic abuse charges, protection of Jesuit priests by Jesuit higher-ups over the well-being of more child victims seems standard policy. Case in point, Donald McGuire who when parents reported to another well-known priest in San Francisco that McGuire had abused their 16-year old son, the Chicago Jesuit authorities sent the pedophile through a brief psychiatric hospitalization program before sending him back to prey on other children for the next nine years.[lxxx] Though ever typical, this reprehensible non-response actually violated California state law requiring those who work with children to be mandated reporters of sexual abuse of minors to law enforcement. Eventually McGuire was convicted in federal court of sexually assaulting two boys and is now serving a 25-year prison sentence.

Similar to the Order of Malta Knights with its charity hospital work around the world, the Jesuit website advertises such holy platitudes like “we seek to ‘find God in all things,’” dedicating “ourselves to the [Ignatius coined phrase] ‘greater glory of God’ and the good of all humanity.”[lxxxi] And with 16,378 current members listed as of 2016, today the Jesuit Order is the largest Catholic male religious order.[lxxxii] Though its peak membership in 1977 of over 28,000 followers has fallen dramatically in recent decades, its seemingly invisible power has only strengthened.

From the 1534 outset, Ignatius of Loyola emphasized indoctrinated education and propaganda as a key strategy to expanding growth and spreading power internationally. The proof of his successful strategy is embodied in the 28 American Jesuit colleges and universities that have become a primary drafting pool for high powered government posts and offices.[lxxxiii] The widespread Jesuit education tentacles extend to 189 institutions of higher learning in 40 countries and another 362 secondary schools in 55 nations dispersed around the world.[lxxxiv]

As a sign of increasing Jesuit power in the 21st century, a subversive invasion by Jesuits into Washington's deep state oligarchy has creeped into focus. The astounding number of US presidents, vice presidents, congressional members (now comprising over 10% of today's 115th Congress),[lxxxv] high court judges and key cabinet heads who are graduates of Jesuit institutions is incredible.[lxxxvi] Jesuit trained and educated Donald Trump attended the Jesuit Fordham University for two years prior to transferring to Ivy League University of Pennsylvania.[lxxxvii] For near half a millennium now the Jesuits have shrewdly been operating schools that educate the ruling class elite. So within that historical context, no real surprise here.

Though in American history only two Catholics served as either president or vice president - Malta member JFK[lxxxviii] and child fondling dirty old Maltese man Joe Biden,[lxxxix] in contrast, just in the last decade alone, the US Supreme Court has undergone a monumental radical shift from a virtual all Protestant court near the turn of this century[xc] to now a Catholic majority with an Opus Dei implant sitting atop as Chief Justice John Roberts along with Opus Clarence Thomas with another third now Jewish. Cutting a secret deal with Pope John Paul II in an overreaching ploy to break up the Soviet Empire in 1980, after 113 years Malta Knight Ronald Reagan reestablished diplomatic relations with the Vatican as the first American president to purposely surround himself with obedient pope-serving Maltese vassals.[xci]

A parallel course this century has similarly unfolded in the top US military ranks with two back-to-back Chairmen of the Joint Chiefs of Staff devout papal-obedient Irish Catholics. Martin Dempsey is a Malta Knight[xcii] and his successor General Joseph Dunford attended Catholic high school and colleges at St. Michael’s College as an undergrad and the top Jesuit institution Georgetown for his graduate study.[xciii] None of this is a random fluke. Deep Jesuit state infiltration in Washington over just the last few years should be a major eye-opening Luciferian NWO wake-up call. And the correlational pedophilia pandemic led by the Synagogue of Satan Catholic Church wielding complete blackmail puppet control is also no accident.

Infiltration of governments and militaries of the world is but one effective Jesuit strategy seizing global control. Owning the controlling shares to the Bank of America as the 2nd largest US bank and a large stakeholder in Wells Fargo the 3rd largest is another.[xciv] At one time the pope owned three large American banks. [xcv] In fact the Catholic Church claims ownership of the Western world from Europe to the Americas.[xcvi] Just as the Rothschild dynasty has been granted the title of guardians of the Vatican Treasury[xcvii] with an unprecedented earthly fortune amounting to half a quadrillion bucks[xcviii] (more than half of the earth’s entire wealth),[xcix] the Luciferian worshipping family[c] also bankrolls the world’s financial center, City of London’s Bank of England cabal and the Queen’s vast holdings.[ci] But rest assure the Jesuits have infiltrated the world’s wealthiest organizations owned by the world’s wealthiest families like the Rothschild, Morgan and Rockefeller families.[cii] Together they’ve been working overtime to undermine America’s Constitution to destroy our freedom, national sovereignty and America itself.

A short list of top Fortune 500 companies controlled by Jesuit interests include American Airlines, TWA, Anheuser Busch, AT&T, Bell Atlantic, Boeing, Cigna, Coca-Cola, Daimler Chrysler, Exxon, Ford Motor Company, General Electric, Hewlett-Packard, Home Depot, May Company, McDonald's, Motorola, Philip Morris, Price-Waterhouse, Rite Aid, RJR Nabisco, Sony Corp. of America, Texaco, United Parcel Service, and Walt Disney Company.[ciii] With all these corporations in the Jesuit back pocket pouring millions into politician coffers through legal bribery, Rome's Society of Jesus easily controls its Washington puppets. The Vatican owns billions of shares in huge transnationals like Gulf Oil, Shell, General Motors, Bethlehem Steel, General Electric, International Business Machines, and TWA. Keep in mind the Church of Rome's vast fortune is all tax free as well. When the Catholic hierarchy pretends to worship Jesus who shunned materialism and wealth while the Catholic Church itself is the biggest financial power on earth, in the face of the ever widening gulf separating the 1% rich and the 99% poor, the institution's moral depravity and hubris is grotesque and obscene.[civ]

A final word on secret societies bears mention here, be they official Catholic militia orders or non-Catholic organizations like the Masonic and Illuminati orders that are less obscure about worshipping their true "god" Lucifer. All have the same nefarious mission[cv] to deceptively infiltrate other religions, denominations, other secret societies, large businesses, government agencies (whether elected or appointed), militaries, think tanks, and educational institutions for the exact same common purpose - to increase their power in order to bring about one world government and one world "religion" (called Satanism) through global destabilization and destruction by way of military war,[cvi] manmade disease (i.e., biological[cvii] and/or chemical warfare[cviii]), climate change (manmade based on hoax[cix]), habitat loss,[cx] famine[cxi] and economic collapse.[cxii]

Media and governments warn these catastrophic problems and mounting threats are unavoidably real even though they're orchestrating by the numbers every one of these pending disasters. For countless decades they've been dogmatically pushing the Malthusian lie that the earth's resources cannot possibly sustain the current and future global populations[cxiii] and therefore the ruling elite covertly justifies its coldblooded policy of depopulation through a combination of both slow kill and fast kill methods.[cxiv] Thus, the planetary controllers have willfully and systematically degraded our natural environment to dangerously toxic levels that induce disease and illness as viable slow death eugenics.[cxv] This planned debilitation of humans' physical and mental health and well-being combined with 24/7 mind control programming through effects of mass media and propagandized public education have been misused to intentionally dumb down the global population[cxvi] so that citizens of the world are too stupid to figure out that we are all being targeted as casualties of war, a human genocidal war waged by a select handful of a sub-human species comprised of deranged psychopathic murderers who detest us so much that they want 90-95% of us on this planet dead sooner than later. Just last month Pope Francis called for an emergency meeting with world leaders on November 2-4 to discuss how they can accelerate their agenda to kill us.[cxvii] After all, their credo has always been the "ends justify the means," and their endgame scenario[cxviii] a thoroughly culled and controlled half billion pop of robotic slaves, so they're fiendishly working overtime in a race against time. They desperately fear that every single day more and more of us humans who still have functioning brains are figuring out, mostly through the internet, the elite's mass murdering agenda. The rulers are deathly afraid we will rise up, throwing off centuries of shackled chains and, as NWO devil incarnate George HW Bush once envisioned out loud, we "will chase [him and his fellow Satanists] down the street and lynch [them]."[cxix]

One final point seems relevant here. A century after the crypto-Jews established the Jesuit Order using infiltration, deception and subversion as their infamous modus operandi, recall that a couple more ambitious crypto Jews came along in the 17th and 18th centuries claiming similar cabalistic roots while ascending to fake messiah heights as the Sabbatean-Frankist movement flourished in Europe and Eurasia utilizing the exact same M.O. as its means to godlike power. The amalgamation of the Luciferians ruling the planet today represents a remnant of Sabbatean-Frankism along with the rest of the secret societies discussed. With the lowdown exposing the far-reaching evil possessed by so many of these pathological players, the next chapter deals with how as Satanists, the popes, the Vatican and their covert armies have all played a major criminal role in today's pedophilia epidemic that also oversees international trafficking of illegal drugs, weapons, human organs and children around the globe as spoils of their manufactured wars for both satanic bloodlust and trillions in profit. And as guilty as they all are as child rapists and killers, they're equally guilty of misusing their unbridled power to cover up with near total impunity their massive sins against both our innocents specifically as well as humanity at large.

A unifying theme of the pope, Vatican and secret societies like the Jesuit and Malta Orders is their despicable way they've all historically protected their child rapists within their corrupt satanically controlled church. Over the last quarter century the pedophilia scandal has exposed the evil of monumental proportions long embedded within the institution of Catholicism. And with still breaking headlines, the Church's pedophilia epidemic is a plague that the Catholic Church will never fully recover from. Pope Francis as history's last Catholic pope is busily ensuring that fated globalist outcome,[1] using every chance he gets to usher in his own brand of one world religion with him and it as the necessary "New Age" replacement for Christianity.[2] But neither he nor our world leaders can convince educated and informed citizens of the world that Satan doesn't rule over the whole lot of them. Bottom line - anyone who derives power from sodomizing and murdering defenseless little children is Satan incarnate.

Rather than get lost in all the morbid details of the over ten million individual reported cases of child rape committed by thousands if not millions of priests, bishops, cardinals and probable popes, a singular focus on one particularly disturbing case bears witness to elucidating how the pope and Vatican have typically dealt with pedophilia amongst their own clergy.[3] The infamous case of Marcial Maciel Degollado (1920-2008) vividly illustrates how those in power have willfully covered up and succumbed to $atan's values and not God's,[4] permitting the sins of one charismatic long known pedophile in their midst who happened to be the most successful fundraiser in Catholic Church history.[5] The founding priest of the wealthily widow-endowed Catholic order - Legionaries for Christ - was a Roman Catholic hustler from Mexico who for over half a century led a secret, perversely dark double life.

Father Maciel the gentle, benevolent, "devoutly" religious, "all-wise" man is said to have sexually preyed upon anywhere from 20-100 children (though no doubt plenty more) over the course of his lengthy Catholic career. After abusing children decade after decade, at age 56, Maciel told a 19-year old woman he wanted to settle down and raise a family with her, and ended up fathering three sons (two biological), the two older ones unspared as future rape victims.[6] Outside his secret family, Maciel also sired a daughter who later surfaced as an adult. His young surrogate wife was totally gullible and believed her imposter husband when he said he had to be called away on assignment working for the CIA, regularly leaving his family behind to greedily tend to his booming biz as a Catholic con man pedophile. His 1941 founded movement began swelling in wealth due to his predatorily targeting rich widows like the wives of a former Venezuelan president and Mexican industrialist, reaching a net worth at its zenith in 2004 of a whopping $650 million.[7] [8]

Eventually in 1990 his 70-year old perverted life still ascending its meteoric climb within the greedy Catholic Church suddenly became a lot more complicated when his victim accusers began emerging. By 1997 nine of his abuse victims - most of whom Maciel's seminary students back in Mexico - had gone public.[9] The first to start making waves was a young boy from his seminary who grew into a conflicted adult priest compelled to come forth to try and stop the out of control predator. Only the Vatican and Pope

John Paul II seeing only dollar signs wouldn't listen or respond. Even four years after public allegations had been lodged against Maciel, Pope John Paul was still raving how the pedophile was "an efficacious guide to youth."[10] For many years while in charge of investigating pedophilia in the church during John Paul's watch, Cardinal Ratzinger knew Maciel was still raping children but continued publicly lauding history's biggest church moneymaker.[11] Finally as Pope Benedict, after over a decade and a half of multiple victims reporting his abusive crimes, there grew far too much evidence to continue sweeping Maciel's sins under the rug, so in 2006 the pope was forced to take action, gently placing his 86-year old pervert pastor out to pasture to live "a reserved life of prayer and penitence."[12] A year and a half later it took death to finally stop him from harming more children. Though the father promised he'd leave a generous inheritance for his "secret" family, true to his deceitful sleazy character, he didn't, prompting his sexually abused biological son to attempt to make a deal to stay quiet for a cool $26 million. But the Legion of Christ refused, and a contentious lawsuit followed.[13]

Of course when asked about this grotesque case of Vatican enabling a monster to remain on the loose for over half a century, in 2015 Pope Francis finally addressed the elephant in the room pretending he barely even knew of the case, even having the nerve to praise his two predecessor popes for how they "judiciously handled" the troublesome pedophile case.[14] Pope Francis is no different from all his predecessors, proving that he also buries the truth. His "all words and no action" response to the epidemic in his church is failing to help victims nor is he stopping further abuse.[15] Earlier this year the only rape survivor on the Vatican's Papal Commission on the Protection of Minors resigned in protest after Francis defied commission recommendations aimed at halting the church blight. In one hypocritical breath the pope claims a zero tolerance policy making profuse apologies for the damage his church has caused,[16] and then in the next moment he backstabs victims by reversing notorious pedophiles’ sentences from being defrocked to a lifetime of prayer and penance.[17] Meanwhile, an Italian criminal court just convicted one of his re-frocked pedo priests for sodomizing five children as young as 12. The liberal-minded pope emphasizes mercy to rapists while further violating victims by blatantly refusing to do them any justice, ensuring the wrong message is sent to his legions of still frocked pedophiles still raping kids around the world.

Pope critics maintain that the pontiff is merely placating and grandstanding when he so often engages in lofty anti-child abuse rhetoric yet fails to back up his nice sounding words and sentiments with any real action to make things better. The current pope is merely an actor whose job is simply to placate the wounded while disingenuously conveying “a righteous tough new stand” against church pedophiles that he has no intention of holding accountable. Yet all the pope really needs to do to enact effective change is add one little amendment that would alter pedophilia in his church forever.[18] By design, current canon law has always maintained the policy of secrecy and protectionism favoring the guilty. The unanimous recommendation from everyone serious about cleaning house of the long rampant church wickedness is simply to tack on these words of action to existing canon law:

All church personnel are obliged to report suspected abuse to the civil authorities.

As a therapist in the US and mandated reporter of child sexual abuse, I can vouch that all mental health professionals as well as medical and educational personnel by law in America decades ago were made legally obligated mandated reporters of any suspected sexual child abuse encountered both in or outside the therapeutic setting.[19] And for over 20 years the Vatican has chosen to consistently thumb its nose at the repeated recommendation of Catholic Bishops Conferences held in Ireland, Great Britain, the United States and Australia, all urging the Church to follow suit, under canon law to mandate similar sex abuse reporting requirements to law enforcement.[20] With just his signature alone, the pope has the absolute authoritative power to amend canon law to make mandatory reporting a done deal. But as long as Francis continues only paying lip service, knuckling under pressure from his pedophilic Curia, just buying more time with empty platitudes and meaningless promises while refusing to make the most glaringly obvious breakthrough change needed, it remains status quo business as usual for all the pedophiles being so obviously protected by the current pope and Vatican. In 2014 even the globalist United Nations Committees on the Rights of Children requested Francis to impose mandated reporting and the pope replied that it would interfere with the independence of sovereign states,[21] which is a totally irrelevant, bogus excuse to avoid doing the too obvious righteous thing, evoking the irrelevant reality that both the Vatican and Order of Malta Knights remain immune from any and all outside legal authority, in and of itself a gross miscarriage of justice.

Anyone can see that the real reason why the pope continues to refuse changing canon law - the church’s top echelon of power is crawling with sick, wicked Satan worshipping child rapists whose intentions are to continue inflicting damage on young kids just because the criminals in charge have a license for impunity. It’s the same reason why the Jimmy Saviles, the Edward Heaths, the Clintons and Podestas of the world live out their own perverted evil lives destroying countless others, all the while escaping justice. America still awaits Trump to make good on his vow to lock Hillary up,[22] along with all the rest of his countless broken campaign promises, just like his “same as the old boss” predecessor Obama.[23]

Another diabolical strategy coming from the Vatican legal department to effectively avert justice for tens of thousands of lifelong traumatized victims of pedophilia is for local church archdioceses to maliciously divert funding streams from victim abuse settlement allocation for upkeep and maintenance of obscenely fine trimmed lawns at church cemeteries.[24] This shows just how low the Catholic institution will go in criminal audacity to legally claim bankruptcy and deny financial compensation to legions of harmed victims. Meanwhile the Vatican is literally sitting on tons of gold and the Roman Catholic corporation is the richest in the entire world. According to anti-Catholic activist Jack Chick:

The Catholic Church is the biggest financial power, wealth accumulator and property owner in existence. She is a greater possessor of material riches than any other single institution, corporation, bank, giant trust, government or state of the whole globe.[25]

The Catholic institution is the largest,[26] most expansive and richest organization in the world controlling one fourth of the world’s gold supply. [27] So this shameless, bogusly deceitful ploy used by dozens of archdioceses across the US in recent years to throw a serious impediment kink into the legal machine effectively prolongs and stalls lawsuits in court from ever reaching settlement as a convenient highly effective means of denying compensation to tens of thousands of deserving victims.[28] Rome’s global objective is to create roadblocks in the court system rendering it impossible for rape victims to justly be awarded damages. The Church will spend millions to ensure that those they’ve damaged for life get nothing while falsely pretending to not have enough money to compensate those they harm. The hubris and psychopathic soullessness of these Satan worshipping low lifes are nothing short of an assault on our children, our humanity and good people everywhere.

Under the pretext of “religious freedom,” back in 2007 then Milwaukee Archbishop Timothy Dolan sought and received Vatican approval to divert $57 million to suddenly caring for mausoleums and cemeteries as the thinly veiled excuse to then file bankruptcy rather than rightfully caring for the injured human beings his church has wounded.[29] [30] Years later in 2015 his secret Vatican deal was uncovered and successfully challenged in court. Under his watch, the notorious Milwaukee archdiocese had at least 45 priests charged with pedophilia, one raping nearly 200 deaf boys. In view of the declared bankruptcy, in August 2015 the Milwaukee archdiocese announced a secretly agreed upon mediation amount of $21 million designated to compensate 330 victims, leaving 240 other victims out in the cold with nothing, in effect, pitting victim against victim.[31]

With an average victim settlement of $300,000 across America, the average Wisconsin disbursement has allocated only $50,000 per claimant for little more than half the Milwaukee victims and zero for the rest as the lowest, least equitable compensation of any archdiocese throughout the United States.[32] Moreover, from 1980 to 1995 a considerable number of civil suits were filed in Wisconsin. But Dolan and the Vatican pressured the State Supreme Court in 1995 to rule that the church could no longer be sued for sex abuse.[33] Thus, in states like Wisconsin, the courts have colluded with the Catholic Church to unjustly thwart fair compensation for victims. Adding insult to injury, because the Milwaukee case had dragged on for nearly a decade, bankruptcy lawyers ended up receiving twice the amount as the victims.

Earlier this year two Montana dioceses, one with 72 sex abuse victims and the other with over 400 are electing to follow suit and file bankruptcy in response to compensation claims.[34] This official church response - re-victimizing those whom the church has already severely injured, is no less than an overt ungodly, diabolical manipulation. But then since overwhelming evidence has demonstrated for some time now that Satan rules over the Vatican and the Catholic Church, this reprehensible move comes as no surprise but one more telling sign revealing who the Catholic Church truly serves, and it's definitely neither God nor its 1.2 billion followers.

The same ex-Milwaukee archbishop Timothy Dolan was subsequently rewarded a promotion to Cardinal representing America's largest Archdiocese in New York City, undoubtedly for being the first to apply the church bankruptcy loophole that would otherwise deny rightful victims their proper due while saving billions for the already filthy rich Vatican. When Pope Benedict resigned, Dolan's dedication for "selling his soul to the devil's church" even elevated him to vie as a viable candidate to be the next pope. Timothy Dolan's back in the news again, still maniacally finagling his Church of Satan, I mean Catholicism, in pursuit of yet more ways to screw over abuse victims, this time in New York State. From 2007-2015 he and his Church have spent over $2.1 million to effectively quash the state's Child Victims Act. [35] The corporate merger of the state-Catholic tag team has been fully operational over this last decade to ensure the victims' bill dies in Albany where it will never even be put to vote. Passing it would raise the statute of limitations to file sex abuse civil suits from age 23 all the way up to age 50 and felony criminal cases up to the 28th birthday.

Because victims often delay even considering taking on the additional stress and burden of having to relive and endure a childhood rape case through long drawn out court proceedings against an assailant from the mighty Catholic Church, especially when still young, reopening not-so-old wounds and trauma as a sexually abused minor turned young adult is too much for too many, only to later find that by mid-20's their statute of limitation has already run out. To circumvent that all too common fate amongst hapless victims, this Child Victims Act of New York would afford more time for survivors turned legal claimants to emotionally and psychologically prepare for the hardship of pursuing charges in a court of law. This calculated sabotage by the church and New York senators preventing passage of the bill is just one more sinister way the Vatican's able to skirt its moral and fiscal responsibility to make amends to those they've harmed who are most in need.

Because state statutes for child victims abused in the last century have all but run out, justice will never be served for millions of now older abuse survivors in America and around the world. Only four states have done what New York has refused to do, extend their statute windows for victims to file beyond the previous state law. But already in two of those four states that briefly permitted molestation survivors an additional small extension of only three years to file, time ran out in 2016 in both Minnesota and Hawaii.[36] Plus to ward off payouts on anticipated new lawsuits, the Minneapolis archdiocese also filed bankruptcy status back in 2015. The highest priority of so many "bankrupted" dioceses claiming no more funds has been to deny victim compensation and support - a sad and cruel joke considering the enormity of the Vatican's hidden wealth, and forecloses any possibility of justice for last century's victims. Advocating for victim abuse law extensions may appear a just and worthy cause were it not for the big money doled out by Dolan and his Vatican to kill laws from ever getting passed, resulting in the current impasse at the New York state senate. At this point educating and protecting our young about the degenerate satanic Catholic Church now seems a far more productive and prudently wise choice.

Still more sinister collusion between church and state has been uncovered in the UK that indicates the partners-in-crime have diabolically ganged up on child sex victims they've harmed by deploying yet another legal loophole. Since 2012 in order to shamefully deny 693 victims as young as 12 financial court damages, a government agency is claiming the minors gave consent and therefore are being denied fair compensation.[37] This outrageous twist of both logic and the law is allowing child rapists in the Catholic Church and the UK government to escape justice, denying victims financial awards for damages despite solid evidence that pedophile crimes were committed against children. No child can ever give consent to be sexually abused, that's why adults engaging in sexual acts with underage children is a crime and against the law in the first place. But in order to save money in settlement cases by clearly circumventing existing law, now that the legal precedent has been set, this latest egregious tactic being exploited by psychopathic scum across the pond may spread to America and other places in the world when it should immediately be stopped dead in its tracks. But both government and the Catholic Church are proven joint criminal operators possessing an extensive history of impunity when it comes to getting away with harming innocent victims.

To gain insight into just how depraved the crumbling moral foundation of the Catholic Church and its leaders have become, it's worth noting the work of longtime Jesuit priest, bestselling author, exorcist (that the movie of the same name profiled) and courageous Vatican whistleblower the late Malachi Martin. In his 1990 book, The Keys of This Blood, Martin exposes his own Roman Catholic Church for all its vile evil while serving in Rome on June 29, 1963, when a satanic ritual was actually held inside the Vatican's St. Paul's

Chapel, a mere week after Pope Paul VI [1963-1978] was elected the new pope:

> Most frighteningly for [Pope] John Paul [II] [1978-2005], he had come up against the irremovable presence of a malign strength in his own Vatican and in certain bishops' chanceries. It was what knowledgeable Churchmen called the 'super force.' Rumors, always difficult to verify, tied its installation to the beginning of Pope Paul VI's reign in 1963. Indeed Paul had alluded somberly to 'the smoke of Satan which has entered the Sanctuary'… an oblique reference to an enthronement ceremony by Satanists in the Vatican. Besides, the incidence of Satanic pedophilia-rites and practices - was already documented among certain bishops and priests as widely dispersed as Turin, in Italy, and South Carolina, in the United States. The cultic acts of Satanic pedophilia are considered by professionals to be the culmination of the Fallen Archangel's rites.[38] [39]

This bombshell of an admission about sizes up the Catholic brand of Satanism practiced at the Vatican and its widespread pedophilia practiced around the globe by thousands of protected child rapists wearing priestly garb, for centuries perpetrated against our most defenseless human population. Pope Paul VI called for a "New World Order," surrounding himself with infiltrated Freemasons.[40] Under his watch, Satanists were let out of the closet at the Vatican. The church had been covering up pedophilia as long as priests have been sodomizing children, which Vatican archives confirm has been as far back as the early Middle Ages, when both the Templar and Malta Knights were in their glorious heyday no doubt joining in on the demonic action.[41]

With the Vatican working secretly in direct cahoots with royal Illuminati bloodlines and the international crime cabal government, pedophilia has been the singular epicenter gristmill that's proliferated both Satan's tangible rise and growing power on this earth.[42] Our abused children are literally being fed to the demons as sacrificial lifeblood for their demonic sustenance and very survival. Today's pedophilia epidemic, the defiling of our innocents en masse, their ritualistic torture, drinking of their adrenalized blood, and their satanic mass sacrifice, attract and empower the most potent supernatural, diabolically driven, inter dimensional forces from hell that fuel all war, pestilence, poverty, murder, greed, avarice and deception currently plaguing our planet like never before.

Passivity, denial, and escapism are as much our enemy as the rapists and killers of our children, for the latter can only persist if enabled by the former. Meanwhile, as further cold hard evidence of this shocking reality, Pope Francis' right hand man - Cardinal George Pell - as the highest ranking prelate in church history is now facing pedophile charges back in his native Australia.[43] And within a couple days after he left Rome, police were busting a cocaine tooting homosexual orgy at the Vatican home of priests employed on the papacy council to reduce pedophilia in the Catholic Church…[44] yet more proof that the fox guards the underage henhouse as the rapists' guaranteed ticket to impunity.

While Father Malachi reported in a 1996 interview that per an internal Vatican document, 1-2% of all Catholic priests are practicing Satanists involved in satanic ritual sexual abuse of children,[45] last year Pope Francis admitted that 2% of his priests, bishops and cardinals are pedophiles.[46] However, it's been determined that from 1950-2010, 7% of all the priests in Australia (that's 1 in 14) were reported to be pedophiles.[47] In one order that began services in Australia in 1947, a Knights of Malta offshoot calling itself the Order of St. John of God Brothers had an incredible 40.4% of their clergy accused of being child molesters.[48] Rarely have any Australian priests ever been arrested and gone to prison. Perhaps the country's worst case offender may have sexually assaulted up to 1,000 children before his conviction for molesting 52 children.[49] As of 1994 the 82-year old has been serving a 28 year sentence. But for every guilty priest doing time, literally thousands of traumatized child victims have either been ignored or punished, and too often plagued the rest of their lives by demons delivered years earlier by their rapist priest.

The BishopAccountability.org website that tracks pedophile cases and cover-ups states that 5.6% of priests in America from 1950-2013 are/were child rapists.[50] [51] That's more than 1 in 19. Considering that the power differential between priests' authority operating in Third World nations and their child victims is far more pronounced, the rates of pedophilia in the developing world have to be far worse. Then on top of that, as in all sex crimes, 20 incidents of pedophilia rape go unreported for every one case that does reach the historically complicit authorities.[52] Knowing the actual pedo crime rate is far higher than the alarming rates reported in Australia and America, the Pope, his Vatican and secret military orders as supposed spiritual and moral authorities have hypocritically spearheaded the global epidemic raging out of control today, and with the world's top power players sworn to following the pope's lead, is it really any wonder?

Since so much evidence singles out the pope as a central figure in this grand scale human tragedy being played out in this 21st century, let's take a brief look at Pope Francis' own shady track record where a litany of unanswered questions still linger, begging for the light of truth to be shed. The one time that Gorge Bergoglio the cardinal was interviewed in 2010 about his past history in Argentina, investigators concluded that his responses were highly evasive, strongly indicating he was less than honest in holding back self-incriminating information.[53] Additionally, it's been determined that Bergoglio personally intervened in at least five separate cases where he aided,[54] abetted and otherwise protected guilty pedophiles from prison, allowing his clergy to rape more children prior to offenders' ultimate arrest and conviction. In contrast, when victims' families sought his help to apprehend perpetrators from further abusing children, Bergoglio flatly refused to meet with them or assist then in any way.

Moreover, as the Proventil head of the Catholic Jesuits in Argentina during the military junta dictatorship's "dirty war" back in the 1970's and 80's, the pope-to-be demonstrated a blatant policy that supported the military's abduction,[55] torture and murder by junta death squads responsible for thousands of missing Argentinian citizens. Documents show that Bergoglio even betrayed fellow Jesuit priests, turning in their names along with six of their parishioners from the poor slums to the junta.[56] After enduring months of torture in captivity, two priests managed to survive but their half dozen innocent followers remain among the disappeared as blood on Bergoglio's hands. Evidence clearly shows that the future pope made a secret deal with his junta dictators, in exchange for cooperating, calling their deadly US backed regime "patriotism," in effect supporting their democide, Bergoglio's payoff made him a rising star within the Catholic Church as necessary "grooming" for his present Vatican gig as the New World Order Jesuit wolf in sheep's clothing.

The latest stream of truth leaking out are accusations from a former Argentine junta official now living in Spain who provided sworn testimony insisting that the current pope "is a prime mover" in the massive global child sex trafficking network, and has been for quite some time.[57] During the insider's tenure within the junta dictatorship that lasted from 1976-1983, Bergoglio is charged with running a child trafficking ring through his Jesuit Catholic orphanages, exploiting and abusing children whose parents were murdered. Cases are on record where rounded up pregnant mothers were allowed to give birth only to be slain and their newborns automatically fed into Bergoglio's global trafficking network.

With so much over-the-top debauchery and sin now exposing the Catholic Church on a regular basis like never before, who can actually dispute Father Malachi's disturbing claims made two decades ago that Satan is controlling the world's largest Christian church? At 53%, 1.2 billion Catholics comprise the majority of Christians[58] belonging to the planet's largest religion Christianity at 2.2 billion people.[59] But despite still being the largest religious denomination in the world, in recent years believers have become non-believers in droves as 60% of Catholics today are over 65 years of age.[60] Pope Francis and his Church are drowning in a cesspool controlled by Luciferian pedophiles.[61] Every single day more of us with eyes wide open are recognizing the evildoers' "eyes wide shut."[62] All of these confirmed facts indisputably demonstrate that pedophilia is the ruling elite's Achilles Heel, and the best chance humanity will ever have at taking back our mother earth before 90-95% of us die as the elite's depopulation targets.[63]

Under Satan's not so secret banner, clearly a coalition of evildoers in charge have been victimizing children for centuries. Various alt media factions argue over which group is actually in control or the worst offender, the Freemasons, the Pope, Vatican, Jesuits, Malta Knights, the Templars, the Illuminati Satanists, the CFR, Trilateral Commission, the Bilderbergers, the Skull and Bones-ers, Committee of 300 and on and on it goes… and then there's "the Jews." Because a minute fraction of "the Jews" tend to hold court in the entertainment, media and banking worlds so much,[64][65] and through crypto-Jew infiltration of the Jesuits,[66] Freemasons,[67] governments and other religions as well as pervasive bribery and blackmail Israel and AIPAC hold near absolute sway and control over compromised US politicians and US Empire foreign policy,[68] [69] many in the so called truth movement angrily point fingers at a handful of the most powerful Jews on earth as the true culprit most deserving to roast in hell.[70] Many specifically call out and blame the Ashkenazi Khazarian Jews that comprise 80-90% of today's world Jewish population having zero genetic lineage or rights to claim Palestine or any part of the Middle East as their sacred homeland since their ancestors likely never set foot there.[71] Despite vociferous opposition, some of the latest findings continue pointing to an Ashkenazi origin located in northeastern Turkey, not the Middle East.[72] In any event, "blaming the Jews" as the root of all evil is way too simplistic, not to mention too easily dismissible as so much venomous, anti-Semitic rhetoric.

There's plenty of justifiable blame for centuries of wrongdoing to go around, and let's face it, all these evil demented psychopaths wouldn't hesitate to throw their own mothers under an approaching bus if it meant avoiding both truth and justice from ever catching up to them. For millenniums they've been masterminds at utilizing the blame game to divide and conquer us, sliced and diced in every which categorical way,[73] manipulating Americans today into such a hateful frenzied division not seen since the Civil War. Charlottesville was nothing more than just another provocateur staged drama designed to ignite race war,[74] a preplanned violent kickoff to Soros' summer of chaos,[75] i.e., another episodic deep state race war trigger pulled a la the "Charleston massacre" two years ago.[76] So rather than face off against each other as duped, divided and conquered fools, we need to unite against our true enemy, all the Satan worshipping elitist groups and their despicable crimes against all of us, our common humanity and our precious children. Every one of the aforementioned Illuminati criminals is guilty as sin. To split hairs quibbling over who's the most evil or guilty seems a pointless, unproductive waste of time and energy… time and energy that would be far better served forming a Truth and Reconciliation Commission to pick the hanging rotten fruit closest to the ground as the most feasible, expedient method to uncovering the deepest dark truth and holding those most guilty accountable.

Next addressed is the mountains of secular evidence chronicling one child sex abuse scandal after the next just since the 1980’s in both America and Europe that also reveals the worldwide cover-up of these egregious crimes against our children right up to last year’s Pizzagate. The next chapter confirms the cold hard facts spottily and sparsely covered by reluctant mainstream news outlets as well as confronts MSM’s total denial and silence around today’s pedophilia epidemic currently raging out of control on this planet. This willful complicit deception incriminates the mainstream whores of the propaganda ministry as complicit obstructionists of truth and justice because they too are child raping bedfellows shamelessly hiding within their puppet masters’ den of demons.

The Overview

Now that the perversely destructive hand of the Catholic Church has been exposed through its widespread child sex abuse and fascist war making partnering with the Rothchild bankers and Anglo-American Empire, the next focus will turn to well-documented pedo scandals perpetrated by the crime cabal government mainly through its military and CIA operations. Though we know pedophiles have undoubtedly been abusing children as long as low-life human beings (or perhaps I should say bloodline hybrids) have occupied this planet, this chapter will address major scandals that began emerging in the 1980’s at various daycare facilities across America. An account of the most significant cases will be presented as incontrovertible proof that pedophiles at the top of the power rung committing horrendous sex crimes against our underage population have been grossly underreported and squelched for a very long time. Dissecting scandal after scandal should give the reader a perception of clarity that pedophile sex abuse networks have been operating continuously uninterrupted for many decades. The sampling covered here is not a series of discrete, isolated cases by any stretch, but simply the tip of a long running iceberg where a few happened to accidentally get exposed to the public, and even reluctantly covered by various mainstream news outlets.

For over four decades the elite's concentrated pushback vis-a-vis mainstream media to deflect, minimize, dispel or deny the inordinately high incidence of international pedo rings and horrific pedo crimes has willfully promoted the false notion that these scandals are both extremely rare and relatively inconsequential, invariably rendered as overblown, "nothing to see here" hype. The biggest case in point is how MSM so brazenly mishandled last year's so called Pizzagate cover-up,[i] rushing to defend the "poor little picked on, maliciously maligned" pizza shop owner who GQ Magazine happened to crown the 49th most powerful individual in America's most powerful city DC.[ii] With the NY Times,[iii] Washington Post[iv] and every major MSM outlet rushing to his defense insisting that an army of vicious internet slanderers[v] were ganging up on pizzeria extraordinaire James Alefantis fabricating a horrendous story out of thin air that even alt news pioneer Alex Jones was reduced to becoming an apologist,[vi] only shows why the DC kiddie peddler is the 49th most powerful player in Washington.

Despite compiling more than enough circumstantial evidence based on hundreds of WikiLeaks released John Podesta emails[vii] and sick Alefantis Instagram photos and his even sicker captions including afterhours "entertainment" of pedo performances at the "family friendly" Comet Pizza,[viii] all indicating more than high probability that a Clinton-Obama-Podesta-Alefantis child sex ring is operating out of our nation's capital, zero police or legal action has resulted. Predictably, neither the DC police nor the FBI have bothered to follow up investigating any of this since they're simply pawns of GQ's "top 49 powerhouse clique," of which Hillary, Obama, the Podesta boys and their pizza loving James are all perennials.[ix] [x] [xi]

Instead the power establishment declared the internet claims as pure "fake news" conjured up by a frenzied online army of overzealous conspiracy nuts[xii] responsible for causing another whacked out lone gunman to take law into his own hands and investigate said allegations for himself against Comet Ping Pong, firing off a couple rounds inside the joint just to show the world he meant business. It was all flimsily veiled as yet more poorly staged drama spun to “prove” just how dangerous the internet lynch mob spewing out fake news can be.[xiii] Thus, Pizzagate became the perfect opportunity for yet another Hegelian inspired deep state, master stroked false flag to conveniently create the “fake news” problem, giving “just” cause to roll out its engineered reaction - another wacko “lone gunman” brandishing his automatic weapon (as more remindrance to ban guns[xiv]) while endangering the public, and thus conveniently provide the perfect pretext to warrant the deep state solution - urgently implement sweeping internet censorship legislation[xv] with ultimate aim to remove all dissident alternative voices from public access.[xvi] This is the endgame scenario in every totalitarian regime throughout history, to permit dissemination of only official false narrative lies and propaganda as “news” to an oppressed, misinformed, tightly controlled population.

With the Google,[xvii] Facebook,[xviii] Twitter,[xix] YouTube[xx] whores all falling into subservient line as extensions of Mockingbird CIA-NSA[xxi] [xxii] centralized fascist control,[xxiii] access to the truth is methodically being eliminated… all for the sake of “protecting” the public from the dangerous consequences of “fake news.” Despite the elite’s desperation to cut off the truth from the people ASAP, we citizens of the world already know that deep state’s propaganda ministry called the New York Times, the Washington Post, CNN, Fox News, ABC, Time Magazine and corporate owned media all read off the same centralized script as the real source of fake news. But because so many MSM lies have been thoroughly exposed[xxiv] for lame stream media ever to recover from, few people now even bother to still take CNN et al serious as a credible news source. A poll from last May revealed 2 out of 3 Americans believe mainstream news is the actual fake news.[xxv]

Despite mainstream media's brazen, over-the-top efforts at damage control to regain so much lost credibility, stuck now living in an all too obvious Orwellian age of deception, the earth's rulers will never be successful at stamping out the truth. The jarring, enormously disturbing reality that roughly one third of all US government personnel occupying prominent positions of power within Congress, the judiciary and executive branches are child raping, murderous Satanists[xxvi] (or through blackmail compromised and controlled dupes)[xxvii] bent on (or minimally complicit in) committing human genocide [xxviii] may be too shocking to be believed by most Americans. But for those of us with eyes still wide open, there's more than enough glaring, incriminating evidence. One of the aims of this book is to illuminate what humanity is currently and perilously up against prior to apocalyptic ruin. Time is running out on planet earth unless we immediately arm ourselves with the truth and fight back like there's no tomorrow.

A running theme throughout this presentation should become clear to the reader. After uncovering irrefutable facts chronicling each pedophilia scandal, the government minions and their MSM presstitutes invariably go to work with aggressive pushback measures designed to obscure, muddle and otherwise conceal the darker truth from ever seeing the full light of day.[xxix] [xxx] [xxxi] Deep state's stonewalling tactics using deceit and denial are thoroughly dissected here to uncover how powerful child rapists, like the pedophile hordes within the Catholic Church, have always remained above the law, never fully investigated nor prosecuted because they're systematically protected and buffered by a built in, top down impenetrable wall of pure

Luciferian evil. Meanwhile, elite sexual predators, their subordinate protectors and their paid media apologists and propagandists automatically dismiss and deny the mountains of overwhelming evidence. You will see this exact same sinister pattern criminally played out over and over again, effectively keeping the lid on egregious sins passed down through the ages - sodomizing the innocents in ritual sacrificial rites of torture and murder, bleeding their lifeblood and literally drinking and eating their stolen life force that provides sustenance and power to demonic interdimensional forces in order to continue ruling and taking over the earth.

Our dark journey begins with the satanic ritual abuse (SRA) scandals discovered at several, mostly military daycare centers across America during the 1980’s, and the criminal system’s countermeasures to summarily cover up and minimize exposure of the same brutal savagery that’s been seamlessly practiced in the name of Satan for countless millenniums.

Satanic Ritual Abuse at McMartin Pre-School

The first major pedophilia scandal in the United States to break with international headlines took place in 1983 at McMartin Pre-School in Manhattan Beach, California,[xxxii] a small upscale seaside city a few miles south of the Los Angeles airport. The McMartin case stands out as the longest, most expensive criminal trial in US history, draining California taxpayers of $15 million[xxxiii] in a grotesque travesty of justice. But with a quick review of the facts, it was far more a travesty of justice for the children and their families than the guilty perps. Once the case broke open in the press, after the initial shock and disbelief, the media and public gradually turned against the “unbelievable” kids’ and their parents’ and “enablers’” “wild” claims. MSM liars always protect child rapists, twisting and perverting reality so that the victimized children and their parents are the ones on trial in the court of public opinion. A prime example of this is the ridicule and scorn heaped on the poor kids who insisted that they'd been escorted through underground tunnels underneath the daycare that were later discovered after the case was dismissed and therefore never considered as evidence.[xxxiv] In another obvious move to withhold the truth, the LA Times and MSM reporters were pulled off the case the instant the tunnels were discovered, vindicating the children's claims. Victims reported that their abusers constantly reminded them of death threats against both them and their parents should they tell the truth while being forced to witness live turtles, rabbits and other animals sadistically killed, only to have 77 animal bones later dug up on the property after the trial, again never legally taken into account. Several children were even medically diagnosed with STD's. But all this vital information was never introduced in the courtroom.

Initially the highly sensationalized spectacle gripped the nation in shock that such unthinkable evil could actually exist. The multi-member McMartin-Buckey family that owned and operated the daycare were among five defendants charged with committing 207 counts of child sex abuse. To make matters worse, in 1985 an HBO production allegedly written by Oscar winning writer Abby Mann (notorious for using ghost writers) and his wife Myra, co-executive produced with Oscar winning director-screenwriter Oliver Stone called "The Indictment: The McMartin Trial" was heavily slanted in favor of the guilty pedophiles.[xxxv] Acting as a media mole protecting the satanic ritual child abuse ring operating in Los Angeles, the Manns based their script on a book about the McMartin case entitled The Politics of Child Abuse[xxxvi] written by a married couple who were known child pornographers - Paul and Shirley Eberle[xxxvii] as yet more foxes guarding their henhouse.

Seven tortuous years after it began, the case was tossed out of court in 1990 with either acquittals or a hung jury for all accused. After critical evidence disappeared, combined with so much crucial evidence withheld from the trial, and gross legal errors seemingly intended to undermine the prosecution, combined with seven grueling years of hostile media coverage and a skeptical public lambasting the child victims and their parents, the disgraceful debacle went nowhere. The bottom line why justice was never served was, had the rabbit hole of evil been uncovered, big name LA politicians, entertainers and athletes would have been found guilty of satanic pedophilia. It turns out the Buckeys were mainly the pimping suppliers of child victims for the local Luciferian elite.[xxxviii]

A number of suspicious deaths associated with the McMartin case point to probable foul play and a massive cover-up. The stakes were so high, people died mysteriously and by design, the prosecutors' case was completely botched. A young healthy former police officer and recent father turned private investigator Paul Bynum just prior to testifying about underground tunnels suddenly showed up suspiciously "suicided" with a bullet hole in his head. In 1983 a mother Judy Johnson first discovered her two year old son arrived home from school with a bleeding anus, took him to her doctor who referred the boy to a specialist that confirmed he'd been sodomized, which initiated the police investigation.[xxxix] But Judy was subsequently vilified by the press as mentally ill and paranoid, and just three years into the investigation was alleged to have died from alcohol poisoning. Back in 1976 police officer Paul Bynum had been assigned a rape-murder case, the victim being singer Bill Medley's ex-wife Karen Klaas who died an hour after dropping her child off at McMartin Preschool. In 1984 her widowed husband Gerald Klaas drove off an Oregon cliff and died a month after indictments in the McMartin case were handed down.[xl]

With the McMartin case, the precedent was painfully established of what would become a repeated pervasive pattern of horrendous re-victimization of both abused children and their families in so many pedophile cases to follow where child rapists are consistently set free. The justice system not just in the US but virtually every country is so corrupt and poisoned that it protects elite pedophile murderers at the expense of children's precious lives. By diabolical design, the same sad, tragic, pathetic outcome has been replicated in virtually every case in Europe, Australia and the entire world. It's high time we citizens of this earth hold the guilty accountable and face the evil in our midst.

West Point Daycare Scandal

A decade after I graduated from the United States Military Academy, at least two staff members working at the West Point Child Development Center were allegedly torturing and sodomizing little children one to six years of age. But because West Point is such an "honorable and venerable" historic institution, so closely tied to America's beloved war heroes and enjoying to this day its squeaky clean, sterling image and reputation (that my own unique firsthand experience completely debunks and obliterates), the satanic ritual abuse of young children at West Point during the mid-1980's hardly showed up at all in the press, merely a passing, fleeting blip on the screen that the vast majority of Americans never even knew existed - by design of course. In fact, despite writing my own West Point story exposing the lies, corruption and abject failure to produce strong, moral leadership from the brass factory on the Hudson for over a half century now,[xli] even I was totally unaware of this largely unknown scandal until I began researching and writing articles about Pizzagate late last year.[xlii]

In July 1984 parents of a 3-year old girl contacted the West Pont military police stating that their child was sexually assaulted at the West Point Child Development Center, the on post daycare center serving preschool aged child dependents of both military personnel (totaling 120 children) and civilian employees (comprising another 30 kids). A medical doctor at the West Point hospital observed that the little girl’s vagina had been lacerated.[xliii] When the Army’s Criminal Investigation Division (CID) learned the accused suspects were civilians, the case was immediately transferred over to the FBI, which in late July 1984 began investigating the 40 employee facility serving 150 children who were infants to kindergarteners. At least 11 children (and likely dozens more) were sexually molested as well as physically abused with burns and bruises at the Military Academy daycare by at least two female civilian staff acting as teacher’s aides who were suspended with pay.[xliv]

The forthcoming accusations alleged that satanic ritual abuse was being perpetrated by members of a devil-worshipping cult between 1983 and 1984 that included animal sacrifice and physical abuse inflicted on young children. Subsequently, interviewed children were reporting that they were forced to eat shit and drink piss, and had feces smeared on their bodies during satanic ritual abuse.[xlv] Many also alluded to being driven away from the daycare center, stripped naked and exploited for child pornography photographs. The West Point Child Development Center building number where the satanic pedophile abuse occurred was 666, later changed by Academy officials to 673 due to 666 being the mark or number of the beast.[xlvi]

When the children began verbalizing and showing signs of sexual abuse to their parents, and the parents brought their concerns to the Center staff, the military police, FBI, medical and West Point authorities, their accusations were summarily disbelieved, ignored and categorically denied. Parents were told that the two accused staff members had both passed lie detector tests.[xlvii] FBI investigators showed up at the parents' homes for questioning without tape recorders or even bother taking notes, casting dispersions on the parents' childrearing capabilities. From the outset of the supposed investigation, it was clear that the authorities involved were more concerned with squelching and containing the truth than finding it out.

Medical doctor Captain William R. Grote, whose 3-year old child was sexually violated, became so upset over how the Academy mishandled the evidence and parents' concerns that he refused a promotion to major in June 1985 and soon afterwards resigned his officer commission. In his words:

I cannot accept promotion in a system that at first refused to acknowledge and now refuses to deal with the victims of extensive child abuse that occurred at the West Point Child Development Center.[xlviii]

Despite an "exhaustive" FBI investigation lasting over a year conducted by a team of 60 FBI agents, in the end, as of 1985, neither the US Army nor West Point nor Southern District of New York US Attorney's office indicted or arrested anyone for the horrific crimes being committed.[xlix] Nor has the government or military admitted guilt that any crimes ever even took place when the physical and psychological evidence piling up was monumental.

Though Dr. Grote was among the first parents to file a lawsuit against the Academy, he chose not to pursue the subsequent civil suit filed by parents that eventually was settled in May 1991.[l] Eerily similar to the shameful outcome of the botched McMartin case in California, after the same seven painful, agonizing years for the abused children and victimized parents, they were forced to witness the perpetrators get off scot free because both criminal cases refused to accept irrefutable evidence and were ultimately dropped. This reprehensible misconduct by our judicial system constitutes nothing short of double the criminality carrying double the abusive punishment. And as with virtually all government pedophilia crimes, to this day both the satanic abusers and satanic elements operating within the government remain guiltily unaccountable.

In response to West Point parents' civil suit, two years before it was settled, an independent team from the University of Pennsylvania was called in to gather its own evidential findings since the FBI investigation was intentionally so shoddily mishandled. And based on the sealed report, a financial settlement into the millions was reached, obviously indicating complicit admission that substantial abuse did in fact occur involving at least nine of the children. After seven horrific years, the West Point civil suit was finally decided, awarding nine families a settlement of $1.2 million, totaling $2.7 million to be disbursed over time to the abused children with final allotment upon reaching adulthood, ranging from $25,000 to $625,000 for each victim… small consolation for the hell that they were forced to endure.[li]

Dr. William Grote, who by the time of the settlement was maintaining a private civilian medical practice in New Jersey, had this to say about the sordid affair's outcome:

> Unfortunately, money can't … undo the trauma incurred by scores of children at West Point … because people with responsibility didn't exercise that responsibility. What the hell is a settlement? … They could have caught these people doing it at the time that they were doing it. We have a tendency to think that everything that's evil and bad is on the other side of the Pacific or the Atlantic. And that's not the case.[lii]

Prior to becoming the New York City mayor, Rudy Giuliani was the US Attorney at the time in charge of the case at West Point.[liii] He quickly swept it under the damage control carpet, colluding with top Academy military brass and the Pentagon, complicit in allowing the satanic ritual abuse to not only take place, but continue even after initial parental complaints were filed. Clearly West Point, the Army and US federal government placed their own criminal self-interests ahead of the children in harm's way in order to minimize negative publicity and avoid what would be worldwide media attention drawn to the case had Giuliani and the military fulfilled their legal and moral obligation calling for grand jury indictments, arrests and trial prosecution.

This pure evil proved a precursor of what was to come, when 10 years later NYC Mayor Giuliani as a treasonous insider knew of the twin tower attacks prior to the 9/11 false flag event, and shortly afterwards was caught on camera lying about it.[liv] And then a decade ago while Giuliani was running for US president as a GOP candidate, more of his shady character was yet again fully on display. He publicly defended and employed in his consulting firm a disgraced priest accused of sexually molesting teenage boys.[lv] As a result of being investigated by a grand jury in 2002, stemming from pedophilia charges dating back to 1975, with statute of limitations run out, the Catholic Church chose to retain Giuliani's friend and Long Island diocese monsignor, but prohibited him from performing priestly duties or appearing in public as a priest. So as long as he's out of his priestly garb, apparently he gets to remain on both the Vatican and Giuliani's payrolls while continuing to molest children. By the way, his two source income allows this alleged pedophile with another priest to co-own waterfront Manhattan property worth a half million dollars. In the real world of church and state, pedophilia apparently pays off.

Current West Point Superintendent General Bob Caslen (West Point Class of 1975) at the time of the sexual abuse scandal was an Army major and a bit of an Army apologist:

> You had a bunch of kids who had some kind of abuse and the concerns of the parents seeking assistance fell on deaf ears. The medical treatment for the satanic abuse was not meeting the bill. It was far beyond what (the Army) could handle.[lvi]

But with unlimited resources available to the Army, obviously West Point nor the Pentagon made little to no effort to genuinely respond to the needs of the victims and their families because their bottom line agenda all along was clearly damage control and ASAP expediency and be damned with the very real and legitimate needs of their dozens of victims.

After interviewing more than 950 potential witnesses including scores of children 2 to 6 in age, in late October 1985 over a year into the investigation, by way of a letter to the West Point superintendent, Giuliani made his backdoor announcement of a no indictment sham, claiming that while “indications” of pedophilia abuse may have been present, there remained “insufficient substantive evidence to prosecute.”[lvii] Two years later in 1987 Giuliani had the gall to insist that his “detailed” investigation only showed “one or two children” were abused. Clearly another government cover-up was quietly foisted on America.

In response, a longtime area resident spent the next three years organizing a support group for the victims’ families and mobilizing local protests calling for the Justice Department to reopen the investigation. When it was all said and done, she was quoted:

> When I saw the headlines of the child pornography ring at West Point, it cut me to the heart. I know West Point is only > surface beauty. They were outright cruel to the parents.[lviii]

The disheartened activist realized the clincher proving beyond any doubt that Washington was guilty of a whitewashed cover-up arrived in the form of a letter from Justice Department attorney Mary C. Spearing on behalf of the department’s National Obscenity Enforcement Unit stating unequivocally:

> Unfortunately, no new evidence, revelation or hint of wrongdoing or negligence surfaced during our review.[lix]

Immediately following the financial settlement in 1991, the local newspaper in Middletown, New York, The Times Herald Record, published an extensive, fair article chronicling the sad tragic story, featuring input from a number of the West Point parents. The title of the piece was “A Legacy of Pain: Settlement Doesn’t Ease Abused Children’s Fears.” The opening sentence revealed that the 3-year old girl who seven years earlier initiated disclosure of the abuse, at age 10 could not go to the bathroom alone without her mother guarding the door. The effects of the sexual trauma experienced years earlier is trauma she may have to bear for life. The abuse victim asked her mother if she would be able to have children when she grew up. The mother lamented:

> This happened seven years ago, and it’s not any better. She’s constantly asking, `What if we’re out in the store, Mommy, and we see these people? Are they going to hurt me?’… But this is constantly on her mind because she knows these people are not in jail for what they did… These people stole our children. (She’s) nothing like she used to be. She’s a very angry little girl. She doesn’t trust anyone. She’s nothing like she was before this happened. It’s never going to be over for them, or for us.[lx]

The catastrophic damage to very young victims of pedophile inflicted sexual trauma is a lifelong affliction that many never recover from.[lxi] It irreversibly changes everything in the lives of both abused children as well as their families. And it wasn't just the sicko Satanists perpetrating this seemingly permanent hell on the victimized families, but West Point and the federal government were equally abusive and criminally negligent and guilty as well. Years later one mother still struggles to cope with the crippling effects on her daughter:

As far as I'm concerned, the government gave them a license to go out and abuse other children. I have to explain to my daughter these people are still out there. And she still has nightmares. She's afraid they're going to come through the window at night to get her.[lxii]

After willfully suppressing massive amounts of medical and psychological evidence coming from dozens of victimized children and witnesses, the US government and Pentagon elected to protect an organized satanic cult that was likely part of the larger nationwide network affiliated with and run by the CIA and military intelligence. The feds' bogus claim of lack of evidence of course also protected West Point's pristine reputation as well as their own despicable CYA asses. Their criminal self-interests were obviously far more important than the interests and well-being of vulnerable, defenseless young children brutally tortured and satanically raped, singlehandedly proving that soulless psychopaths are in charge.

What makes the West Point case even more shocking and egregious is that in August 1983, 11 months prior to sex abuse ever being reported, an abusive Army sergeant stationed at the Academy who was the boyfriend of a mother actually murdered her 22-month old son and was quietly given a dishonorable discharge as his two-for-one get out of Army and get out of jail card. The colonel in charge of West Point Child Protection wrote a letter to West Point superintendent Lt. General Willard Scott Jr. stating:

> The community has received a devastating message - West Point and the Army take child abuse lightly and do not consider it a major offense.[lxiii]

A West Point graduate and pediatrician Dr. Pat Jones stationed at the Academy whose 15-month old daughter was sexually molested remarked:

> The guy that murdered the 22 month-old baby was let off Scot free. They just kicked him out of the Army to prevent any publicity. I tried to resign from the alumni association I feel ashamed for even being from that place.[lxiv]

Thus, the disgraceful stage at West Point had already been fatefully set, allowing it to deteriorate from bad to worse less than a year later when the scandal broke that permitted satanic pedophiles to remain unpunished and free to harm others.

A couple years after the West Point scandal erupted, the most infamous satanic ritualized sexual abuse in the military surfaced in San Francisco’s Presidio where Satanist pedo ringleader Lt. Colonel Michael A. Aquino was heavily implicated. With the bigger agenda to continue at will getting away with raping and murdering small children, historically very few if any perpetrators have ever been caught and brought to justice, especially when they happen to be powerful international crime cabal players.

The Presidio Daycare Scandal

The US Army’s military post known as the Presidio had been the 6th Army headquarters[lxv] for forty years when the child abuse scandal broke out in November 1986. Eight years later the Western Pacific Coast Army base would be closed when in 1994 the historic San Francisco landmark adjacent the Golden Gate Bridge was transferred over to the National Park Service Golden Gate Recreation Area as an extension of Golden Gate Park.[lxvi] But on Friday November 14th, 1986 a three-year old boy attending the Presidio Child Development Center (CDC), the daycare and after school facility for young children of families stationed at the post, began exhibiting signs of stress and trauma, later that day informing his mother that one of his teachers had touched his penis and stuck a pencil up his anus.[lxvii] Over the next several days the parents notified the CDC staff, the boy's father Capt. Mike Tobin spoke with the Army chaplain and immediately the Army's Criminal Investigation Division was contacted.

Like the West Point case, blatant warning signs existed of major trouble brewing prior to the first child ever reporting abuse. The Presidio's Child Development Center had a child support services coordinator arrested for assaulting a female employee, who a year earlier had reported abusive treatment of children at the center nearly six years before the Tobin boy's accusation. Apparently the inter-staff assault was a case of "she said-he said" and was dropped for lack of evidence. The then Presidio chief of juvenile investigations contends that that same female employee had accused other staff at the Center of touching children's genitals.[lxviii]

During her four years at the Presidio Center, the whistleblower also reported staff physically abusing children, including the then CDC director hitting a child in the mouth and drawing blood. But rather than respond appropriately to her continued complaints, nothing was ever done to rectify the worsening situation. The mounting stress caused the female staff member to eventually quit, claiming she "ended up having a nervous breakdown" over her ordeal.[lxix] Despite the grossly poor management that created a toxic environment only encouraging further abuse of the children, an ensuing investigation in response to the one employee's numerous concerns and complaints determined that at least three Center personnel had been threatened with loss of job if they spoke the truth about what was occurring. When child sex abuse allegations were raised, the provost marshal told juvenile investigations chief Ed Albanoski that there was nothing to look into and on no uncertain terms to back off, that the situation would be handled internally within the Center staff chain of command. Despite the Army's official complicity and gross negligence, intuitively the stymied investigator retained the military police report No 00193-82/MP1026-82-047, dated February 4th, 1982, nearly five years prior to the Tobin boy's revelations.[lxx]

At the end of the day, the internal chain of command sought to retain both the corporal punishing director and the violent support services coordinator, leaving the child abuse at the Presidio to only grow from bad to worse. One can easily see the strikingly identical, parallel pattern of increasing abuse at both the East and West Coast military daycares - the unheeded child murder at West Point and observed physical assaults and sexual abuse at the Presidio prior to the start of any formal investigations. In fact, instead of drumming the child services coordinator out after his display of violence toward the one staff member trying desperately to stop the abuse, as is typical within the hierarchical military milieu, gross incompetence only gets rewarded. A year later the US Army Forces Command was officially showering him with the following laudatory praise:

Doing an excellent job as the Child Support Services Coordinator. The staff training program he developed utilizing the Military Child Care modules is model for the Army.[lxxi]

But there were more red flags to come. Over a year and a half before the Tobin child first complained of abuse in November 1986, an Army captain's daughter explained to her parents a red spot on her hand was the result of a staff member holding her and other kids’ hands till they pulled away from the burning heat caused by a magnifying glass. A day after the father confronted this same service coordinator, he was told that “it's your daughter's word against hers [staff’s], so we can't do anything.”[lxxii] Wisely after that, the captain took his child out of the daycare. Recall that Satan worshipping staff at the West Point daycare were reported to have similarly burned child victims there as well. A pattern of satanic ritual abuse practiced at one location will often resemble or be identical to the same torture methods deployed elsewhere, strongly suggesting a structured nationwide satanic network of sadistic criminal abuse. Again, ancient satanic rites and practices burning children have been handed down through the millenniums.

In June 1986, five months ahead of the CID investigation, another eye-opening precipitating event unfolded when a mother who had just dropped her daughter off at the daycare observed while leaving a staff putting her hands alternately inside a child’s pants touching her genital area and then inside her top tickling the child. After reporting this to the assistant director, she was told that the staff “was just playing innocent tickling games” with the little girl.[lxxiii] Still concerned, the mother went to the child services coordinator and shared what she witnessed with him. He later that same day called to say he would “write something up in her personnel file.” After following up with the captain in charge of supervising the Center’s civilian employees, the persistent concerned parent was reassured that the CID was looking into the matter, but in the end, again “not enough evidence” to conclusively judge any wrongdoing had taken place. And a year later the concerned mother’s worst nightmare materialized when she learned that her own daughter was among those molested.

In spite of the murder less than a year before the breaking West Point scandal and the repeated incidents of both physical and sexual abuse regularly occurring at the Presidio almost a half-decade prior to that scandal, these dire, foreboding warning signs failed to stop more sinister crimes to come. Again just like pedophilia scourge in the church, the US military had long established its own flagrantly complicit cover-up pattern, from war atrocities regularly committed in Operation Speedy Express[lxxiv]at scores of Vietnamese villages like the My Lai massacre a decade and a half earlier,[lxxv] to consistently protecting child abuse offenders at military posts throughout the 1980's. The Army chain of command knowingly tolerates if not encourages rampant criminality, from murder to severe child abuse, in every case allowing it to flourish and fester for years on end prior to reaching the crisis stage. This longstanding "arrangement" characterized by a systemic seal of secrecy and concealment is nothing new, just highly symptomatic of our corrosively corrupt, pathologically driven government fast descending toward absolute tyranny and fascist control of yet another totalitarian state, not unlike cold war Soviet Union.[lxxvi]

Had appropriate corrective steps from the outset been taken at these military posts in the 1980's, trauma that likely lasts a lifetime for thousands of damaged children would have been averted. But then from the very start, protecting the innocent was never the priority over protecting the perpetrators, reputations and the government and military's own self-interest.

With near 1,000 US military bases spread across the planet,[lxxvii] worldwide human trafficking rings within a humongous commercial sex industry continue to thrive, providing a steady traffic supply of exploited young women and underage girls [and boys] as abuse victims for American military personnel.[lxxviii] Out of the global trafficking trade's enormous $150 billion a year profit, two thirds or $99 billion is generated from the sex slave industry alone.[lxxix] The UN

2016 Global Report on Trafficking Persons found that more nations (106 out of 193) have trafficked victims trapped inside their borders than don't.[lxxx] With the most recent statistics showing that one fourth of all human trafficking victims are children, and 1.8 million kids are trafficked into slavery yearly,[lxxxi] the total number of current child slaves in this world has to be considerably more than the decade old estimate of 13 million children.[lxxxii] Clearly child sexual abuse has become an out of control scourge on this earth. And with 200,000 US armed forces dispersed[lxxxiii] on every continent occupying at least 160 nations,[lxxxiv] like most evil enterprises upon exposure, the US Empire's seedy role involving the military and CIA steeped in child sex trafficking has only subversively moved deeper underground.

Understanding this pervasive pedophilia epidemic from the broader perspective, it's been the black ops military intelligence laboratories (referred to as "milabs"), most often subterranean bases both domestic and abroad - that have always been the primary secret US government locations where the MK Ultra/Monarch trauma-induced mind control programs (also used for so called military "alien" abduction)[lxxxv] deliver ongoing systematic child rape, torture and murder, from the early days of Nazi Dr. Mengele's experiments in the 1950's all the way to the present.[lxxxvi] Thus, the two largest US institutions entrusted with the duty to protect American citizens - the US federal government and US military - have been the worst offenders, premeditatedly destroying the lives of millions of American children [and adults] along with their families, led by a diabolical Illuminati network of satanic secret societies in charge that Nazi admiring Satanist Lt. Col. Aquino exemplifies.[lxxxvii] But more on him and his Monarch mind control black projects await as the next chapter's prime topic.

For a very long time the elitists in control, busily breeding their “super race,” have always held the average, everyday working class Americans in total contempt and disdain,[lxxxviii] as hereditarily inferior, considering us “deplorables” and “useless eating” expendables per infamous child raping pedophiles Hillary Clinton[lxxxix] and Henry Kissinger.[xc] Marked for extermination, it’s essential that citizens around the world sooner than later realize that all our elite owned governments are part of this demonic global system that is anything but friend and protector. In fact, with democide (government killing its own citizens) - not war - the biggest global killer in modern history (at 262 million, 6 times the deaths from combat),[xci] simultaneously an globalist diabolical conspiracy to gain absolute power and control over every living human on this depopulated planet is moving in for its final solution kill.[xcii] We must accept this cold hard reality that today we are all in the elite’s WMD crosshairs if we are to survive the coming slaughter.

Returning to the Presidio and the 3-year old sexually abused Tobin boy, after he was interviewed on videotape during the morning of November 21st, 1986 by the CID, in the afternoon he was examined by a medical doctor at San Francisco’s General Hospital Child Adolescent Sexual Abuse Referral Center (CASARC) and it was confirmed that the young child had been anally raped.[xciii] Despite a flurry of meetings at the Presidio in reaction to the medical findings that sexual abuse did in fact occur, the Army proceeded to drag its heels, taking almost two weeks to form a strategy response group and nearly a month before informing other parents whose children had been in the pedophile teacher’s class. The identified 35-year old perpetrator, Gary Hambright, had been an ordained Southern Baptist minister in Takoma, Washington prior to moving to San Francisco in 1977 to become a part-time teacher.

During the course of the near yearlong CID investigation, a total of sixty children between ages 3 and 7 were classified as abuse victims. Normally under state law daycare facilities are immediately closed as soon as abuse is suspected, but in the cases of federally run Presidio and West Point, they were allowed to remain open resulting in even more children being molested. It was business as usual at the Presidio daycare for a full year after evidence of abuse first surfaced while the West Point facility was never closed.[xciv] The Army strategy meeting in December included the Presidio officer command, FBI, the US Attorney's office and CASARC members. The letter that went out later that month to the 242 parents whose children attended Hambright's class falsely specified that only one alleged incident had occurred, intentionally deceiving parents into believing that it was only one single isolated case.[xcv] Meanwhile, again just like at West Point, Hambright and other Center staff continued working, very likely abusing yet more children. It wasn't until the following April only after the Tobins and a few other parents forced the Army to notify all the parents in a second letter that the sexual abuse was more widespread than initially reported. But by this time the children were talking and parents were becoming increasingly upset and alarmed, learning that so many of their children had been abused, and not just by Hambright.

Exactly the same horrifying details of satanic ritual abuse emerged at the Presidio as in both the West Point and McMartin cases. The children were forced to drink urine and eat feces. They had blood smeared on their bodies, were taken off grounds to two private homes on post and one residence off post in San Francisco, they had guns pointed at them with death threats to them and their families if they tell, and at least five confirmed cases of chlamydia were documented.[xcvi] A preliminary AIDS test came back positive for one boy. And though subsequent testing indicated he did not contract the disease, escalating fears in the parents constituted yet more torture. And those fears were not unfounded as less than three years after the investigation began, on November 8th, 1989 Gary Hambright did die of AIDS.[xcvii] The time of disease onset listed on his death certificate was "years," so the deceased pedophile could have still infected their sons and daughters with the HIV virus. The terrified parents were not yet out of the woods, suffering additional anxiety on top of all the abuse and setbacks heaped on them from the unscrupulous federal [in]justice system that diabolically failed them and their damaged children.
